LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

MONDAY, MAY 17, 1965

The House met at 3 o'clock, p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: We are pleased to have as guests to the Legislature today, students from the following schools: In the west gallery, Glencoe public school, Glencoe; in the east gallery, Harley Central public school, Harley and Our Lady of Wisdom separate school, Scarborough.

Petitions.

Presenting reports by committees.

Motions.

Introduction of bills.

THE CROWN AGENCY ACT

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Crown Agency Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The sixteenth order, House in committee of supply; Mr. W. G. Noden in the chair.

On vote 208:

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Chairman, I think it was something like 12.30 when we were in a discussion of the vote on the emergency measures organization last week.

Mr. Chairman: Order! We are on a motion by the hon. member for Woodbine (Mr. Bryden), that items 4 and 5 of the vote 208 be struck out.

Mr. Thompson: I am speaking on that. I would like to raise some questions about the whole organization of EMO, as it is called. I think the first thing that any organization would want to know, is what its purpose is. I have raised this in the past, for over six years, examining finances to pay expenditures for this organization, before the present hon. Attorney General (Mr. Wishart) was even in the Legislature, and a previous Minister of Economics and Development had charge of this organization and at that time we were asking questions about the form of organization of EMO throughout the province. And he was assuring us that there was a voluntary army throughout the province. As I mentioned last week, after that Minister suggested that, the then Prime Minister, Hon. Mr. Frost, came in and said that the approach that would be used in a national emergency is to use the armed forces. Do not let us forget this.

Well, as I look at the role of the armed forces today, I think we all recognize that with the change of approach they are taking, surely there must be a change of responsibility on the part of EMO. But we have heard nothing with respect to EMO to indicate that they would have different terms of responsibility.

Is it in charge of a national emergency and of evacuation? Will it man the roads? Will it man the approaches for the evacuation of people out of cities, rescue, first aid, traffic control, monitoring damage, road clearance and so on?

As yet we have had no clear answer to this. I think it is very important that we should have a clear answer on what is the responsibility of EMO.

I would think that one of the necessary factors would be immediate rapid action if we had any emergency. I would think that there would be a clear knowledge who is in charge. I think through you, sir, that the hon. Attorney General has probably served in the military forces and he recognizes that in a national emergency it is so essential that there be someone in charge who can make decisions immediately and direct the forces.

Therefore, it is with some little disappointment, that in the case of the organization which comes under the hon. Attorney General's department and from whom we hoped there would be a clear, decisive voice and a show of quick action, that we find that when my hon. friend from Downsview (Mr. Singer) raises three very simple questions about EMO, instead of replying almost within the next day we are still waiting for the answer.

I am referring to a question he raised, question 77. Will the hon. Attorney General advise if, in the event of a national emergency such as war, the residents of Metropolitan Toronto will be evacuated from said municipality?

Now surely if we had an efficient organization we would not be waiting three months to get the answer to this rather simple and fundamental question; but such is the case.

If so, the question goes on, where will the citizens of Metropolitan Toronto be evacuated to? We have waited three months to hear the answer to that.

If so, has there been any arrangement for the stockpiling of food for such evacuees? We have waited three months for that.

If so, what are these arrangements? If so, has there been any provision for shelter for such evacuees? If so, what are these arrangements?

If so, what arrangements have been made for evacuation of the following from Metropolitan Toronto: 1. School children; 2. Patients in hospitals; 3. Aged and infirm; 4. Persons in penal institutions.

I can only say that the delay we have had in getting a reply to these very fundamental questions is an indication that something is rotten in the state of EMO.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Thompson: Now, sir, we may have this situation, and we have had this in the past, where we have been trying to establish if the hon. Attorney General's department has a responsibility for this elusive organization, EMO?

I was interested, again, in the series of questions that were asked by my friend, the hon. member for Downsview, Mr. Chairman. He asked: "Does the province of Ontario exercise any supervisory jurisdiction over expenditures made by the municipal emergency measures organizations in Ontario?" And the answer came back: "Yes."

I think it is important that we had that clarified because, sir, in the past when we saw the vagueness, when we saw the misinterpretations being given about this organization we began to wonder who was really responsible for it. But when it is clearly stated here that you have a jurisdiction over EMO, then we say to the hon. Attorney General that he has a responsibility to be able to provide answers about its objective.

The interesting thing to me is that—if I could just take Metropolitan Toronto—we find we have a situation where the organizer of Metropolitan Toronto—or the director, or whatever title he goes under—is suggesting that they have formulated great plans for evacuation, for shelter protection from nuclear strikes; yet the man in charge of the provincial area is not able to supply an answer.

I would like to look at the operation within Metropolitan Toronto, where the largest proportion of our people are living; and possibly this would be one of the real danger areas for a strike in the event of war. When you examine the operation—we do know that last year there was an accidental triggering of the alarm in Ottawa—we would assume that when an alarm goes off, if this organization has any efficiency and if they have done a job of informing the people, that when they hear an alarm they know how to move quickly in connection with the emergency.

But what we find is that no one, not even the government officers, were aware what this noise was all about. That, sir, would suggest to me that there is some inefficiency. There is something wrong in the state of EMO when an alarm goes off and even the government officers are wondering: what on earth is that noise going on over there?

In Toronto people would wonder what on earth was going on if there was any kind of an alarm—even in the form of an exercise—because as I understand it, there have really been very few exercises in Metropolitan Toronto, very few rehearsals by the emergency organization—it is mostly academic talk at the moment. There has been no practical exercise for the people of the city. Indeed if they had an exercise there would be real embarrassment because of the exposure of the whole inefficiency and confusion regarding the organization.

We are told that there are 14 dispersal routes from Metro Toronto; we are told that these dispersal routes are for the people to move out in their cars and head quickly toward the north and the east and the west. The public, however, has to guess how EMO plans it. They will not know where these routes are, because as I understand from another question which my hon. friend from Downsview asked, the signs which were bought several years ago are not out on the routes to indicate the dispersal routes; they are still in the vaults of police station No. 5.

If there is any practical purpose to paying for signs, it is the purpose of hammering them up to indicate the routes and not keeping them hidden like the gold in Fort Knox.

I would suggest, as well, that there is a very real question about these 14 dispersal routes. It is a very real question whether people, even in their cars, in the matter of an emergency would be able to get out through these 14 routes. That question would be in anyone's mind, even if they think of the traffic congestion that takes place at 5 o'clock. What on earth would happen on these 14 routes if there was a real emergency and the people were aware of it!

Apart from all kinds of other democratic questions, what happens to the people who have not got cars and who are left in the city? Apart from practical questions such as what about blocking people who might have to dive into the city. You always hear a vague kind of talk about this dispersal; you hear that there will be volunteers who will be directing the traffic—they have set up some kind of automated system for all the street signs. But I suggest the only test of whether this would be efficient would be if they have a rehearsal.

Now I am sure that the reply will be that they had two rehearsals. I understand there was one in the autumn of 1963, when a few policemen moved up to the dispersal routes in cars, with some direction from an RCAF aircraft. Again in 1964—and I can imagine that effort—the valiant little band of EMO personnel had a theoretical exercise with a couple of the dispersal units heading out some of these streets.

I suggest the government is surely not satisfied with this whole façade that is taking place. Let us come back to that flaw which the Metro EMO has formulated, sir. As I said before, grand plans for evacuation and shelter protection in the event of a nuclear strike; I am sure that the hon. Attorney General would agree with me that the plans are too vague in many areas and too impractical in many other areas. There has been no dissemination of knowledge, as the speaker before me suggested, no dissemination of information to the public; and there has been virtually no exercise on the operation to see if these plans would be effective.

This raises the very real question of whether this is really worthwhile expenditure. What about the director? I would say he is a man who must be able to live under a great deal of frustration. But even the poor director of this organization works under a committee, as I understand, which is composed of members of Metro council and other elected officials. This committee does have the power to form policy and approve estimates, but it does not in fact exercise close scrutiny of the operations.

I want to come back again to the question of the hon. member for Downsview when he was asking about the operation and asking whose responsibility it was, whether it is a responsibility of the hon. Attorney General's department for the finances, and the answer is right there that it is.

I suggest, sir, that there are so many areas that are vague in this setup that it warrants either ridicule, or else real concern and apprehension that a government would permit this kind of money to be spent without taking concrete steps either to develop an organized functional pattern or else to abandon it.

Metro EMO has a plan, I understand, and this plan is a thick booklet of detailed instructions covering schools, fall-out hazards, dispersal warnings, etc. The contents of the plan have not been passed on to the civic and other officials whose task in a strike would be to implement them so that it could be assumed the designated responsible officials would be present in the event of a strike and not fleeing with their families. Even if the plans were familiar to the designated persons, such as the chief of police and so on, no measures have been generally taken to ensure those persons would have passed the information on to their departments.

Dispersal routes I have talked about already and shown what a farce that situation is.

We talk about shelters. The select committee on national defence in October, 1964, recommended that the shelter programme should be dropped. Metro EMO still includes shelters in its programme. It agrees that individual shelters have not been effectively adopted by the population and are impractical as a planned protection method. However, the Metro EMO published and distributed ineffectively a booklet Industrial Defence Planning, of which a large part is detailed specifications for shelters, contents of shelters, and so on. Metro EMO also speaks of vague plans for conducting fallout protection, measurements of school basements, and so on. It is uncertain whether these would be used for blast protection only or for fallout protection once the city has been demolished.

A fundamental defect with the plan—and I refer to the plan which has been written up—is that it presupposes voluntary dispersal. No provision in the absence of a full-scale mass shelter programme is made for persons remaining. The plan only is effective if there is a mass evacuation. Yet how much notice would be given? Metro EMO presupposes an international crisis to give advance warning. This is fallacious. Of course there would be an international crisis, perhaps even declarations of a state of emergency.

But would the people of Canada or the people of Toronto disperse from their homes and flee unprepared to some unknown place in the countryside? Of course they would not. We had this situation in the Cuban crisis, for example. There was worry, and in some U.S. cities, in fact, there was panic. No North American city witnessed any dispersal. There would be no evacuation until the people were convinced that bombs were on the way. So the time of warning would only be a few hours at the most. And how effective would the Metro EMO plan be unless notice were given, with people unprepared and uneducated as they are?

EMO main control in Metro Toronto is a communication centre at 4938 Yonge Street. I want to say about this address, that this is in the demolition area, the danger area in Metro Toronto. The men who man the centre every day and every night at 4938 Yonge Street, in the event of an emergency are going to have to stay there and they may be the first casualties. I suppose for that reason they are very gallant men who are working at 4938 Yonge Street.

Let us have a look at the staff. Apparently they man it for 24 hours daily and they are made up of personnel who are hired from a protection agency. I understand at 8:30 every morning they are on the job, and what they do is make a radio check with all the EMO supplied radios held by the Metro fire departments. I may say this, they have done such an efficient job of calling up the different fire departments to know if their radios are in an efficient and working order, that at one time—and apparently not only one time, but several times—people have phoned EMO to know if there is a fire burning somewhere. One situation out in Scarborough is a real accomplishment, I think. In a sense they must have been terribly frustrated just picking up the phone at 8:30 to check all the radio bookups that they have, but on this occasion at a fire in Scarborough they got into their truck and headed out, and I presume they probably parked the truck beside or behind the police and the fire truck and they witnessed that fire there, a real fire.

We can be cynical or amusing about this but really there is a question about all the cost. They have not just got one truck, which the Minister agreed to pay for; there are six trucks at, I understand, something like $25,000 each. And what are these trucks doing? Surely there must be an overlapping of services. They cannot take over from the fire department; they are not the police. What are they doing with these trucks as they report down to 4938 Yonge Street? It may be that what they are doing is satisfying their boyhood ambition of chasing a fire truck, but we cannot afford to have that kind of thing paid out of public moneys.

Let us look at the training programme. Metro EMO training school is in Scarborough at Civic and Dennett roads and its purpose is to provide courses in first aid and rescue to municipal employees, farm and business men, and so on. Let us be blunt about it—this school should be closed. The school actually ran very few courses in 1964, and they may say they had a number of courses but the question is how long were these courses? They were for a very short duration.

It interests me that apparently they had a competition among all the people who took these courses in rescue work. The hon. Attorney General should be asking this sort question: How many teams were entered? How much time was spent in training them and not in training others? Why was the competition limited to EMO personnel? It would have been understandable, for example, if they had had the competition against the fire departments or some other team. How many completed the courses of 24 hours duration?

Could they not be more effectively taught by the St. John Ambulance? Do we realize that, for example, the army courses take 40 hours of duration? Yet for some reason the EMO people are thinking they can get people through in 24 hours.

Going into this whole question of presentations to schools, we see where the EMO people are suggesting they have distributed all kinds of books. It was pointed out by another speaker that they have distributed a great number of books, but the real test is, who read the books? How many of the teachers, for example, give a course in connection with civil defence? How many of the principals have used the assembly exercises before going into their classes, to explain the kind of rehearsal approach that should be taken? I would suggest that they are very few and I think the real test is that there are very few parents around this city who would have the slightest idea what EMO does.

But there are many who would know the word EMO, and this comes up to another aspect. One of the peculiar things about EMO is that you see a big ad put up and billboards around the place saying something like, "EMO will take care of you." It sounds like a Conservative candidate in the middle of an election. It even has the name of the director on it. But it does not say how it will take care of you, or what it will do, or anything else. That is a mystery which seems to be also a mystery to the hon. Attorney General, otherwise he would have had an answer and we would not have to wait almost three months for the answer.

I could go into further areas, such as seminars. Metro EMO in the two years 1963-64 ran four seminars for businessmen. Why only four? These four seminars were for two evenings each, a total of eight evenings. Supposedly more than 90 firms were represented. Surely we would have to admit that if we are taking this thing seriously, this is a feeble, paltry effort, when we have so few of the total number of Toronto firms being represented. What is the result of the seminars? During the brief meetings there were discussions, but how many of the persons attending could now control their firms usefully and practically in the event of a nuclear strike? Remember, only a tiny fraction of firms were represented.

Volunteers! In 1960, Metro EMO had a list of approximately 17,000 names of persons who had offered their voluntary services. How many volunteers has EMO now?

One other thing in this sort of tragic opera is that apparently a fire destroyed some of their records. It seems ironical that it should be EMO where fire destroys the records, when one of the things they are supposed to do is to put out fires. But it destroyed their records, and Metro EMO claims the names were lost. Fortunately, duplicates were kept in a provincial EMO office.

But apart from those names on paper, how many of these volunteers are now trained and available? How many thousands of volunteers have actually turned up in Metro Toronto for at least one meeting or an exercise in the past year?

I think you will find there is only a handful of active volunteers, and most of them are either civic employees who do it as part of their job, or ham radio operators who get free radios for their efforts, which are minimal.

The 17,000 names of 1960 are probably now worthless through not being kept up to date with active volunteer lists. Further, there are very few volunteers active in Metro now because there is no activity in which to participate, except the fun of being a ham operator. Rather than depending on such an elusive scheme as EMO's volunteer programme, civic departments should run their own programmes, which would then be properly planned and organized for practical control.

So it goes on as you look at this peculiar organization. But the thing I am concerned about is that we are spending public money on it year after year. It is something like comic opera.

Several years ago when we pressed for definite answers, the Minister then told us he could not give us definite answers because this was really a secret, almost a state secret. He did not want to disclose anything in case some foreign country might find out what we were doing in the way of preparation. Then the Prime Minister moved into the picture and he said, "All right we will show you what we are doing for ourselves." Some of us had the privilege of going on this picnic.

We were picked up by bus here, and we were told that this was the quick, decisive action to be taken in the event of any emergency or strike. We got in the bus and meandered to some army place, and we saw—at least I did—a real comic opera, with officers in uniform phoning and saying they thought there was fallout dust coming over in their area, and some fellow saying, "Well, you had better wait until after lunch because the commanding officer in this area will not be back until then." After we had gone through all that palaver, we got back in our bus and we drove home, feeling more insecure than when we started out. And I think we were.

As the hon. member for Woodbine says, "You were crazy if you went." Well, perhaps we were, but then I think that anyone who has a look at this organization gets a bit crazy from what he sees.

Public funds are being expended, and it is either a fraud or a fiction. The hon. Attorney General is new, and I have admired the way in which he has been handling these estimates, admitting where he felt he should be moving in to clean up the situation.

I understand also from a number of questions that my hon. friend raised, that action was taken even before his estimates came to the floor.

This is another place where we obviously have to have action. We do not want to feel that the government is putting out something as ludicrous as "The Pirates of Penzance." It is because of this, knowing that the hon. Attorney General is a man who makes decisions, that we have been so disappointed, especially when we ask only fundamental questions about this estimate—to where do we all get evacuated, and what is the purpose of it? We have been waiting three months. That must indicate something! We feel sure, sir, that you will either have an adequate explanation about this organization, or else you will cancel the grant which is proposed for it.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Chairman, on Friday morning, I put certain questions to the hon. Minister which I presume that he plans to answer in due course.

I noticed in Saturday's paper that the local director of EMO has had his salary raised to $13,900 annually, and this is the same man who said on February 12 that "there is a real conflict here as to who would be in charge and it could be disastrous if something happened." And he did not know just who was in charge.

In connection with this whole matter, I wonder if the hon. Attorney General would inform us whether or not anything has happened in making plans for this particular building? Here we have what we consider the most important people in the province of Ontario, as far as EMO is concerned. We are voting a large part of their budget. We are sanctioning their existence. I have not been in this House very long, but while I sat on a municipal council, I was taken to EMO headquarters and I was shown the workings, just as, I understand, you went to Camp Borden some years ago, to see something of the provincial workings of this organization.

Since then, the organization has changed. But we were also told at that time that certain plans were being made, and the local suggestion was we build a fallout shelter, which has never been built, and that we man the machine guns to keep the citizens out, so civil servants could be saved. But are there plans, in case of disaster, to evacuate and to save these important people in this legislative assembly? Or are we simply to have a bell rung and then march out to meet the fallout at the front door in the usual way?

Whether or not it is important that these people be saved, I do not know, but certainly these people back in the corner—the civil servants—are far more important in the case of a disaster of this kind than we are. And certainly some plans should be made to ensure that they would be preserved for the ongoing functions of government, because they are the key people in this regard.

One further matter I would like to raise, Mr. Chairman, in addition to the ones I raised the other night. It is in connection with the follow-up of these machines which have been bought. I made it clear then, and I reiterate again, I have no objection to public moneys being spent to build up fire fighting equipment in this province and across Canada, and I think the more efficient fire fighting equipment we have, the better. I have no objection to the federal government, or the provincial governments, sharing with the municipalities that kind of expenditure. But I do object to the kind of playing at toy soldiers that we have in order to get the fire fighting equipment.

One of the conditions of the granting of these bits of equipment is that the municipality agrees to enrol and train for fire emergency measures auxiliary fire fighters in excess of the normal peace-time requirements in municipalities; to serve the requirements of civil emergency in the area in accordance with the plans developed by the Ontario fire marshal.

I would like to ask the hon. Minister, in the case of the various fire fighting facilities that have been provided, how many of these areas have provided for the implementation of the "G" part of these regulations—that is 4(G) of the conditions that are laid down. I wonder how many of the municipalities concerned have really carried out these instructions; or have they simply regarded this extra piece of equipment as sheer bonus?

I also would call to the attention of the hon. Minister, following up the statement of the hon. leader of the Opposition, the annual report of EMO in the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto. In that, following up what the hon. member for Dovercourt had to say, we have vague generalities, stories of exercises, stories of conferences, stories of co-operation. The Bell Telephone Company is mentioned together with the metropolitan police force and fire fighting force, pictures are shown here; but in no place is given the time and date of these conferences and schools and courses, and at no place is given the number of participants in these schools and courses.

There is a picture here, in one case, of a course and it shows, I think it is three or four people. Whether that is the total number of people taking the course, I do not know. We have here vague generalities, we have nothing tied down that is definite.

It is high time we had a statement from this government as to policy in connection with a sacred cow which seems designed more to give people a sense of security, to make people think that something is being done when it is not being done. It is an organization which is set up simply to carry out the illusion that there is protection here, when as a matter of fact there is no such thing. This government should face that fact and give answers to some of these questions.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Chairman, I want to add a word or two here. I do not know if the hon. Attorney General is aware of the report of the special committee on defence of the House of Commons, made to the House of Commons on October 1, 1964. That report is contained in No. 160 of the votes and proceedings of the House of Commons of Canada.

I commend that to the hon. Attorney General's attention because, starting at page 744 of that report, headed: "Chapter 3—Civil Emergency Planning."

This committee, which is an all-party committee as I understand it, thoroughly examines civil defence, points out a number of grave shortcomings and concludes with their recommendations. They are eight in number and I will read them:

1. Your committee therefore recommends that a federal-provincial meeting on emergency planning be held before the year end.

It is my understanding that no such meeting was held between October and the end of the year 1964.

Future meetings should be held at least annually in order to ensure continuing liaison between the two levels of government. Joint planning must be developed that recognizes clearly the responsibility of government at various levels.

I think that the tenor of the remarks in this debate made by my hon. leader, the hon. gentleman here to my left, has been that no one really is sure what this programme is designed to do. We have flurries; we have a shelter-building flurry; we have an evacuation flurry; we have a sign-painting flurry; we spend a lot of time in erecting sirens—no one yet is quite sure whether they work or not; or if they do work what is going to happen if they do go off?

Somewhere along the line we have to have some idea whether we are going anywhere on this. It has been my contention, Mr. Chairman, since I first sat on the Metro council in 1957, that to my mind there is not a greater waste of public money than the money that both this government has spent and the federal government has spent and the municipal governments have spent on so-called EMO planning.

I do not think that there is any planning. It may be that there is a role for EMO in emergency—floods, fires, and that sort of thing. But if that is the role, let us do that, and perhaps there are better ways of doing it through the fire departments or through the civil service of the municipalities and so on.

The role, in an emergency which would bring atom bombs to us, just completely escapes me, and I think that it escapes the knowledge of this House of Commons committee.

I continue:

2. That EMO national exercises be resumed and conducted on a regular basis.

As my hon. leader said, we tried to find out if there are exercises on a regular basis that mean anything and as far as we have been able to find out, there are no such exercises.

3. That the expenditure of funds for the current shelter programme be discontinued.

Now, whether the shelter programme still goes on or not, I do not know. If there is any continuing expenditure of funds, it is the opinion of this committee—and I share their opinion—that it is a waste of time.

One of the questions I addressed was whether there were plans for shelters in the new buildings that we are erecting across the way and the hon. Attorney General said he thought so. I happened to speak to the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Connell) who said that there were areas down in the basement that probably could be adapted at a great expenditure of moneys to be shelters. The hon. Minister recognizes—and I do not blame him—there is no point in asking the Treasury board for several hundred thousand extra dollars to build shelters in these buildings. The purpose of them escapes the hon. Minister and I think it escapes the rest of us. It certainly escapes the mind of this committee in Ottawa.

4. That research be carried forward so that techniques of providing home protection quickly with the materials at hand may be developed.

They refer to the study of public fallout shelters in Alberta, and say when it is completed that an:

—analysis be done based on the data it reveals as to the cost of providing fallout shelters across the country and the percentage of population that may be so protected.

In other words, they are suggesting that really there has been no basic study in this at all. Are we going to be able to provide reasonable shelter by such a programme and how much is it going to cost?

6. That a decision be made concerning fallout protection. The public will not build shelters.

Which is the conclusion they have come to after this great expenditure of money.

It is financially impossible for the federal government to provide fallout shelters for the entire population. Therefore the government must decide, based on the cost revealed by the Alberta survey, whether or not it will provide protection for a portion of the population.

If that decision has to be made, which portion of the population do you pick? This would be a very interesting question. Is there going to be public money expended for this purpose or not and if so, on whom is it going to be spent, who will it benefit?

That public information programmes be instituted to provide basic information, that they should be on a periodic basis on television, radio and the press.

And then finally:

That consideration be given to regular testing of the alarm system in all communities across the country.

Well, not only that, I would think that consideration be given to impressing the people who live in the province what the alarm system really means.

We have a number of sirens around Metropolitan Toronto, there is one within a few blocks of where I live. Since it has been put up, which is a good three years ago, I do not think it has ever gone off. I would doubt, and one of the questions I directed to the hon. Attorney General, was whether they have ever been tested. He said that is a federal responsibility. I would doubt if there is anybody I could quickly find who could tell whether that siren is in working order.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): What would happen if it did go off?

Mr. Singer: If it did go off, as the hon. member for Woodbine said, what does it mean? What does it mean to the people who can hear that siren? Where are they supposed to go, what are they supposed to do, what is the significance of it?

To my mind, sir, and I think it is implicit in this motion, the moneys that have been expended in this province and in the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto by all three levels of government over the past eight, 10, 12 years on EMO have been about as great a waste of public money as anything I have ever come in contact with. I would think that the time is now here that the hon. Attorney General should be able to say: "Our policy insofar as EMO is so-and-so and such-and-such. We have an evacuation policy; we have a shelter policy," or "We have neither of those, we have a warning policy." What do they mean; how will they work?

The suggestion that these signs, to which my hon. leader referred and which are in the basement of some police stations, are going to be put on posts that are already there while fallout rains down on the men erecting the signs is just ludicrous. A whole bunch of fancy, painted signs! What do they cost?

The cost—$4,000 or $5,000 or $6,000—is not a big item, but it is thorough waste. There are signs lying in a police station basement that are never going to be used for anything. And you repeat this.

Mr. Chairman, maybe there is a role for some sort of body that is going to provide treatment, care and attention in the event of an emergency such as flood or fire or this sort of thing—Hurricane Hazel for example. But it would seem to me—and we are going to come to this a little later in the fire marshal's estimate, which is a part of this vote and I will have a few remarks—it would seem to me that this sort of money would be far better spent if devoted to the fire marshal's office to provide this kind of service with co-ordination throughout the province. I think that the hon. Attorney General owes to the people of the province a real justification for including this vote again this year in these estimates.

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Chairman, the first thing I would say for the attention of the hon. members of the House is that the emergency measures organization, EMO as we call it, is a joint undertaking of three levels of government, designed by the federal government, the provincial government—our co-operation was sought—and the municipal governments. It is an example of governments working together, but the overall design, the primary responsibility, the direction in which we are asked to go, is given to us by the federal government. I think the least we can do, unless we are going to repudiate emergency measures planning altogether and repudiate what our national government says, and its policies, is to go along with it, unless we are going to repudiate it completely.

Mr. Young: Then put the responsibility on them, Mr. Minister.

Mr. Bryden: Make them justify it.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: We are asked to contribute in dollars, 15 per cent on the programmes. The rest of the money and a very large part of it, is paid by federal dollars. And the municipalities pay a larger share than the provincial government.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Who is in power at Ottawa?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Who is in power?

Mr. MacDonald: Yes.

An hon. member: He does not know.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: This is why—

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): Nobody is in power in Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I am surprised to hear the remarks, particularly from the hon. gentleman opposite to my left, repudiating a programme which is federal, which is directed by the federal government, which is largely paid for by federal dollars, and in which we are asked to co-operate. I think the least we can do unless we repudiate the whole matter is to go along and do what we are asked to do in this joint programme of three governments. That is the first answer I would give to the matter generally.

The hon. member for Dovercourt, the hon. leader of the Opposition, says we have not given the answer to question No. 77. That was the question as to whether there would be evacuation and what were the plans for evacuation from Metropolitan Toronto? I would point out that the hon. member for Downsview, Mr. Chairman, asked ten questions and all of them had extra sub-questions—I think in all some 35 or 36 questions came out of the ten—and they have all been answered in detail except No. 77. They all bore on the matter of EMO. Out of some 30-odd questions, only one and one simple one, "What are the plans to get out of Metro Toronto?" remains unanswered.

There are reasons why the answer has not been given, and I think perhaps at this time I could say to the House that I fairly well recognize that mass evacuation of a city such as Metropolitan Toronto would be impractical, that it is not likely to be attempted, that it would simply be impossible.

With respect to the matter of signs, I know there has been some levity about the signs. I do not know whether this is justified or not. I mean, this whole matter could be extremely serious, and the seriousness seems to rise and fall as the danger in the international situation lessens or grows greater. The signs are available; the posts on which they are to go are placed. My own conception is that certainly they could not be put up while fallout is raining around, but if the international situation reached a point where it seemed extremely grave and likely that a national emergency could arise and even an attack on this nation or on the United States, and that there would likely be some fallout, then the signs would be put up.

Perhaps that is a small effort, perhaps that is a small contribution, but it is what we are asked to do. We are asked to go along with the organization, build up in its working detail at the municipal level, support it—and that is all we do—support, and add some direction in the provincial level and take our overall direction from the federal government. This is what we are asked to do, this we are doing. This is our answer when you say, "Why are you into EMO?" That is why.

There is the function that the municipality does build up an organization. Perhaps in some city which was hard hit, it might go out of commission, but there would be a nucleus to maintain some form of government to supply direction, police control, fire-fighting service, first aid, distribution of food, distribution of medical supplies, and the direction of the population, so that something could be salvaged to the fullest extent possible with the organizations which are built up at the municipal level. Many of these organizations are excellent, with dedicated people working in them, with their plans very complete. They have tried the plans out, they have tested, they have had their trial runs and they are doing excellent work. They would maintain operations and they would, I think, give an excellent account of themselves in any type of disaster, national or natural.

I was interested in hearing the hon. member for Downsview quote the recommendations of the special committee on defence of the House of Commons. I have here the statement made to that special committee in June of last year, less than a year ago, on the emergency measures organization. C. M. Drury, who is the Minister of Industry and who was charged with the carrying on of the emergency measures organization, spoke to the special committee of the House of Commons on defence, on the role and the aims of the emergency measures organization. This is what he said:

The role of emergency measures is the co-ordination of civil defence planning by departments and agencies of the government of Canada;

that is one. He also stated:

The preparation of civil defence plans in relation to matters that are not the responsibility of any other department or agency of the government of Canada;

a special agency to carry on matters that are not departmental, in the government of Canada. He outlined a third role as follows:

The assistance to provincial governments and municipalities in respect of preparation for civil defence where assistance is not the responsibility of any other department or agency of the government of Canada;

then he mentioned general liaison with other countries, with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and with provincial governments on matters relating to civil defence, and he gave a fifth role:

The direction and administration of the civil defence college at Arnprior, Ontario.

As to the aims of the emergency measures organization, he gives three. These are the three aims as cited by the Hon. Mr. Drury:

To plan measures, including the most sensible use of our resources, that will assist the population to survive a hazard of a nuclear or conventional war.

That is aim number one. Second:

To plan for the continuity of essential elements of all levels of government so that civilian leadership, guidance and necessary instruction can be given to the Canadian people.

I think that in any type of warfare or disaster, you expect losses to some extent, and as I see EMO, it is to keep that loss to a minimum, to have as much survival as possible, and by means of the direction, the planning, the training and the furnishing of services planned now, to lessen the effects of a natural war or a nuclear attack. Mr. Drury said the third aim is:

The provision of assistance to provinces, and through them to municipalities, in developing their emergency services to meet disasters through the medium of financial assistance on the basis of up to 75 per cent federal contribution. The provision of training courses at the civil defence college, and generally through the preparation of planning done.

He goes on at length and deals with the matter of public survival, the continuity of government, and gives a progress report of what has been done, and I could use his report in answering most of the questions which have been asked here. But I should just like to stress that as a provincial government, and as a department of that government, it falls to The Department of the Attorney General to say we will co-operate with the federal government. We will contribute our 15 per cent. We will assist the municipalities. We will take direction. We will endeavour to keep these organizations to such level as they can be maintained when interest is low, that is in peacetime when the international situation is quiet and we are not too frightened. We will see what we can do to at least keep a nucleus of an organization going in our municipalities. We will co-operate with you. That is our role, and that is why I ask you for the funds which are in the estimate, to carry on the matter of the emergency measures organization.

The hon. member for Yorkview asks one or two specific questions. I am not sure I completely understood what he wanted me to answer. As I understood the question it concerned three municipalities who purchased pumpers, and the question seemed to be, did they purchase them within the conditions that they were auxiliary equipment, or had they disposed of others? Was this the question with respect to all the municipalities?

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, if I can just reiterate. There were two or three instances I gave showing that perhaps EMO was not carrying out the full terms of reference. One was where a pumper had been sold by the town of Belleville to Woodville, prior to the purchase of a new one. This is contrary to the conditions. Another; at Port Hope, where tenders were called, the tender was let to a company which had bid $2,000 higher than the lowest tender, although the specifications were met I understand, on all tenders. My question was, is this good business, and do we need an organization which is doing this kind of thing to make up the mind of our municipalities, or the mind of someone—whatever it is who makes up their mind—as to what should be done? A junior clerk, I contend, could do just as well as EMO in finalizing these basic decisions.

These were the illustrations I gave, and perhaps the hon. Minister might have some comment on them.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, the inquiries went forward to the three municipalities mentioned. I think perhaps it was unnecessary to inquire of any of them except Belleville, on the question of sale of equipment. In any event, the township of Brownridge wired this reply:

THE TOWNSHIP OF BROWNRIDGE DID NOT SELL FIRE PUMPER. BOTH FIRE PUMPERS—THE ONE ORIGINALLY OWNED BY THE TOWNSHIP AND THE ONE PURCHASED UNDER SUBSIDY—ARE IN COMMISSION IN THE VILLAGE OF DOUGLAS IN THE TOWNSHIP OF BROWNRIDGE.

Port Hope wires and confirms that the town of Port Hope has not, and will not be selling any of their fire trucks.

Belleville writes that they had sold an old fire pumper in February of 1964, that the pumper grants did not come into effect until April 1, 1964, and some time after, Belleville made application for a pumper grant on April 20, 1964. They do state that the old pumper was sold on May 6, 1964. That is the last statement in the information I have.

Mr. Young: This replaced the old pumper.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think, strictly speaking, it is fair to say that they probably have not complied in the sense that they were getting auxiliary equipment. That seems to be quite clear from the answer they have given. But how seriously one would regard the fact that they were lacking a pumper and got one from EMO, I—

Mr. Young: Mr. Minister, I simply said I do not object to this. All I am saying is that the conditions being laid down by EMO here and the way in which the whole thing is done is an exercise in futility. That is all.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has said any clerk or junior clerk could purchase these pumpers, make the application and get the grant. This is perhaps true, but it does happen to be one of the programmes designed, again by the federal government, to assist municipalities to obtain fire fighting equipment, auxiliary fire fighting equipment. And since it is in EMO, it is done as a matter of the EMO organization within the municipality. I cannot deny that the clerk that does it in the EMO organization, may be the town or city clerk for all I know, someone has to do it, but I think these are generally municipal officials who comprise the EMO organization.

Mr. Young: Then my question is, why maintain all this superfluity of organization to do these little jobs? Evidently there is no provision made for continuity of provincial government. Perhaps we should have a hole down into the subway here, so we could all drop down in there in case of disaster. That might serve the purpose, or it may be that government has its own plans for evacuation and the Opposition does not know a thing about it. We do not count and this may eliminate the Opposition! Maybe that's an easy way to do it, I do not know.

But the whole thing seems so ludicrous, Mr. Chairman, that I just cannot quite make up my mind that we should be passing this vote. I think the province recognizes the futility of this, and our point is a very simple one, it is simply to recognize this futility, then let us make our protest to the federal government by cutting out this vote. Then if the federal government thinks this is important, it is going to have to do one of two things—either jack up EMO and make it significant, or wash the whole thing out.

Mr. E. P. Morningstar (Welland): Mr. Chairman, I feel this is another fine example where our great government is co-operating with the federal government, and especially the hon. Attorney General's department. I think this government should be commended for the co-operation it is extending to the federal government in this matter.

Mr. Bryden: I do not want to prolong this much longer. I think the subject has been well canvassed, but I must say I was a little surprised at the attitude of the hon. Attorney General as affirmed by the hon. member for Welland, that co-operation with the federal government is good per se, whether or not it accomplishes anything. It seems to be the attitude of the hon. Attorney General that it ill behooves us to question the matter. The federal government has a programme; whether or not we like it or even understand it, we should be prepared to co-operate because in this day and age co-operation is a good thing.

I think co-operation is a good thing, but I think it should be for a purpose; and I think it is high time that some coherent purpose was indicated with regard to this organization, or alternatively that the money spent on it should be saved.

Admittedly our proportion of the total is relatively small, 15 per cent I believe the hon. Attorney General said. It still means an expenditure in our estimates of about $360,000. That is perhaps not too much in a budget of $1.5 billion, but I do not see why we should undertake to spend any amount of money merely because the federal government would like us to spend it. That government spends $6 billion or $7 billion a year, I have a suspicion it does not know where a large part of it goes. I do not think that we should get into their slack habits in reviewing expenditures.

A committee, to which the hon. member for Downsview referred, of federal members of Parliament, looked into this matter and could not really find much function being performed or much value being received for this expenditure of money. So why should we spend $360,000 merely in the name of co-operation? There are many other fields where we can co-operate with the federal government with mutual benefit. This is one where some severe questions should be asked. I think the federal government should indicate, much better than it has up until now as far as I can see, what exactly it is trying to accomplish with this programme other than to give a few jobs to a few people who apparently want to make like soldiers.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I would not want my attitude of co-operation with the federal government with respect to the emergency measures organization to be construed as a general attitude of co-operation without criticism or examination of any federal programme. But I think we must bear in mind that one of the words in the name of this organization is "emergency," "emergency measures"; meaning emergency measures verging on those that would arise from an attack by an enemy, by possibly a nuclear attack. The other side of this organization is the natural type of disaster—fire, flood, or something of that nature.

This organization arises out of what is called, broadly, civil defence, and in that respect it approaches the condition of a nation at war or contemplating a war. When the federal government, whose field this is, says to a province, will you co-operate in that situation, I think that I have to mute my criticism to some extent and say, yes; but not in every situation.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Bryden moves that items 4 and 5 of vote 208 be struck out.

All those in favour of the motion please rise.

All those opposed to the motion please rise.

Clerk of the House: Mr. Chairman, the ayes are 24, the nays, 47.

Mr. Chairman: I declare the motion lost.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, a year ago this Legislature passed a bill, An Act to provide for the registration, supervision and control of used car dealers and salesmen. I acknowledge that the government, for good reasons or bad, took until January to start proclaiming this Act. I acknowledge that it perhaps was not until last month that all aspects of the Act were put into effect and therefore one should reserve final judgment with regard to the effectiveness of this Act. But I must confess that I have some misgivings that I want to express, because I do not feel that we should let this Act become ineffective in any degree at all.

Public furore a year or so ago, revealed widespread public concern that I think merits consideration in this House, to the point that we can leave these estimates only with full assurance that we are going to get the kind of implementation that is required.

My misgivings arise from the fact—if I may be frank, Mr. Chairman—that the administrators of the Act are operating on the basis that all used car dealers—if I may lapse into the vernacular—are "good guys." Now, I would concede that most used car dealers, like most people involved in any line of business, are "good guys." But we became involved and took legislative action with regard to this situation, not because most of them were good guys, but because there were too many of them who were bad guys—"operators"—in the field.

For example, I was interested in an observation in the Toronto Daily Star, in one of their editorials, where they concluded with this comment, with which I would concur:

Queen's Park, in fact, still seems to be showing unusual gentleness toward a trade which is notorious for the number of sharpers it contains. A little less concern for the dealers and a little more concern for the public would be in order.

Now those are my sentiments and I want to give a few examples as to why I feel this is the case, in the hope that I can persuade the hon. Attorney General in his great variety of concerns to interest himself more in this particular Act and its administration.

For example, in the application form—and these are a couple of general comments—which is generally a good application form, I was rather disturbed to find an old problem that occurs periodically in various government departments. As the application form was reproduced in the Ontario Gazette, I discovered that it was requested of the applicant: "My nationality is . . ."

May I just make the point and pass on? I think we have passed the stage where any government application form, now that the human rights code has been passed, should have any concern what a man's nationality is.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: We have already arranged to take that out.

Mr. MacDonald: Very good! Representations have been made in quarters which saw that it was done—and the hon. Attorney General nods.

A second point that I think is extremely important—and I think the hon. Attorney General is apprized of this—is that he has to sit down soon either with the Cabinet or his colleague, the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Haskett) and clarify the situation with regard to garage licences. Garage licences, as we have had them for some years in the department, authorized a businessman to become involved in a number of activities with regard to automobiles, including the sale of used cars. The garage licence is still in existence, so that when you give a garage licence, if the used car dealer wants to pretend to be obtuse he can assume that he has the right to sell used cars. It seems to me that a revision of the garage licence so that it may encompass other activities—whatever activities the government wants to put into its terms of reference—is in order. But clearly, beyond any shadow of doubt, the sale of used cars is not a right that flows from the getting of a garage licence; it is exclusively that of the licence that is granted under this particular legislation.

I raise this because when we get into the question of private sales—I asked a question before the orders of the day with regard to one Don Smith who was operating in a very cute way, if I may use that term. I understand that he even did not make application before the deadline and has made it since. May I, without going into further detail on that case, ask the hon. Attorney General if there has been some decision with regard to the Smith case?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: He is still under investigation, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MacDonald: You see here, Mr. Chairman, a man who knew what the law was, beyond any shadow of doubt, deliberately did not make application before April 1. I believe this was the deadline under which they must all register. In other words, he was deliberately pursuing his business under the cover of a garage licence. I hope that a very severe look will be taken at his application for a licence.

However, on this question of private sales, I do not know whether the administrators of the Act have come up with any further instances, but if they have not, I draw this to their attention. In the Toronto Daily Star of

April 27, 1965, if one read with minute care, one would discover a couple of little advertisements:

1958 Buick auto., radio, beautiful car, original, $400 full price. 766-3149.

Now there is a telephone number for those who want to add it in their little black books. It becomes even more interesting when you go to the next column and you find another one:

1958 Ford station wagon, 6, radio, 47,000 mi. stand, beautiful car. 766-3149.

Now I do not know if the hon. Minister is aware of this, but if you call up 766-3149 you will discover that the person at the other end is one, Liz Goddard. Liz Goddard, for those who are interested in the used car field, is no newcomer. Indeed, she is so well known in the field that quite some time ago Pierre Berton wrote a whole column on her. So here we are, years later, after the Act is passed, one month after she should have registered, Liz Goddard is still advertising on private sales.

I do not know what can be done. I am not minimizing the difficulties of playing policeman in this field, but it comes back to the proposition that if you are going to clean up the field you do not operate on the basis that they are all "good guys" because they are not. Indeed they are not all "good gals" either because some of them are Liz Goddards.

An hon. member: What does she look like?

Mr. MacDonald: I have no idea what she looks like. The interest of some of the hon. members here apparently extends beyond the telephone number.

The second point I would like to draw to the hon. Minister's attention is that on an earlier discussion on this issue I raised the question as to whether or not it would be a valid proposition to obligate used car dealers to list the licence numbers in their advertisements. I was very interested to discover that this is becoming increasingly the practice; indeed, even one Ted Williamson is now putting in the licence numbers in his ads. That being the case, Mr. Chairman, I am wondering, if I may suggest to the hon. Attorney General, whether it would not be a good thing now to amend our regulations so that every used car dealer will put in the licence numbers, because—without my going into the explanation of the value of a licence number—you can at least circumvent that tactic of advertising a very attractive car as a come-on when that car is never there. Even though you call from a telephone booth literally across the street and then rush across the street, it still is not there, although you were told when you called from the telephone booth that it was awaiting your purchase if you wished to come.

There is a third item I want to draw to the hon. Attorney General's attention, and I do it because apparently he has to be persuaded on this point. There is a growing belief among those who are interested in this field that a log book, while it might involve some routine requirements and conceivably create some difficulties, may be the best way to catch many of the abuses that have grown up in the field.

In an interview that I believe CKEY, on "Politics' Three Levels," had with the hon. Attorney General on January 10 last, the hon. Attorney General is quoted in the transcript as saying this, with reference to a log book:

Well, that would be an extremely complicated and onerous and difficult thing to do. For instance, the dealer sells me a used car. I may keep it as my car. I am not subject to this Act. If I sell it to my neighbour John Doe, and John Doe may sell it to his neighbour Bill Jones, who is going to keep the records and the mileage and how this car. . . . And then eventually when Bill Jones trades it in, it gets back in the hands of a dealer again and it has changed its status, its character, its mileage, its condition. But that dealer, when he takes it in, must record it and when he sells it he must keep the details so to this extent we can go. It would be extremely difficult to follow a car right through perhaps a number of individual owners.

I repeat, I do not know whether the hon. Attorney General still feels that this is a difficulty. But you can read, for example, one column that Ron Haggart had on December 28, 1964, with regard to used cars and what happens to a car that is so badly wrecked that an insurance company does not want to bother with it at all, and pays off the complete amount. Then this car is handed to a dealer, it goes through two or three dealers, and a little while later you will find a very alluring ad in the paper with regard to a car that can be bought for $1,400. This is the old, completely smashed-up car, presumably back in shape to go on the road.

It seems to me that even though you may have some difficulties—and I think the hon. Attorney General is exaggerating them—in keeping a log even though a car goes into private hands, the owner can keep the log up to date. He bought the car on such-and-such a date; he sells it on such-and-such a date again; they know that he owned it during that particular period. But you would eliminate a lot of the abuses that have arisen by a deliberate rapid sale from one person to another, to hide from the future purchaser the record of a car.

A fourth point that I want to raise with the hon. Attorney General is in connection with advertising. If one reads, even in a cursory fashion, the advertising in the papers today, there are a number of items that clearly stand out as open to serious objection. I have a few of them here for example, ads which state in bold and attractive type the proposition that when you buy a car—"government-approved cars," or "all cars inspected by The Department of Transport—it carries the seal of approval on the windshield." My information is that the seal of approval, if it is there indeed, is not really an inspection to guarantee to the person the full operation of this car except for certain safety requirements in which The Department of Transport is quite rightly concerned. It seems to me that this is a deliberate misrepresentation.

I want to come a few moments later to the question of warranties. We indeed might cope with this problem if there was a warranty, so that when the buyer came in, and if he was the victim of the come-on, and bought this car because it was government inspected, if he got a warranty when he went out then the dealer would have to live up to it.

The second thing that I draw to the hon. Attorney General's attention—

Mr. Singer: That inspection has nothing to do with engines.

Mr. MacDonald: Right. It has nothing to do with engines other than a few safety devices, so it is misleading to the consumer.

Another one that is very, very frequent is the question of six per cent interest. I will say, and I think without any fear of contradiction, that those of us who have sat through the select committee on consumer credit will very readily agree that any man who pretends that he is providing interest on used car sales at six per cent and no more is misleading the public because this simply is not happening in many comparable lines of business. It is more likely to be 12 or 15 per cent or more. Here you have misleading advertising. Indeed, in this connection I was rather interested to read a little editorial in the Toronto Daily Star of May 6, which I draw to the attention of the hon. Minister because it may be a good tactic to cope with these people who persist in using advertising as a come-on. It is entitled:

SLIPPERY AD

Mrs. Bernice Wyszynski of Bristol, Conn., noticed that a breezy dealer's ad priced a car in "bananas" instead of dollars. She took up the offer.

She marched to the car lot—with 1,395 bananas bought for $60 at the supermarket—and demanded the advertised late-model convertible.

The dealer turned out to be not all that fond of bananas, and refused the sale. But the state consumer protection agency—they have such things in Connecticut:

—backed up Mrs. Wyszynski and charged the dealer with misleading advertising.

She got the car. And Bristol advertisers learned a lesson.

If it had happened in Ontario, Mrs. Wyszynski would probably still be walking to work and feeding her family bananas three times a day.

This may be a rather amusing but a salutary way to cope with some of these misleading ads—just make them live up to them.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I might just remind the House, and particularly the hon. member for York South that in this session of this Legislature I introduced legislation, which is Bill No. 6, amending The Used Car Dealers Act of 1964, by adding thereto the following section:

Where, in the opinion of the registrar, any person registered under this Act is making false, misleading or deceptive statements in any advertisement, circular, pamphlet or similar material, the registrar may order the immediate cessation of the use of such material.

We had considerable debate on that but I was constrained to add:

Any such order shall be reviewable under the appeal provisions of section 16, and subsequent sections thereof.

We did seek to get at the misleading advertising, and I think not only will this amendment do that but it will have some very considerable bearing on the qualification of such persons to continue to hold a licence.

Mr. MacDonald: I agree with the hon. Attorney General, but I would remind him of two or three significant things: (a) the Act was passed, (b) it has received Royal assent, (c) I have read ads with regard to six per cent interest and buying government-inspected cars since that Act was passed.

So I am back to my basic theme, namely, these are not all "good guys" and we have to administer this Act with some greater degree of vigour if we are going to achieve its original objective. I concur in it and I support it, even with the amendment with regard to advertising—but that is in effect now. I am reading from ads that have appeared since the Royal assent was given to that Act on April 14, if I recall that date correctly.

Perhaps I can clinch the main concern that I have, Mr. Chairman, with regard to the case of Ted Williamson—I am not going into all of the story because anybody who has read the papers will have it at his fingertips. Ron Haggart has done a very persistent study of this as a case history, and if the hon. Attorney General did not happen to hear an interview with the sales manager, Mr. Kelly, of Ted Williamson's firm that was conducted by Pierre Berton in his regular TV programme, I am going to send this over and let him read it at some time when his estimates are over and he is looking for an alternative to the whodunit when he is trying to go to sleep at nights. I say this to the hon. Minister, that if he can read this without coming to the conclusion that this man is a real operator, then I will strike a leather medal for him. Clearly this man is cutting corners, with the whole fantastic proposition of these offers of holidays in Florida and then he gets the people to sign somewhere further down in the contract in effect waiving the right to the holidays in Florida. All of these unnecessary come-ons, I think, are in the category of the "bananas"—he should be forced for about six months to live up to his holidays in Florida, and then he would cut out this nonsense and start to sell used cars.

But the important thing is that when I looked into this whole issue a year ago and took it up publicly when we could not persuade the hon. Attorney General's predecessor to take this whole issue seriously, I talked it over with the better business bureau. The better business bureau has been living, or trying to live, with this man for years. He was skating on the periphery all the while. He was just trying to live within the regulations, and you needed a one-man watchdog to watch this one man alone.

The question that arises in my mind, if the hon. Minister is really serious about going after this, is how long do you play this sort of game? I would remind the hon. Minister that his Act has penalties and those penalties are $2,000 or one year or both, for an individual who is charged, or $25,000 for a corporation. Without having looked through, in any legal sense or in any court sense, I would say that Ted Williamson is a good first, either as a corporation or through some of the people in his firm. Those penalties should be imposed, not only the fine but one month in jail, too. Let us not go through a whole period such as the American anti-trust laws went through, where it took a couple of generations before the U.S. put some of the people in jail—for example, electrical industry heads who had been fleecing the continent of hundreds of millions of dollars down through the years. Let us just be tough about this and I think many of your problems will disappear rather quickly, because that is the only way you are going to let the people in the business who are the bad guys—if I may lapse into the vernacular again—know that you mean business and that they must cut out the nonsense which has resulted in an abuse of the public up until now.

The final point I want to make, Mr. Chairman, with some care, I said at the outset and I mean it, that I am convinced that the majority of the people in the used car business are as honourable people as you can get in any line of business. But it does not quite end there. This government and other governments have neglected this field for so long that abuses have grown up in the used car business that are now of epidemic proportions. As a result there are certain practices in the used car field which are indulged in by all the dealers—certainly by the majority of people in the used car field.

Let me take one instance and this is the question of meddling with the speedometers of cars. In one of his articles, Ron Haggart said, "The turning back of the mileage reading odometer, found on the speedometers of used cars, is a simple and straightforward piece of deception," and I do not see how anybody can deny it. Incidentally, Mr. Chairman, it is not simply a case of turning it back. In some instances of badly smashed cars, cases have been documented by Ron Haggart in pursuing this where they will turn it forward because they do not want the people to have the impression that there are only a few miles on it. The buyer will be a bit puzzled by it. Last fall I was quite intrigued by this aspect of the thing, by reading a Canadian Press story that was carried in the Globe and Mail on September 25, which read as follows:

A former city street maintenance inspector said in Ontario Supreme Court here yesterday that all but three Ottawa car dealers set back speedometers. Melville George Warren, claiming damages for a back injury received in a car accident, said under examination that he was a specialist in setting back speedometers and that he worked for about 60 dealers around Ottawa. The court granted Mr. Warren $1 in damages but did not inquire further into his statement.

The question that intrigues me is, what did the hon. Attorney General's department do about this? Conceivably it is no violation of the law. But I suggest to the hon. Attorney General that in some fashion or another, without underestimating the difficulties involved in it, that in this question of deceiving the consumer, one of the standard tactics that is used across the board, I would say by the majority of used car dealers, good and bad and otherwise, is the matter of changing the speedometer so that the consumer will not know what the true facts are with regard to that car. I draw it to the attention of the hon. Attorney General and invite him and his administrators to consider what can be done in the field.

Related to it is a final point, and that is the question of warranties. Less than one month ago, on April 15, there was an inquest held in this city in which the coroner was quoted as saying:

Coroner Brown: It is about time some check was made on used cars. I think every used car should have a warranty when it is sold.

I think this, too, is something that should be considered and implemented. If every used car dealer had to give a warranty that would be backed up so that the man would not have to go to court—there might be some automatic procedures for not living up to warranties—once again, I think you would get rid of a practice that is pretty widespread in the industry, particularly among the operators, of "dressing-up" a car, of making the necessary changes to give it the appearance of being a good car. But perhaps before you have gone three blocks the muffler drops off, and then a few other things begin to happen, and you find you have got a real lemon. This kind of thing is not an accident. It is not a lemon that has come off the assembly lines when first manufactured. This is deliberately created as a lemon. This is a calculated effort on the part of a used car dealer to get something for nothing—to pawn off on the consumer a product for which he is not getting full dollar value.

On the two levels throughout the whole industry—the question of deceiving the public through manipulation of speedometers, and secondly, the necessity for a warranty which will sort of bring the whole used car field back into good repute again, so that you will know that when you buy a used car that you are not really in a pretty sharp game and are likely to get licked at it—I would appreciate if the hon. Minister might have some comments on the feasibility of these proposals.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I would just say, Mr. Chairman, I find the remarks of the hon. member for York South interesting and I think many of the suggestions that he has put forward here are certainly worthy of consideration. Some of them I have had in mind. I would not propose to mention them specifically now. I think some of these things can be brought about, and as I say, some of them are at present within my own thinking and will be followed to whatever extent we find it feasible in the department. Perhaps when I talk on this subject again, I will be able to satisfy the hon. member that we are not idle. We have not just stopped with the enactment of The Used Car Dealers Act.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, may I just make one other point? I am sorry, I just noticed that I had missed this.

I wonder if I might ask the hon. Attorney General about people who get into almost a professional business of towing cars away. There was a story just a few weeks ago of one, Walter Howson, whose Ace Towing Company hauls away parked cars. He sought and failed to get a parking lot licence here in the city of Toronto. I am wondering, for example, whether this man has a used car licence? Indeed, my wondering goes one step further, provoked by a very interesting letter that was carried in the Toronto Daily Star a few days ago, May 8, by one Henry S. Rosenberg. He is a lawyer. His letter is rather brief. I think I will put it on the record:

With the increasing congestion of traffic in Toronto more signs are appearing: "Cars will be towed away at owner's expense." This raises many questions. Does such a sign give someone the right to take the law in his own hands? Does it not require an order of the court to seize someone else's property? Can the towing company charge someone who gave them no instructions? Can they charge for storing the automobile until it is picked up or might they be subject to an action for damages for conversion? Maybe the illegal parker is subject to an action for damages. What if an accident occurs while the automobile is being towed away? Is the insurer of the automobile owner responsible? Also, if they have the right to tow it away have they the right to drive it away?

In other words, periodically I get calls at my office with regard to people who are deeply indignant at some arbitrary action in this field, and I am wondering if the hon. Attorney General, apart from commenting on this specific case and whether or not he has a used car licence, could comment on the whole legal aspects of this game of towing cars away.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, first of all I do not believe that the professional tower, if that is what you might call him, needs a used car licence to operate. They do not necessarily deal in used cars.

Mr. MacDonald: Do they need any licence?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I would think not, except a garage licence—I do not know—

Mr. MacDonald: Presumably a garage licence to be able to park them.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Perhaps a garage licence if he keeps the car. But I think there have been a number of these cases taken to court and I think in most cases the man who interfered with the car—who towed it, or kept it, or held it—was found in the wrong, in the nature of a trespass. I have not got a case on my desk but I have read of the cases. I think I would have to say this on the matter of legalities that each case would, I think, depend on its own circumstances, whether there is a contract, whether the car was stored, whether there were storage charges. I think in many cases there is no right whatever for someone just to take a car and tow it off and assert a right of his own volition, pure and simple, of his own assertion. The court, if the case is taken to court, I think in almost every case will say there is no such right. There might be a counteraction of trespass, if the car is put on somebody's private property and left there. But to take that car and assert rights to it, to hold it and tow it, I think is completely out of legality altogether.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I want to get on to a different subject, and I want to discuss for a while the question of coroners in the province of Ontario. This has been a topic about which there has been great public discussion and, I would say, substantial public concern as to whether or not this office has been run as it should be, whether or not there are better ways of running the coroner's office and what those ways might be.

I am certain that the hon. Attorney General is familiar with the report prepared by Mr. Eric Silk, Dr. David Gemmell and Dr. Ward Smith, which dealt with their examination in 1960 of the coroner's office, and the many recommendations that are in that report.

That report runs some 41 pages, and during the immediate session of the Legislature after it was brought in, an Act was introduced amending The Coroners Act. This embodied a number of the recommendations, but not all of them. The next time The Coroners Act was dealt with was in this session of the Legislature, when the hon. Attorney General brought in an amending Act which dealt with two more of the recommendations that are in this report, and some additional ones that are not mentioned.

It is my thought, Mr. Chairman, that the coroner's office has not really been thoroughly examined since Mr. Silk and his committee did it in 1960. The Attorney General did come in with some recommendations. He also picked up a few that were here, and a few that were perhaps obvious on the surface, and incorporated them. I have been through that Act again and we discussed it very briefly on its way through the House. There is nothing wrong in that amending Act, but to my mind, as I tried to indicate on second reading and apparently I was out of order, it falls far short of the real examination of the coroner's department that should take place, and the sort of attention and thinking we must bring to this very important office.

I do not suppose that today in this province we can talk too long about coroners without bringing in the name of Doctor Shulman, because around that gentleman revolves a very substantial amount of controversy. In fact, in his report which he made available, apparently at his own expense—and I am sure the hon. Attorney General has seen a copy of it—he is quite open in his criticisms of methods, procedures and personalities.

I am not going to deal in any great detail with his criticism of personalities, or with his references to particular inquests, but there is one reference here where he refers to comments made by the supervising coroner Doctor Cotnam—I am referring now to page 28 of his report—and also to the deputy Attorney General. He says:

Three days after the hearing of a particular inquest, the supervising coroner stated to the press, in the presence of the deputy Attorney General, the post of chief coroner is superfluous and should be abolished.

Some weeks later the deputy Attorney General announced to the press his plans to abolish the post of chief coroner.

It seems to me that this kind of flying of trial balloons, insofar as the Attorney General's office is concerned, has to stop. If the hon. Attorney General has come to the conclusion that this office is superfluous, then I would think that rather than allowing his officials to make this sort of statement in leaking stories to the press—one of the newspapers featured this at great length and it ran for a day or two, and public opinion grew up—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Is the hon. member suggesting that this was put out by the Attorney General as his opinion through one of his officials?

Mr. Singer: Well—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: If so, I may say there is no basis whatever for it.

Mr. Singer: All right, I accept the hon. Attorney General's statement. The Attorney General is an honourable man and certainly I would not disagree with him, but nevertheless, Dr. Shulman, in his report, refers to two statements, one of which he attributes to the supervising coroner, one of which he attributes to the deputy Attorney General.

One of the Toronto papers featured on the front page a story with banner headlines the suggestion—the writer sits in the gallery up here—that the chief coroner for Metropolitan Toronto was going to be fired. A few days later the hon. Attorney General said he had no intention of doing this.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: This year?

Mr. Singer: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The same day the Attorney General said it, the morning edition said he was going to be fired, and in the House, the first moment when the House sat the same day, the Attorney General said this was pure speculation.

Mr. Singer: All right. Nevertheless, the fact is this writer came back the day after—I did not bother to bring those clippings—and again said that he had information from the Attorney General's department that lent substantial credence to these suggestions, and that it was, in his opinion, the flying of a trial balloon.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I do not know why we must go on with speculation. I cannot control a reporter who wishes to speculate. And if the reporter says he has a source, the only way I know to put an end to that sort of statement is to say to him, "Who was it? Name him." I said that story was the purest speculation.

Mr. Singer: All right. You said that story was pure speculation as far as you were concerned. Do you deny that the statements attributed to the supervising coroner and to your deputy were speculation, or are they factual?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The deputy, I know, never said any such thing.

Mr. Singer: The deputy never said that, so what is on page 28 is in fact wrong?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That is a year ago, is it?

Mr. Singer: No, this is the report which is dated—his last annual report—1964, but was—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Referring to an incident that occurred a year before?

Mr. Singer: He says, "Shortly after the particular inquest." It is the inquest that involves a clinic, yes.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That was a year ago?

Mr. Singer: That these statements were made.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I do not know why we are talking about this at all.

Mr. Singer: My point, nevertheless, is that when senior officials, whether they made these statements a year ago, a month ago, or a week ago—these statements are attributed to senior officials—it would seem to me that somebody, perhaps not my hon. friend, is flying trial balloons. I suggest that you are flying trial balloons because you have not made up your mind which way the coroner's office should be run. No one would say insofar as the role of Dr. Shulman is concerned that he has not brought a new approach to the coroner's office. No one is going to deny, I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that some of the different procedures that he has instigated have released to the public information which, by and large, the public feels it is entitled to. No one can deny, on the other hand, that there has not been some substantial criticism by many people of Dr. Shulman's approach. As a matter of fact, he stirred up a real hornets' nest, and revolving around this whole discussion, Mr. Chairman, I think we have to determine where does the coroner's office go in the future; what is the policy; what is the policy of this government insofar as the future of the coroner's office is concerned.

For instance, does it make sense, Mr. Chairman, that a point that has been argued about for a considerable length of time apparently is decided by a statement of the supervising coroner, and that relates to the right to cross-examine witnesses? We have not heard—or I have not heard—any official pronouncement from the hon. Attorney General that the procedure is going to be changed. By and large, the rule seems to be—and certainly there is nothing in the statutes about it—that the cross-examination of witnesses at coroners' inquests is not allowed. Occasionally, the odd coroner does allow it.

Dr. Cotnam says he decides that a major change in policy is going to be initiated and the lawyers are going to get the right to quiz inquest witnesses. It would seem to me, sir, that this is one of the primary safeguards that should be written into the statutes and it should not be made to depend on the momentary announcement of a governmental official, which has no force or endorsement of statutory authority. It would seem to me, sir, that if this is government policy—and I think it should be—where a person's reputation is at stake there should be a right for that person to appear at a coroner's inquest and to be represented by counsel there and to have the inalienable right to ask, through his lawyer, questions of witnesses who are damaging his reputation.

It may well be—and I suspect that it is if the hon. Attorney General agrees with this—but if this is so, then, sir, I am suggesting it is very wrong.

It is very wrong that the only notification of this change of policy is a statement attributed to the supervising coroner which was in the paper a few days ago, and which may or may not mean that all coroners under his jurisdiction, or all coroners in the province of Ontario, are going to follow this or are not going to follow this. In other words, this is one particular example which leads to the very obvious conclusion, that there should be rules laid down as to how coroners' inquests are conducted and that those rules should be in a statute or in regulations where they can be referred to and where they apply to all inquests.

I suggest that we have not got those; that the rule of conduct of inquests—what did they say about the rule of law?—that it is as long as the chancellor's foot?—the rule of the conduct of inquests is about as long as the coroner's foot and it varies from coroner to coroner and this is not as it should be. It should be the same in Kapuskasing as it is in Kingston and Metropolitan Toronto, and the rules should all be the same. That is point number one.

Then, sir, I note from the press that a story attributed to the hon. Attorney General on May 3, suggests that doctors are not suited—at least this is the head on the story—doctors are not suited to run inquests, and with this I am not in violent disagreement. Reference is made by Mr. Silk and his colleagues in his report, to the system of medical examiners. He came to the conclusion, and I do not share his view, he came to the conclusion in 1960, that the medical examiner system, as it exists in some American jurisdictions, was perhaps not the best system and should not be incorporated into the province of Ontario.

Now, the hon. Attorney General makes the point—and I think there is some substantial validity in it—that perhaps there could well be a legally trained person running these courts. A person who would be more acutely aware of rules and regulations, more acutely aware of statutes, more acutely aware of the common law, and that perhaps the coroner, as we know him today, would become the chief inquisitor, the chief investigator, the chief witness, and generally the person who lays all of the groundwork.

I think there is some very substantial merit in this, but it surprises me, Mr. Chairman, that this sort of a statement—if it represents the hon. Attorney General's thinking, and I think it is important that we know his thinking—is just sort of thrown off at random. If the hon. Attorney General thinks this is valid, or thinks an inquiry into this sort of approach is a valid one, then I would think that he should come to us here in the House and say that he has grave doubts about the present functioning of the office. That maybe one of the improvements we could make is this one, or that one or another one, and we are going to go off and we are going to set up machinery whereby we are going to reorganize the office of the coroner.

I would far rather see the coroner's office run from within this House, the way it should be, than run by newspaper stories—and I think this is a very important point—rather than run by newspaper stories on the hon. Attorney General's views; rather than run by newspaper stories about whether or not lawyers are going to have the right to cross-examine; rather than run by newspaper stories about somebody's opinion about the chief coroner in Metro. I think pronouncements of this sort, which are very, very important, Mr. Chairman, should be made within the context of legislative responsibility and I am suggesting that they are not made within the context of legislative responsibility.

Mr. R. A. Eagleson (Lakeshore): You want managed news, do you?

Mr. Singer: No, I do not want managed news, my friend. What I am suggesting is that when the government sees fit to change a policy or to improve a policy, it should do it within the context of legislative responsibility. I do not think that it lies within the mouth of a governmental official to throw out an idea saying that he thinks that maybe it will be an improvement.

This is a very serious matter we are dealing with and if the hon. Attorney General and those responsible with him have come to the conclusion that there is a better way of doing things, then with all of the power and authority that they have vested in them, they should say that in their opinion this is the way it should be and this is the way it is going to be. I object very strongly, to persons in this position who cannot speak.

The hon. Attorney General would like on occasion—upon many occasions—to say what is his opinion on many things, but in his position as the first law officer of the province, whenever he makes a pronouncement in public, fortunately or unfortunately, it has a tone of authority, as it should have. The only way the Attorney General can avoid that is not to make these statements in public because when the present occupant of the office makes a statement and the press are there and take it down, it seems to have—naturally it seems to have because he is the responsible Minister—a very definite tone of authority. The same follows with his deputy and the same, I think, follows with the supervising coroner in so far as statements that relate to that office.

If the supervising coroner wants to go off and talk about used car dealers or something else, perhaps he could be regarded in that instance as venturing a private opinion. But when he talks about his office, then I think he appears to be at least talking with some public authority about an office with which he is concerned and unless he means it, unless this is going to be policy, then I do not think it should be said.

This brings me to the ultimate point, my real suggestion insofar as to how we are going to handle the coroner's office. To my mind, sir, there is a real problem in separating the whole coroner's office from political control—from the control of the Attorney General who is elected as a political person.

How do we avoid this? Is there a way? I think, Mr. Chairman, that there is a way of avoiding this. There is a bill in my name standing on the order paper about an ombudsman, or parliamentary commissioner—and my general theory—insofar as an ombudsman or parliamentary commissioner is concerned in relation to administrative problems and the difficulties people get themselves involved in dealing with an administrative board—is that the province of Ontario should appoint a parliamentary commissioner, who has the same sort of independence as the provincial auditor has; who is in fact that appointee, not of the government, but the appointee of the Legislature. This man—if he is appointed, and I hope some day he will be—would be independent and as far removed as he could be from the day-to-day political influence that could otherwise be attached to him if he came under the control and under the aegis of a political appointee, such as my hon. friend, the Attorney General.

So, Mr. Chairman, it would be my feeling, my very strong feeling—and I put this forward as a concrete suggestion—that we need someone holding the coroner's office as removed as he can be from even the suggestion of political interference; that this man could well be an ombudsman for investigating deaths, or an ombudsman for deaths.

It is in the public interest—in the real public interest—that when a death has taken place under the circumstances that are enumerated under section 7 of the Act—the suspicious ones in public institutions and jails and so on, all through all those enumerations—there is not only a curiosity, but a public concern that if there is anything wrong with the circumstances surrounding that death, that it be fully and completely investigated.

We do not have time, sir, in this important office to engage in the clash of personalities that has so obviously existed between the chief coroner of Metropolitan Toronto, the supervising coroner, and probably officials in the hon. Attorney General's department.

It would be my thought that this coroner should have the same sort of role that the provincial auditor has, or that the ombudsman for administrative matters would have; that he could be and would be the appointee of the Legislature in the same sense that the provincial auditor is or the ombudsman would be if my Act is adopted, that he would mandatorily report every year to the Legislature. The Legislature could every year review his appointment and review his report, and the Legislature would have the power to hire that man or to fire that man. It seems to me, sir, that we must bring some order out of the chaos in this important office.

The whole complexion of the office has changed since the advent of the chief coroner of the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto. Certainly much good has come from his advent and many people have suggested there are some things wrong with his advent. I notice that my colleague, the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Sopha), quoted in the papers today as he made his submission to Chief Justice McRuer, criticizes some of the things that have gone on in some of the inquests in which this gentleman was concerned. I am not without criticism, either—it is not all black and it is not all white—but I think he has brought a new approach, and I think it is a new approach that is important to the people of Toronto.

It is my thought, Mr. Chairman, that we have to examine the office of coroner thoroughly in the province of Ontario. I think the difficulty is in the possibility of political influence swaying him, the possibility of political influence interfering with his apparent independent duty, the same as with a magistrate or with a judge. If somebody wants to come here after this system begins and say, "We don't like the chief coroner for Metro," or "We don't like the supervising coroner," he should be available for criticism in the same way as these other officials.

But in the meantime and within those terms of reference it is my suggestion that we have a coroner who could be called an ombudsman for deaths, who would and should be politically independent and would carry on with his duty subject to regular reviews by this legislative assembly.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I would just like to say a word about the matter that the hon. member has been discussing, that of coroners. I would say this first of all, that on March 22 this year in this House I introduced a bill to amend The Coroners Act. The bill received first reading, and at that time I said—I would just like to read again what is in Hansard:

Mr. Speaker, to give the House an explanation of the purpose and intent of this bill, I think I should say that considerable study has been going forward with respect to The Coroners Act and the coroners' procedures generally. This is now before the law reforms commission out of which may come a different procedure or re-writing of the Act. That remains to be seen. This Act simply defines certain additional powers or limits, or extends certain powers with respect to the supervising coroner and other procedures with respect to the holding of coroners' inquests.

By that I intended to convey to the House that the whole matter of the coroner's office and the coroner's inquest was a subject of study, and actually I tried perhaps to indicate that it had been receiving study in my office. Then we felt perhaps we should have the benefit of the law reform commission study.

I have been correctly quoted in the papers and I believe on other news media as saying that I think there is a good deal of merit in the medical examiner's system, and I said, with much respect to my friends of the medical profession, that they do not always turn out to be the best people to conduct what should be a rather judicial procedure. They do not observe the necessary correct rules of evidence, they do not see that the proper questions are asked, or perhaps they permit questions to be asked that should not be asked. In the medical examiner's system a medical person says, "Here is a death, there may be misfeasance, there may be intent, there may be malfeasance, there may be criminal negligence," or something of this sort, but when the inquiry starts it is conducted by a magistrate in a court. I think there is some merit in this and it is being studied.

I do not want to stand in this House and criticize officials of my department or any department because they may sometimes err—and sometimes this happens—in making a statement that I think with the best of intent may verge into the area of policy. There are ways of controlling this thing and if it becomes a serious matter I am not unaware of how to contend with it and how to take care of it, but generally we do not have too much trouble. I think a coroner outlining what he thinks might be a procedure in a court may be laying down something that perhaps just indicates what I have been saying—trying to state legal rules which may not apply. As a matter of fact, just to clear this point, the right of a person and a witness in the court to examine or to cross-examine in a coroner's inquest, which is not an accusatory court, does not exist.

Mr. Singer: Maybe it should—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I have just been handed a note by the law officers of my department that in a recent case in the Supreme Court of Canada—I have not seen this myself—it was held that the provisions of a Saskatchewan Act relating to the admissibility of evidence in this type of inquiry was ultra vires, that this is a criminal matter when you are looking into an inquiry which may have criminal aspects in a coroner's inquest, and that the rules of evidence are federal rules. This is apparently what this case held. I would think anyone saying "I am going to lay down a procedure," who is not a judge or a legal gentleman, may be outside of his field.

Mr. Singer: That is my very point.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I must say I agree with the hon. member, that there are rules, there are lines within which policy should go and be determined and that is at the ministerial level. This I want to make very clear, however: I do not understand him, I do not think I understand him. I was going to say that if I did understand him I would disagree that there is any political interference, so far as I am aware, by coroners. I do not know where politics reaches out and touches coroners. I am unaware of it, at least as coming from this ministry to the supervising coroner, chief coroner or coroner whatever-he-may-be. I do not know of politics or political interference as the hon. member used it, where he fears it or where he finds it. I know of no instances of it.

Whether an ombudsman—or a parliamentary commissioner, or call him what you will, fits into our type of government at all or not is another question. I will not debate it at this moment, but to say that because he would take over the coroner's type of service I do not think makes him any less political, if there is politics here, and I do not see it. I just do not accept, I just reject the idea that there is any politics or political interference or political influence reaching down to the coroners. I do not find it. That is all I would say.

Mr. Singer: Just in very brief answer to my hon. friend I suggest that all of the trial and tribulation and discussion about the merits or demerits of the chief coroner for Metropolitan Toronto seems to revolve around his opinion of how things should be done, which occasionally flies in the face of other opinions of what should be done. The criticisms that have been made of him by other officials, who are political officials in the sense that they are the hon. Attorney General's servants—the hon. Attorney General is responsible for them—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Both the chief coroner and the supervising coroner of course are my responsibility.

Mr. Singer: That is right, that is right.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: But because they take contrary or differing viewpoints at times, whether for good or bad, for better or for worse, I do not think this is political in-fighting at all.

Mr. Singer: My hon. friend and I are not ad idem, as we say, on the meaning of the word "political." I used it in my remarks on February 9, and when the hon. Attorney General was introducing his estimates—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I commented on that; when I introduced my estimates I said I had no politics in this department.

Mr. Singer: Yes. Without repeating that same view that I have at any great length, there can be good politics and bad politics. I am merely suggesting, and I repeat this, I feel it very strongly, that when the hon. Attorney General, who is a political appointee, makes a decision, albeit how good it is, he is making a political decision. He could make bad political decisions and he has shown an abhorrence to making many bad political decisions. I commend him so far as the registry offices were concerned, and I commended him for it; instead of bringing in outsiders he has recognized the ability of deputy registrars and has promoted them. That is a political decision but it is a good one and he deserves to be commended for it.

What I am suggesting now is that as long as the tight control of the coroner's office remains a political control—and I am not necessarily suggesting that this means that the politics of anyone in that office is Conservative, Liberal or NDP—it is a political decision and there is this sort of conflict that the sort of freedom that could and should be attached to the coroner's office, in the same way that it is attached to the provincial auditor's office, is not there. It is my very strong feeling that rather than giving the Attorney General anything more to say about the coroner's office, the coroner's office should be in the same category as the provincial auditor's office—that the coroner should be the subject of the legislative control, that he should be appointed after a vote in the Legislature, that he should be given his duties, and that he can only be removed after the Legislature has decided that he should be removed. I suggest that a group of officials who perform this sort of function, have to be put into that position so that those offices can be properly run. In that sense, I was using the word "political" and I think this is an intelligent suggestion and one that should commend itself to the hon. Attorney General. Certainly it needs no prophet to see that not only have we had serious trouble in this office, but unless some drastic step is taken to improve the running of the office and, if nothing else, the personality problem is worked out, we are going to have continuing trouble in that office. Some different approach has to be taken.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Chairman, during the debates of the estimates of The Department of Reform Institutions I raised certain questions about an inquest which took place in Guelph on September 9—an inquest concerning the death of Ronald Cross of Belleville.

Cross had been an inmate of the Guelph reformatory, and he died of heart failure on his way in from work on August 20, 1964. The inquest was called; it took place on September 9, 1964. I think the case was prepared by Guelph lawyer, J. M. Kearns, who—we learned from the report in the Toronto Telegram of April 3—at 87, is the oldest Crown counsel in the province. The verdict at that time was that there had been no negligence, as far as the evidence showed, on the part of the reformatory staff.

Certain questions were raised, Mr. Chairman, and at that time the Minister said this—page 1889 of Hansard—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: —I am saying that if you are not satisfied with the coroner's inquest, and the way it was handled, take it up with the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Wishart). He is competent to answer these questions and I am not.

During our questioning of that inquest, this was the answer: That this was properly a matter of the Attorney General's department. We accepted that as proper, and so at this time we raise the matter to try to find some of the answers.

The questions we raised were primarily those concerning the conduct of the inquest; the lack of witnesses and the lack of certain evidence that we felt should have been presented.

On page 1892, Mr. MacDonald is quoted as saying this:

Mr. Chairman, the reason I rise at this point is that I would like to add one other aspect here with regard to the rather puzzling fact that key people were not called as witnesses. I received information a few days before this coroner's jury inquest was held, and as a result of that, I called Dr. Cotnam and informed him that it had been suggested to me that all of the evidence would not be put before the coroner's jury. I suggested that with this forewarning, word could be passed on to the coroner who was involved so that he would be sharply alerted to make certain that every conceivable witness who might be in a position to contribute relevant evidence would be called.

I got a call back, either from Dr. Cotnam or somebody in his office, I cannot quite recall that aspect of it now, indicating that anybody who wanted to come, could testify. I suggested in a return call to Dr. Cotnam that this was not good enough, there are some people who are not free to come, for a variety of reasons. I said, I repeat once again, the coroner who is going to be responsible for this inquest knows in advance that there are some people who believe that all of the witnesses are not going to be called.

And then again on page 2004 of Hansard, a letter which was read by the hon. member for Riverdale (Mr. Renwick) into the record at that time from Patrick Lindsay, a one-time custodial officer in Guelph. He says:

With reference to the news media in regards to the death of an inmate last year, it is true that all witnesses were not called. I, for one, was involved. I cannot, due to my oath, elaborate further. I did, however, deliver to the Attorney General's secretary on or about November 9, 1964, private and confidential information pertaining to this case and other conditions. There was further correspondence between myself and the Attorney General plus two telephone conversations. This honourable gentleman thanked me for this information and asked my permission to turn it over to the Minister of Reforms. I complied with this request.

Using just a small excerpt here, Hon. Mr. Grossman, on page 2006, is quoted as saying:—conducted the inquiries and investigated every charge made in the letter, with the exception of one concerning the evidence given or withheld at the inquest into the death of an inmate, which he was instructed to lay in the area of concern of the Attorney General.

So, evidently, this matter was placed squarely before the Attorney General, and it is a matter for him to deal with.

There are several questions which we raised and which I will repeat to the hon. Attorney General. On page 34 of the transcript of the inquest, I find these words:

This is the superintendent speaking and he said: "The report states that a couple of weeks ago the above-named inmate asked me for a work board out of the kitchen. He said he hated working inside and that he wanted on the main work party. He was returned to the main work party and that was the final dealing I had with him."

That is May 26. That is page 34 of the evidence. Then when I turn to page 1888 of Hansard, I find that the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions says this, speaking of Cross:

He was not put in detention until, on August 10 and 11, he was brought before the superintendent on the two consecutive days on a series of charges, such as gambling, possession of contraband, and possession of money.

The superintendent's evidence says that he did not see him. The last dealings he had with him would be in May. The hon. Minister says that August 10 and 11 he was brought before the superintendent on two consecutive days on a series of charges.

I understand that in an institution of this kind, the superintendent or his deputy is the one who sentences inmates to detention of this kind and also releases them, and then one of these people is supposed to visit these detention areas each day. The question arises naturally as to who did sentence Cross to detention, who released him and who did visit him during this period, if the evidence given in the sworn statement before the inquest is correct.

The family was not notified of this inquest and here again questions arise. On page 1890, in a statement, the hon. Minister says:

I think the institution felt that the family would have been subpoenaed by the Crown attorney and expected that they would have been there. Mr. Harloff, the assistant superintendent, attended the funeral with the family and spoke to the parents. He took it for granted that the Crown attorney or the coroner would have informed them of the inquest.

On page 35 of the evidence we find this statement:

The Coroner: You don't know whether his mother knows of this inquest being held?

This is the superintendent:

A. No, personally I do not. I just didn't think of it. I didn't know if we should. I just didn't think of it. It might have been an oversight on my part.

This would almost indicate that the superintendent, or the department in this case, was indicating who should be called to the inquest, and here the admission is that it is an oversight on the part of the department.

Q. Under normal circumstances, all those acquainted with it, they turn up at these inquests?

A. Well, if there is anything, I did not think of it. The people in Belleville, they are in Belleville and they are in straitened circumstances.

Then who did decide who was to be called to the inquest? Who decided what witnesses should come? Who decided whether the parents should be notified of this inquest or not, and why was the warning, issued by the hon. member for York South to the supervising coroner, ignored?

During the course of the inquest other things were noted by us as we brought this to the attention of the House. Ronald Cross was in detention for several days prior to his death—in detention on a limited diet with limited exercise, and naturally this would mean that violent exercise following this might have some adverse effect. No mention was made of this at the inquest. No witnesses who were acquainted with this fact were called. No evidence was submitted about a medical problem that he had in detention.

The hon. member for Riverdale and I talked to Dr. Mellow in regard to this and he told us that he had prescribed for a stomach ailment during the period that Cross was in detention, that Cross had evidently come to the hospital, had been given the medication and had been returned. Then we asked the question as to whether any careful diagnosis had been made at that time to make sure that the pain reported was indeed indigestion, because a pain in the chest can be a variety of things. There certainly was a record of Cross's problem as far as the heart was concerned. His mother said that they had notified the institution. She says, according to a report in the Telegram on April 3:

The mother of an inmate of the Guelph Reformatory, who died while returning from a work gang assignment, charged last night that officials knew full well her son had a dangerous heart condition. "We also told the parole board that he couldn't do any strenuous work when we applied for his release last July."

She was anxious for investigation into this and Mr. Cross was, too. He said he would like to have investigated fully the circumstances of his son's death but could not, because of a lack of money. An investigation, he said, would not help bring Ronnie back but maybe some other boys might get the good of it. And so the question emerges as to why no mention was made of this problem which occurred just days prior to the boy's death.

We raise the question, too, as to why the records were not called for about the treatment given Cross from time to time, especially during that period of detention. We also pointed out that there was a statement by Cross's mother that Grant Wiltshire of Belleville, who had also been an inmate at the same time and who had been on the work gang that afternoon with Cross, said that Cross had complained about trouble that afternoon, just prior to his death. Whether Wiltshire conveyed this to other people or not, or whether those complaints were heard by others in the work gang, or whether Cross himself asked those in charge of the work gang to excuse him because of his trouble, we do not know because no witnesses were called—no witnesses from the work gang and as far as the custodial officer in charge of the work gang was concerned, he was not asked about this aspect of the situation.

We put these questions before you, Mr. Attorney General. The questions I have asked are very simple ones and I think call for a straightforward answer. Who decided what witnesses should be called and how were these decisions made? Why were the parents not notified of the inquest? Why was no mention made of Cross being in detention for several days prior to his death? Why was no evidence submitted about his medical problem while in detention? Why was no inquiry made as to whether a careful diagnosis was made at the time to make sure that the pain reported was indeed indigestion? Why were no records called for as to the medication given Cross from time to time, especially during that period of his detention? Why was no inquiry made as to whether Cross complained of trouble on the day he died, particularly in view of the statement his mother made about the information she received from Wiltshire? Why were the inmates working with Cross on August 20 not called as witnesses, and why were the custodial officers who dealt with Cross during his detention not called? And above all, why was the letter, or the information conveyed to the hon. Attorney General by Mr. Lindsay, evidently ignored in connection with this case and a warning issued by the hon. member for York South to the supervising coroner discounted and also ignored?

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the decision that was brought down by the jury in the case of the death of Ronald Franklin Cross, was based on very limited information. It was based on the evidence of witnesses who were called; but many witnesses were in close contact with Cross during the period of his sickness and death, and many witnesses who might have been called and certainly must have been known by The Department of Reform Institutions as closely connected with this, were ignored and not called to that inquest.

And so, Mr. Chairman, we place this before the hon. Attorney General; it has been placed on his doorstep by another department of his government and so we bring it to him and ask that at this time, he give us answers to the questions that we have asked.

I notice in the Toronto Daily Star of April 3, that the hon. Attorney General is quoted as saying that he would consult with the supervising coroner about the case of Ronald Franklin Cross to see if evidence should have been produced which was not presented, and the Star report goes on to say:

Mr. Wishart said that if preliminary study shows that charges of a New Democratic Party critic have substance, his department would conduct a full-scale investigation.

Certainly, in light of the facts that have been brought before you this afternoon, Mr. Minister, it seems to me that a full-scale investigation is called for and that such an investigation should be undertaken without delay.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I have a very complete file on this matter, including the very voluminous report of the supervising coroner, Dr. Cotnam, which is dated May 10, 1965. I have the statement of the man, Lindsay, apparently the witness who felt he should have been called but who was not called; the report of Mr. Hills, the executive officer, and the transcript of all the evidence; the report of Dr. Wright, the director of psychiatry, and the report of Inspector Duguid of the criminal investigation branch of the Ontario provincial police, and in reporting this to the House I should like hon.

members to know that there has been the most thorough investigation, I think, that the case required. It has been gone into extremely thoroughly as I undertook would be done.

I could put a great deal of this material on the record and I am quite prepared to do so; it will take some time but I think I may say to the House to begin with that I am satisfied there was no serious result occasioned by the failure to call the witness who indicated that he had something to say. The statement indicates that he had nothing which would have added in a material way to the evidence before the jury, both in my view and in the view of other persons who have examined and investigated this case.

It must be admitted that the failure to notify the parents of the inquest is something that I regret; it was something that was an oversight and something that should not have happened. I have no explanation for it: it was just oversight, without any excuse. The parents, however, I would be quick to point out, were notified at the time of the boy's death, which preceded the inquest by some weeks, and they were promptly notified of, and were aware and present at, the funeral arrangements and everything in connection with the death itself.

I think the fact that they were not at the inquest is an oversight which is regrettable, but I do not think it is a matter that they make a great point of.

The fact that evidence was not given at the inquest that the boy had been in solitary confinement for some ten days or thereabouts prior to his death, as indicated in the material I have of the investigation, had no bearing on his death. That is the finding of those who examined him; of those who assessed his condition and I presume if there was any reason to leave that out, it might have been for the feelings of his parents, that he had been in solitary confinement. I mention that in reviewing the matter generally.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think that perhaps the best way to answer the questions which the hon. member for Yorkview has raised, is to read the report of the supervising coroner, and perhaps the statement of Lindsay, to show what content there is to it. The report of the supervising coroner dated May 10, 1965, is addressed to me, as Attorney General, and it reads:

Sir:

As you are well aware, Mr. Donald C. MacDonald, MPP, in a press release of April 2, 1965, stated that vital evidence had been suppressed at the inquest held into the above death—that is the death of Ronald Franklin Cross:

—in spite of the fact that he had twice warned the office of the supervising coroner that evidence might be withheld. I was absent from my office when Mr. MacDonald called. However, Mr. E. J. Hills spoke to him about this matter and attached is a memo from Mr. Hills concerning their conversation and what was done to ensure that all relevant evidence would come out at the inquest, which was held in Guelph on September 9, 1964, with Dr. H. Frank Farmer presiding as coroner, and Mr. J. M. Kearns, QC, in attendance as Crown attorney. The inquest appeared to proceed in a normal manner and I heard nothing further until Mr. MacDonald gave his statement to the press.

Following this, it was decided to check out this whole investigation and inquest thoroughly, in order to satisfy myself whether vital evidence had been suppressed or not. A transcript of the evidence was obtained and reviewed—this, I have here:

—which covered the circumstances leading up to and surrounding the death of the deceased in a thorough manner.

The verdict seemed to be a reasonable one on the evidence given. It should be noted on page 37 of the transcript that the coroner remarked that anyone else present could volunteer any additional evidence, but there was no one else present who had not already given evidence. The inquest date was announced in the local newspaper, the Guelph Mercury, on September 3, 1964, so anyone else could attend and give evidence if relevant.

On Wednesday, April 14, 1965, I proceeded to Guelph with Inspector G. A. Duguid of the criminal investigation bureau of the Ontario provincial police to personally see the living and working conditions in Guelph reformatory and also have an interview with the Crown attorney, the coroner and the officials at the reformatory.

I also examined the deceased person's medical records thoroughly while he was an inmate on this admission and also from a previous admission. I understand Inspector Duguid is forwarding a copy of his report to Mr. Frank Wilson.

From our combined investigation it would appear that the alleged suppression of evidence refers to the fact that the deceased man was in solitary confinement during the week prior to his death to discipline him for repeated breaches of the rules and that this contributed to his death in some manner and these facts were deliberately withheld at the inquest, which is not the case. The evidence was not introduced for two reasons: one, it was not relevant to the cause of death; second, it would cause more unnecessary grief and suffering for his family.

Mr. Bryden: That is the feeblest excuse I ever heard.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, this is the supervising coroner's report.

Mr. Bryden: Well, it is certainly a poor excuse.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Let me place it on the record.

Mr. Bryden: What a suggestion, the fact that a man was in solitary confinement could not possibly have any connection with his death; that is the most ridiculous nonsense I ever heard of.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I suggest that I might be allowed to put this on the record and then leave it open for comment.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, before we go any further, the suggestion that I gave my statement to the press is just another of the many inaccuracies that are emerging. I made no statement to the press. The statement I made was in this House in debate.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I am not aware that the hon. member made any statement to the press.

Mr. Bryden: The man who signed his name to that stands convicted of incapacity for his job.

It being 6 o'clock, p.m., the House took recess.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

Mr. Chairman: On vote 208:

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Chairman, just before six o'clock, I was reading from the report of the supervising coroner, Dr. Cotnam, and I would continue reading from the report:

I examined the solitary cell area thoroughly and I would agree with the coroner that the period of confinement did not contribute to his death since he had no mistreatment there but merely segregation for purposes of discipline.

This is not a dark, miserable dungeon. It is warm, clean and well lighted, and although it is small, it contains a bed, toilet facilities, and there is space to move around. There is a washbasin immediately outside each cell and shower facilities at the end of a series of solitary cells. There is a guard constantly in attendance.

As part of the punishment the food is not as tasty and appealing as in the regular dining room but contains all the necessary calories, minerals and vitamins. If ill, a prisoner may be seen here by one of the attending physicians or may be taken to the hospital examining room. In fact, the deceased person did complain and asked to see the doctor a day or two prior to death and was examined at the hospital and treated for a stomach ailment and had no further complaints.

It has also been alleged that the medical authorities did not examine him properly when he was admitted as an inmate and were unaware of his heart condition and he was therefore allowed to do hard physical labour which eventually precipitated the heart failure and sudden death. These points were covered at the inquest. Medical records show the authorities were well aware that he had some type of heart disease, probably rheumatic in origin, and had advised no strenuous sports and moderate restrictions on physical labour and work. He was therefore assigned to the tailor shop but he requested and begged instead to go with the work party outside, where he preferred to be, and consent was given by the authorities in order to accommodate and satisfy him.

Since he was always a very difficult prisoner to handle and rehabilitate he was given the easiest outside work possible with the work party. He had no further complaints prior to his sudden death while returning to the mess hall for luncheon. I personally observed the work party area, the labour they did, and no prisoner in my opinion is overworked in any manner. This is only moderate physical exercise by comparison to the work produced by our labourers in civilian life today. Prisoners have frequent rests and appear to be enjoying themselves under restricted but necessary circumstances.

The deceased's job was to loosen earth with tools at his own speed, so it could be placed in wheelbarrows and moved a few hundred feet for fill by other prisoners. The deceased did not have to use a wheelbarrow. No easier work was available if the deceased was to be accommodated with work outside, which he requested. In addition, the work day is not lengthy and there are breaks for smoking in the morning and afternoon and nearly two hours off for lunch.

However, the man did collapse and die suddenly while crossing the yard behind the mess hall to come in for luncheon. He had not complained that morning. They do not march to the mess hall, but rather just walk along at a leisurely gait. The doctor in attendance stated in his opinion that the prisoner could do any of this work and walking in spite of his known heart condition.

At the autopsy he was found to be suffering with endocardial fibroelastosis, which is an uncommon heart disease of obscure etiology, which is characterized by marked weakening of the lining and muscles of the heart with subsequent enlargement and eventual heart failure. Death may come about slowly, similar to other types of heart disease and failure, but sudden death is not uncommon even while at rest.

This disease has been encountered within several members of the same family which is an interesting point in this case. It is our understanding now, but not known prior to this death, that a teenage brother of the deceased dropped dead suddenly of heart failure due to the same pathological condition, while sitting quietly in a chair in the kitchen of his family home.

It is true that the doctor at the reformatory did not diagnose this precise pathology prior to death, but did make a tentative diagnosis of rheumatic heart disease, which may produce somewhat similar symptoms and signs. Endocardial fibroelastosis is not common. Frequently the condition is not accurately diagnosed during life. Even if it had been precisely identified before death, it is not likely that the doctor would have advised anything different with respect to his activities, which were already minimal since those afflicted may die while sitting or walking or even while lying in bed.

In my opinion, he suffered no mistreatment by the guards or senior officials while in custody which might have contributed to his death, or any neglectful or negligent treatment by the doctors at the reformatory under the existing circumstances—taking into consideration the fact that all prisoners, of necessity, must be treated and handled somewhat differently than free citizens in ordinary life, and also the additional fact that the deceased prisoner had always been a difficult person to handle and rehabilitate.

I am not aware of any other allegations of evidence being suppressed, or if any others should arise I would be pleased to check them out in an impartial and objective manner. Undoubtedly the parents and the next of kin should have been notified of the date and place of inquest well in advance. This was not done and was simply a careless and unintentional error. This has happened in previous cases and steps are being taken immediately to prevent a repetition.

Pursuant to section 17 of The Coroners Act, the Attorney General may order a second inquest if the first one has been improper or evidence has been suppressed or the cause of death was not determined accurately, etc. However, in the light of my present knowledge none of these conditions exists and in my opinion a second inquest would serve no useful purpose.

For your information and comments or instructions,

Yours truly,

H. B. COTNAM, MD,

Supervising Coroner for Ontario.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to refer to the report of the officer who investigated, Inspector Duguid of the criminal investigations branch. I may read a considerable part of this, but possibly or not necessarily all of it. The report is dated April 21, 1965:

Memorandum to the assistant commissioner, provincial police, special services division, re Ronald Franklin Cross, inmate of the Ontario reformatory, Guelph, Ontario—deceased:

With reference to the marginally noted, the following is submitted for the information of the supervising coroner of Ontario, Dr. H. B. Cotnam. On Tuesday, April 6, 1965, on the instruction of the chief superintendent, D. A. Nichol, I attended at the office of Dr. H. B. Cotnam, the supervising coroner for the province of Ontario, regarding assistance to that office. I was advised by Dr. Cotnam that as a result of the death of Ronald Franklin Cross, an inmate in the Ontario reformatory at Guelph, Ontario, on August 20, 1964, an inquest had been held by Dr. H. F. Farmer, coroner, Guelph, Ontario, in the city of Guelph, on September 9, 1964.

It was learned that several days prior to the inquest, the office of the supervising coroner had been advised by Mr. Donald C. MacDonald, MPP, leader of the Ontario New Democratic Party, that evidence would be suppressed at the forthcoming inquest. Mr. MacDonald was invited to have his client attend the inquest but the invitation, apparently, was not accepted.

Investigation revealed that on September 9, 1964, at the inquest into the death of inmate Cross, there was a total of nine witnesses from the reformatory which included the superintendent and the medical records and supervisory staff. Dr. R. P. Slinger, the pathologist at Guelph, Ontario, also gave evidence.

At the conclusion of the evidence, the coroner, having been forewarned, made special mention of the fact that anyone could testify at the inquest. However, there was unfortunately no one else present.

I presume he means in addition to the jury.

The jury retired for 25 minutes, after which time they returned the following verdict:

"We, the jury, inquiring into the death of Ronald Franklin Cross on August 20, 1964, at the Ontario reformatory in Guelph, find from evidence submitted that death was caused by abnormal heart condition, that officials of the institution were aware of the health condition and everything possible was done for his welfare, and that there was no indication of any neglect on the part of the officials."

Nothing further was heard of this matter until Donald C. MacDonald, MPP, raised the issued of suppressed evidence in the Legislature, and it was fully covered in the local news media beginning on April 2, 1965, and being covered daily for some time.

On Thursday, April 8, 1965, county Crown attorney J. M. Kearns, coroner Dr. H. F. Farmer, assistant superintendent E. J. Harloff, clerk of records R. Nash, and provincial constable J. Pitts of the Guelph detachment, who assisted in preparing the inquest, were all interviewed. On Monday, April 12, 1965, during a meeting with F. L. Wilson, assistant deputy Attorney General, and Dr. H. B. Cotnam, it was suggested that Mr. Patrick Lindsay, ex-guard at the Ontario reformatory, should be interviewed. It was alleged that Mr. Lindsay had informed Mr. MacDonald about evidence that would be suppressed at the inquest. It was also suggested that the area at the reformatory where inmate Cross had been employed, and the detention area he had been confined in as punishment four days prior to his death, be examined.

On Wednesday, April 14, 1965, in company with Dr. Cotnam, I proceeded to Guelph, where we interviewed Mr. Kearns, Mr. Harloff, medical staff at the reformatory, and examined the medical records. The work area where Cross had been employed was viewed, the method of returning inmates from the work area to the main building was observed, and the detention cell examined. At this time nothing was found which could be construed as harmful to the health of an inmate.

On Thursday, April 15, 1965, I again proceeded to Guelph where I interviewed Mr. Patrick Lindsay, 39 Dublin Street, who had been formerly employed at the Ontario reformatory as a guard. Mr. Lindsay agreed to give a statement which he dictated. In this statement, he relates the facts of having taken inmate Cross to the reformatory hospital on August 14, 1964, from the detention cell. He relates certain symptoms exhibited by the inmate which alarmed him. It is further stated that he felt he should have been called at the inquest and that the inquest should have been made aware of the confinement of inmate Cross in detention cells.

The facts of this visit to the hospital by Cross were documented on his personal records, and diagnosed as a gastric complaint, which was treated. No further complaint was heard from this inmate.

In dealing with Mr. Lindsay, it is difficult to ascertain whether or not he was using this matter and the attendant publicity as a means of embarrassing The Department of Reform Institutions and the senior officers of the reformatory, as he apparently was in conflict with them on numerous matters.

It is at present felt that no evidence was omitted or suppressed at the inquest that would in any way be relevant to the circumstances surrounding the death of inmate Cross.

Find attached copy of the statement of Mr. Lindsay.

And I think perhaps, Mr. Chairman, I shall read this:

Statement of Patrick Lindsay, dated April 15, 1965: Patrick Lindsay, 39 Dublin Street South, Guelph, Ontario.

On or about August 14, 1964, at approximately 10 a.m., while directing the cleaners in the detention cells, I was called by an inmate who was holding the bars of his cell with both hands. This inmate seemed to have difficulty breathing, said he had a severe pain in his stomach, and asked me to call the doctors.

I felt alarmed due to the symptoms and phoned the tower. I was informed by the person on the phone to call the hospital. I complied with this order, and was connected with who I believe was Miss Kruspe, the nurse. This person directed that I bring the inmate up to the hospital.

I checked the name on the cell sheet and informed the guard in charge of detention that I had permission to take the inmate to the hospital. On the way from the detention cells to the hospital I had to stop once and again walk at a slow pace due to the difficulty this inmate was experiencing from what he stated was a stomach pain.

When I brought him to the hospital, the guard who let me through the grill was Mr. Meyers. I informed nurse Kruspe that this was the inmate from detention, should

I wait to take him back, and she replied no, he would have to see the doctor. I returned to detention.

I thought nothing further of this incident until I heard the inmates and guards discussing the death of this inmate and I realized this was the man who I had brought from detention.

I felt that I would be called to the inquest and was surprised when I was not called. I felt that the inquest should have been made aware of the fact that the inmate had been in detention in the week before his death. This would be due to confinement and abnormal diet during detention. Some time before the inquest I received a telephone call from Mr. Donald C. MacDonald inquiring what I knew about this matter. I told him that I was involved and expected to be called at the inquest.

This is typewritten, signed "P. F. Lindsay."

Mr. Chairman, in the transcript of the evidence, I would like to make some brief reference to certain excerpts—and this is the complete transcript. I would ask that it be noted that there were called as witnesses Robert Nash, clerk of the records of the prisoners; Sergeant S. W. Richardson, who was in charge of the main working party with which the deceased was working the day of his death; Mr. L. C. Yeo, the custodial officer; F. Cook, another custodial officer; Sergeant Corcoran, another custodial officer; E. J. Harloff, the assistant superintendent; Dr. G. A. Mellow, the senior medical officer; Dr. Marcinkovsky, a physician; Dr. Slinger, the pathologist, and Charles Sanderson, the superintendent of the institution.

In the evidence of Sergeant Richardson, on page 5—the questions are not numbered but at line 16, the question is:

Q. What time would you start work with them?

And he mentioned there were 77 in the work party.

A. In the afternoon, they would be broken off to work at approximately 1:30, 15 minutes' smoke break at three o'clock. We would start to reassemble in our group to return to the institution.

Q. What kind of work were they doing on that particular day?

A. They were moving land fill from the gravel pit area, so-called, to a stockpile. This inmate in question was loosening up the dirt for those who were taking it away in wheelbarrows to remove it.

Q. Loosening it up?

A. Loosening it up with pick and shovel to make a convenient heap for the boys with the wheelbarrows to load and take it away.

Q. He really wasn't wheeling.

A. He wasn't wheeling away, no. Those that do this type of work, on this day, the work, can more or less set their own pace, in that so long as they have sufficient dirt kept ahead, if they want to sit down and take five, as it were, they can.

Q. How long roughly had they been with this work party?

A. In this instance, almost three months.

Q. Any complaints from him at all about the work?

A. No complaint about the work.

Q. What time did they break off on this day, the 20th?

A. They started to break off and line up at approximately a quarter after four. It was precisely 19 minutes after four when we moved off from the work area to return to the institution.

The witness Cook was asked, on page 10, line 6:

Q. And did Mr. Yeo call you up?

A. As the gang kept moving in and I got closer I saw him lying on the ground. Mr. Yeo and I, we moved him off to the side so as to allow the gang to go through without jumping or running around.

Q. Was he able to say anything?

A. No.

Q. Did he ever complain to you about anything?

A. No, sir.

I think the medical evidence, and that might perhaps complete what I would wish to put on record.

This is the evidence of Dr. Marcinkovsky and I should like to read very briefly from it, Mr. Chairman. He was questioned by Mr. Kearns, the Crown attorney, at page 19.

Q. How long have you been a medical officer at the Ontario reformatory?

A. Since March 31, 1956.

Q. Eight years ago?

A. Yes.

Q. And you are duly qualified here in the province of Ontario?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you examine this young man Cross when he was admitted in October last year?

A. Yes.

Q. Have you got your examination there?

A. Yes.

Q. Tell the jury what your examination was and what it consisted of. Have you got your report?

Dr. Marcinkovsky refers to his file and wanted it to go in as an exhibit.

Q. What did it say?

A. I usually ask first to recall all about the previous sicknesses, operations, accidents and so on. He first told me he hadn't any sickness at all. After examination when I was listening to his heart I noticed that he was not completely well as it should be. There was nothing striking. Then I tried to pursue the history about the shortness of breath but he admitted he does a little bit——of shortness of breath.

I think it means "has" a little bit:

After exertion, I asked him, in comparison to other boys the same age and so on, doing the same job of exercise? He said yes, he thinks he is shorter of breath than anyone else and I marked that here.

Indicates on the report of examination:

I marked here, shortness of breath and then at heart, I found there were no murmurs, there was some indication of heart disease. I tried him at the exercises, like running for a little while on the spot. I listened to his heart. I found some slight murmurs but I put here in my finding, I found that under rheumatic heart. At the end where we ask disability if any, I put, rheumatic heart condition, mild, fit for general work, fit for moderate work. No competitive sports and no heavy exertion.

He is quoting from his report.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Pick and shovel is not very heavy.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Then there is further evidence of the request by the boy not to serve in the tailor shop but to go back on the job.

I realize, Mr. Chairman, that what I have put on the record has to do with evidence which was given at the inquest and perhaps in a sense does not touch the question of what was omitted. There is a suggestion that some evidence was omitted. Now what I have tried to show to the House is that from the investigation by the police, by the supervising coroner, by the evidence which was presented, that if evidence was omitted,

I feel very firmly of the view that it was not so relevant as to cause a change in the verdict of the inquest. With this, I think, anyone who reads the evidence presented, will agree.

Now, I have this to say, Mr. Chairman. I think it must be borne in mind that the man Lindsay had written to me, as has been related in evidence that has been put on the record in this House before, he had written to me about complaints. I replied to his letter, as he had related, and talked to him on the telephone. His complaints were referred to where I think they belonged, to The Department of Reform Institutions and there they were investigated. I had nothing further to do with the matter.

But he, at this time of his complaining. I believe, was no longer employed at the Guelph reformatory. He had been dismissed, released. He was disgruntled. There is not much doubt of that, I think, in anyone's mind. As the investigating officer says, there would seem to be a question as to whether he was seeking to embarrass officials of The Department of Reform Institutions and certain of the officials at the reformatory.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Why do they question his motives and nobody else's?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Now this is what really gives me cause for concern, that an hon. member of this House, the hon. member for York South, before the inquest was held is told by this disgruntled guard, "There is going to be an inquest and I am not going to be called. I have something to tell." And the hon. member calls the supervising coroner—

Mr. Bryden: Who else?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: —and says there is going to be suppression of evidence.

Mr. MacDonald: Not all the witnesses will be called.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: He gets, not the supervising coroner, I believe an assistant, and he is invited, according to the evidence, to say who is the witness. Who should we call?

How would Dr. Farmer know? I do not know Dr. Farmer, but I presume he is an eminent, respectable, competent medical doctor and a good coroner. How was he to know that this disgruntled gentleman, Lindsay, wanted to be called or had anything to say?

Mr. MacDonald: Would the hon. Attorney General permit me to interrupt? You are making all your comments on the assumption that it was Lindsay that first informed me. This is a conjecture on your part.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, I am going to continue to conjecture on the same basis. I think it was Lindsay. Whoever it was, I think that the hon. member, if he was really interested in making certain that the evidence should come out, should have said, "There is John Doe who has evidence to give, be sure and summon him to attend at the inquest, be sure and subpoena him or bring him forward as a witness to this inquest." This, I think, would have been conduct that the hon. member should have seen fit to perform.

Mr. L. Letherby (Simcoe East): Rather sit back with a dynamite bomb!

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Not only that, Mr. Chairman; perhaps it was not Lindsay that told him, but somebody said, "I know something and I bet you they do not call me." How did the coroner know that Lindsay had anything to say, or anybody else? He calls everybody; nine people from around that area, that working party, the superintendent, the officers, the guards, the custodians, the doctors. He gets the whole story, he brings it out; and the inquest had been published. Notice of the inquest had been published in the Guelph paper. I think it is a daily. In any event, it had been published so that anyone could attend. An inquest is a public and open hearing. There is nothing closed, there is nothing secret about it, all the world may be present.

Now whatever the hon. member may have thought was his duty and his responsibility and the proper conduct for him to perform, if Mr. Lindsay or whoever it may have been had anything to say, he had only to go there and he could have sat and listened at least to see if anything was omitted. He had the full opportunity to go there and talk and tell his story to the world.

When the inquest was about to conclude, the coroner then said, openly in the inquest, and I am reading from the transcript at page 37. Mr. Kearns the Crown attorney had said:

As far as I know that is all the witnesses.

The Coroner: Gentlemen of the jury, under normal circumstances anyone else who is here can certainly volunteer any evidence, anything relating to it. Unfortunately no one else is here today. You have heard the evidence of this man's record at the institution. You have heard the evidence of the pathologist who admits this man's heart was enlarged. He found it difficult to pin it down to anything definite but he knows of similar cases of similar disease. These cases are often similar in type.

This is a doctor, the coroner, addressing the jury. My point is, he said if there is anyone else present, they certainly may give evidence of anything relating to this matter. Then he went on to address the jury and he discussed the evidence of the witnesses. Then the jury brought in the verdict that I previously read.

Mr. Chairman, perhaps the evidence of the unknown, whoever he is, might have been interesting; but the fullest investigation by the supervising coroner and by the police officer of the investigation branch indicates that there was nothing relevant that was omitted from the evidence that was presented to the jury that held this inquest. I say again that I cannot understand why, if it was felt that there was any evidence, why this was conducted in this manner, sitting back and saying, "They will not call me"; and then later on saying that evidence was suppressed. I just do not understand that performance.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Mr. Chairman, would the hon. Attorney General answer two or three questions on this matter?

Did the supervising coroner or the inspector from the Ontario provincial police question Mr. Sanderson, the then superintendent of the Ontario reformatory at Guelph?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: It does not appear, Mr. Chairman, that Mr. Sanderson, the superintendent, was examined by the police officer. Sanderson was called at the inquest, was presented by the Crown attorney, was examined and cross-examined.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, when did the supervising coroner state in his report that Cross appeared to stumble and fall—his report of May 10?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I do not recall that; you mean it was something I read?

Mr. Renwick: Yes, I think you referred to something about lunch time; I am not certain that I heard it correctly.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Oh, you mean at the time of his death?

Mr. Renwick: Yes; there was some statement in the supervising coroner's report.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I read every word of the supervising coroner's report and it is all on the record, but I do not think that the words "he stumbled and fell" are in it at all.

Mr. Renwick: When did it say that he died?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: It just says: "Unfortunately, this prisoner died, but in my opinion he suffered no mistreatment."

Mr. Renwick: Yes, but during the course of the time when he investigated the working party and how the working party functioned—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Oh, yes. "The man did collapse and die suddenly while crossing the yard behind the mess hall to come in for luncheon. He had not complained at that point."

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, the supervising coroner has submitted a report to the hon. Attorney General which is in error on two very simple facts:

1. When the boy died—the boy died somewhere between 4.15 and 4.30 in the afternoon and not at lunch time.

The other fact, Mr. Chairman, is that the supervising coroner's report referred to my hon. leader's release to the press about this matter on April 2, when he did not send anything to the press on April 2 about this matter.

I would say that those two items alone indicate that the supervising coroner's report is not worth anything in establishing the responsibility in this case why there was no disclosure about the detention of this boy in the period immediately prior to his death.

I would ask the hon. Attorney General if the supervising coroner gave any instructions to the, I believe 87-year-old, Crown attorney; or to the practically inexperienced coroner that would lead those persons to do anything to ensure that persons other than those named by the superintendent of the Guelph reformatory would be called as witnesses.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I do not know how the supervising coroner would subpoena witnesses; this is what I fail to understand, how you would subpoena witnesses whose names you are not aware of. Somebody knew about them, but they would not reveal them.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Attorney General, somebody knew the names of the witnesses who were called; somebody told the coroner and the Crown attorney who was to be called. I am quite certain that the Crown attorney did not know all the persons who were called by name, somebody told him.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: This appeared in the report of the police officer. There had been a provincial police officer assigned to get the material for this inquest. This appears, I am quite sure, in the report which I read, and I shall check it again.

Mr. Chairman, I will read again from the report of Inspector Duguid. He says:

On Thursday, April 8, 1965, the county Crown attorney, J. M. Kearns, coroner Dr. H. F. Farmer, assistant superintendent E. J. Harloff, clerk of records, R. Nash and provincial constable J. Pitt, Guelph detachment, who assisted in preparing the inquest, were all interviewed.

Now what would happen in the normal course of events would be: A death occurs, an inquest is ordered, the police officer—in this case an officer of the Ontario provincial police—is asked to investigate and ascertain who should be summoned to the inquest as witnesses. I presume he also may have had some part to play in assisting and serving jurors and that sort of thing. But that is the officer, I take it, who would assist the Crown attorney in preparing the inquest and getting the witnesses.

How he would know how far afield to go, I do not know. It seems to me that everything reasonable was done; but what I still cannot understand is if somebody was standing on the sidelines and saying that he knew something and telling hon. members of this House that he has evidence to give and hon. members call up the supervising coroner's office and say, "Oh ho, there is somebody standing on the sidelines but you are not going to call him."

And they say, "Who is he?"

"Sorry, I cannot tell you." And then come forward in this House and say that evidence was suppressed—this I just cannot believe.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, it is obvious from what the hon. Attorney General has said that the supervising coroner was not in the least bit interested, in making up his report, to determine who the person was who named the witnesses that were to be called at the inquest. The only answer that we are obviously going to get from the hon. Attorney General, and there is no point in labouring the matter any further, is that nobody knows who determined who the witnesses were that were going to be called; we will just drop that particular matter.

Let us just reiterate again that notice of an inquest is published; it is a wide open invitation to the world. A man has been found dead; somebody has died; there is going to be an inquiry so come forward and tell what you know if you know anything.

Mr. Chairman, obviously this is perfectly right and this is a fine generalization; but when a person dies in a penal institution in this province, then the person who determines who the witnesses are going to be in all likelihood is the superintendent. Apparently nobody made the decision this time but the investigating police officer. I gather he must have made up his mind who would be called, but there is no statement from him as to how he determined the witnesses that were going to be called.

So the supervising coroner really was not interested in the question that we raised at all, any more than he was interested, or the Ontario provincial police inspector was interested, in questioning the superintendent of the Ontario reformatory at Guelph. The whole point that we were trying to make in this Legislature—and for my money it does not need to be made any longer in this House—the whole point was that the superintendent of the Ontario reformatory at Guelph was the one who was deliberately controlling this inquest. He not only deliberately controlled it in terms of determining who the witnesses were, but he went so far as—and the hon. Attorney General reiterated this evening that it was not relevant at all that he was in detention—but the superintendent in his evidence felt that it was very relevant to relate practically every incident in the boy's term at the Ontario reformatory at Guelph.

But when it came to the simple facts of the week previous to his death—and when anybody dies certainly these are the hours and days which are of some significance—the superintendent did not choose to make any statement whatsoever about it.

Indeed, he categorically stated in his evidence that after May 26 he had no further dealings with the boy. Yet the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions in reading a report prepared by his staff for submission to this Legislature, said that on August 10 and August 11, the superintendent had in fact seen the boy on relatively serious charges concerning the boy and, my understanding is, ordered that he be placed in detention. Yet the superintendent swore under oath that he had no further dealings with the boy.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member please refer me to the pages in Hansard.

Mr. Renwick: The page in Hansard is page 1888. It seems to me that if the hon. Attorney General were interested, if the supervising coroner had been interested, if the inspector of the Ontario provincial police had been interested in trying to find the answers to the questions that we had placed before them, the obvious place for him to go was to the then superintendent of the Ontario reformatory at Guelph; and he did not choose to do it.

Now, the supervising coroner, as I mentioned in the first place, did not even bother to find out at what time of day the boy died. Similarly, he did not even choose to make certain as to his facts about the statement made by the hon. member for York South.

To my mind, the whole report and all of the explanation given by the hon. Attorney General, despite his obvious attempt to shift the blame to the hon. member for York South, just does not hold water; because there was no answer to any of the questions that we raised.

I would like to also state, Mr. Chairman, that we here did not make any allegation whatsoever about the physical examination of that boy when he was admitted to the institution. There was not anything to answer, we did not make any allegation about that.

The points which the hon. Attorney General has raised in reading these various reports into the record are practically irrelevant so far as the allegations that we were talking about were concerned. I cannot, from my point of view and I am certain from that of other members of this party, and in the view of many of the other hon. members of this House, accept the fact that the supervising coroner's report is worth anything in terms of the points that we raised. I would suggest that it is up to the hon. Attorney General to make certain that the then superintendent of that institution is thoroughly questioned as to the discrepancy in his evidence, and is thoroughly questioned as to why, under oath, he stated he had no further dealings with that boy, when, in fact, he did have further dealings with him on August 10 and August 11. The hon. Attorney General's replies to our inquiries are just not satisfactory.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Just one further point that does seem to me to show an effort here to bring out the evidence. The hon. member for York South spoke to Mr. Hills—

Mr. MacDonald: First to Dr. Cotnam—let's keep the record straight.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: And then to Mr. Hills. Mr. Hills phones Dr. Farmer, the coroner, and says: "We are told there is going to be evidence suppressed, call everyone that you know of, make certain—"

Mr. MacDonald: So there was; what is wrong with that? So there was!

Hon. Mr. Wishart: "—make certain that there was the fullest opportunity and—"

Mr. MacDonald: But information was being suppressed by the people who were there.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: A witness who is known; a witness who it is said has something relevant to say. His name will not even be revealed!

Now, how can anyone with tongue in cheek say: There is a witness who has something to say but we will not tell you who he is; and then get up and say evidence is suppressed?

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Attorney General is engaging in an old Tory tactic: Whenever a matter is under inquiry they try to attack the people who are trying to get at the facts.

An hon. member: What are you engaged in?

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bryden: This is an ancient Tory trick, the old smear campaign directed against the person who is trying to get the facts.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I like it a lot better than the tricks over there.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order, order!

Mr. Bryden: So we might as well just have the record straight.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order, please.

As Chairman I do not profess to be a lawyer, and I am trying to sit here, and sift the evidence and decide where to call or draw the line! Let us deal with the subject in a manner which is conducive to the good business of this House.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, you can easily tell when you have hit a soft spot, a tender spot, because you can hear the howls from all over this House.

An hon. member: But you do not like it.

Mr. Bryden: I know you fellows do not like to listen to the truth at any time.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, the fact of the matter is that the hon. Attorney General in his defence, which I agree was presented with great forensic skill, worked at two things: To discredit a gentleman by the name of Lindsay, whom I personally do not know at all—

Interjections by hon. members.

An hon. member: Your hon. leader phoned him up.

Mr. Bryden: —and to discredit members of this House. This, as I say, is an old Tory tactic, but I want to get on to another aspect of this matter.

The hon. Attorney General says that no evidence was suppressed. I submit to him that it is as plain as the nose on his face that evidence was suppressed. The facts were suppressed that this man had been in solitary confinement for, I believe, five days shortly before his death?

An hon. member: Who said that?

Mr. MacDonald: The superintendent.

Mr. Bryden: Everybody in that institution, certainly the officials in that institution, the people in charge of the medical records and other records knew that; yet they did not bring that fact out. That surely was a relevant fact!

I am not saying that if the fact had been before the coroner's jury it would have found that it contributed to the man's death. I do not know, no one will ever know, because the fact was not before the coroner's jury. But to suggest that it is irrelevant is completely preposterous. That should certainly have gone before the coroner's jury and I am going to suggest to the hon. Attorney General why it did not.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bryden: Everybody in that institution knew about it, and it did not go before the coroner's jury because the officials in charge of the institution did not want it called to the public attention that this form of barbarous punishment is still practised in that institution. Particularly they did not want the public to know that such a barbarous punishment is practised with regard to a man who was known to have a heart condition. That is why it was kept quiet.

Mr. G. H. Peck (Scarborough Centre): Like the people in the NDP—

Mr. Bryden: I know that these people over here consider that solitary confinement is natural and normal.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: May I ask the hon. member a question? Is that all right?

Mr. Bryden: Go ahead!

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Is the hon. member referring to the barbarous treatment as putting a person into solitary?

Mr. Bryden: Yes, sir, I am.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: What would you have done with a prisoner who will not behave himself?

Mr. Bryden: I am suggesting to you that solitary confinement is no answer to a problem, especially with a sick man.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: What would the hon. member do with that man? What would the hon. member do with such a person?

Mr. Bryden: This sort of question—

An hon. member: What would you do?

Mr. Bryden: Present to me all the facts of the man's case, let me go to a psychiatrist and I will give you an answer. But to suggest here that I should now diagnose this man's case is ridiculous, and just another red herring by the government opposite. I am suggesting to them that it is high time that they dispensed with this type of punishment in any institution.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: What type of punishment? Are you talking about solitary confinement?

Mr. Bryden: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: You say we should not have it, is that right?

Mr. Bryden: I am saying you should not have it, that is it exactly.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: All right, I will have to go to Saskatchewan and see how the CCF did it for 20 years. They had solitary confinement and every penal system in the world has solitary confinement.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The hon. member is out of his mind if he thinks he can run a penal system without detention.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, who has the floor? I can see that the hon. Minister of—

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, may I rise on a point of order? A few moments ago you chose to interrupt the hon. member because you thought he was not conducting himself with decorum. Is this continued shouting from here acceptable in the House procedures, or do you crack down only when it happens to be somebody on the Opposition side?

Mr. Chairman: Order, order.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order! I have asked for order on different occasions here and I do not receive it. The member for Woodbine made a statement about some barbaric punishment, and the Minister of Reform Institutions was asked if he could answer a question, which he did. Then the member for Woodbine continued.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, you are ignoring the point I raised. When we are having a debate across the floor of the House are you going to allow all of this noise from the back bench here?

Mr. L. M. Reilly (Eglinton): It is all right when your boys make a noise.

Mr. Chairman: Order, order!

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, just to keep the record straight, when I started to try to answer the question, the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions thereupon took over the floor and tried to occupy it, even though the floor was not his. However, that does not matter to me. I do not care about these ignorant interjections that continue interminably from behind us, and I am quite prepared to let the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions say his piece, although I think it would be better if he waited until I finished.

I think my point has been made, Mr. Chairman. I just want again to emphasize that there was no need for special witnesses for the fact to be brought out that this man had been in solitary confinement. That was known by witnesses who were there. For some reason they did not bring it out, and I am suggesting that it was highly improper that they did not do so.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, my hon. colleagues have been pursuing the details of this case and so I have sat back and let them deal with the details, but I want to come back to a few of the circumstances in relation to the very limited association with this that I have had. When I was informed of the possibility that not all witnesses would be called, I asked the hon. Attorney General not to build his case from poor conjecture as to who it was; there are many guards, and many unhappy guards; there are many people who are not guards in this institution from whom this information could have been got.

I called Dr. Cotnam and I told his office that I was told that not everybody with information that was relevant was going to be called. I did not say "Ah-ha, you are suppressing evidence." Let us not have a coloured story. I was trying, in advance of the event, to make certain that all of the evidence would be there so that it could not be said afterwards that there would be suppression of evidence. It was an effort to assist.

I did not give the names because I was not in a position to give the names, and it is idle, I suggest to the hon. Attorney General, who is a reasonable man, to get up and say that any man who was working in the institution, or any people who were working in the institution, who had not been authorized by the superintendent of the institution, could, in effect, say to the superintendent some afternoon, "Well, that is fine, I have not been called but I think I have got some evidence and I will go down and testify without your authority."

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Why not?

Mr. MacDonald: Why not? Well, let the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions not be so self-righteousness about it.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Is the hon. member for York South suggesting that Mr. Sanderson might have taken disciplinary action against Mr. Lindsay for having offered to give testimony at a coroner's inquest?

Mr. MacDonald: I am not only suggesting, but I am saying it was done.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: That is outrageous. Would the hon. member give us the evidence that that was done?

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, would you please have that hon. gentleman sit down?

The fact of the matter is that the coroner's office was alerted in advance that not all of the evidence was going to be submitted—and to my friend, the hon. member for Russell (Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence), who has lost interest and gone out and said "Who suppressed the evidence?" I would say it is not only that some people who had evidence were not called, it is an even more important factor—that some people who were called, and who gave evidence under oath, including the superintendent of the institution, suppressed evidence. I just ask the House to pause for one moment and ponder that.

It was impossible, absolutely impossible, for the superintendent not to have known that he had had some contact with this boy after May. Indeed, one week before his death he had had him once or twice before him. How conceivably could any man come before a coroner's jury a month after that and say he had had no contact with this boy since last May?

I ask the question, Mr. Chairman, why did the superintendent of the institution, under oath, perjure himself and suppress key information?

An hon. member: How do you know he did?

Mr. MacDonald: I am saying he did. There is no doubt about it.

An hon. member: There sure is.

Mr. MacDonald: Right.

An hon. member: There is doubt about it.

Mr. MacDonald: We now know, Mr. Chairman, there is no disputing this simple fact that the superintendent testified that he had no contact with this boy since May, and it is known, and the hon. Attorney General this evening read into the record, the fact that he had met with the boy, and he had sentenced him into detention. Let that fact sift in for a moment, because if you want to start questioning motives—and I notice the alacrity with which the supervising coroner and many other people are willing to question the motives of Lindsay—when we start to question the motives of anybody else who happens to be on your side of the case as we try to get to the full truth of it here, then the hon. Minister retorts they are honourable men and we are impugning them, we are questioning their reputation. The simple fact of the matter is that the superintendent of the institution perjured himself under oath, by not informing the inquest that he had had some contact with the boy.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: When? I am trying to gather this together and get it clear in my mind.

Mr. MacDonald: Why the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions at this point should have to take any more time to get this basic point, which was pointed out to him when his estimates were before the House and which has been dealt with five times here before, I do not know. The hon. Minister it appears to me is uncharacteristically obtuse at this moment.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Well, tell me now.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I now realize why we need Dr. Shulmans.

An hon. member: Why?

Mr. MacDonald: Because when the supervising coroner in an office which was covering up facts in this province for years, was given an alert to the effect that evidence was not going to be submitted, what did he do? He passed the buck back on to me, but I said to him, "It is not my responsibility because I am not free to name the people who have the evidence." I told him in advance to make certain that everybody was called there, and what happens? I just ask the hon. Attorney General to consider this. They forgot. It was a careless mistake; it was an error. They forgot to call the parents.

Second, we have now the testimony that was carried in the newspapers in defiance of two or three allusions in those reports the hon. Attorney General has, that nobody else had heard any complaints from the boy during that day out on the work gang. One of his friends, who has since been released from the institution and lives in Belleville, has been quoted in the papers as saying that he had heard Gross say a number of times that he was not feeling well that day.

There is another person who might have been called. In other words, the only person who was approached to get some idea of who should be called—the key person—was the superintendent, and that superintendent, according to the record, himself withheld information.

This is the kind of thing which you think you can defend. I repeat, I know now why we need Dr. Shulman, when I pick up a record after Dr. Shulman, for example, has tried to clean up a situation where the establishment in all its ramifications has been covering up the facts until he got the public support back of him in this province, so that this government dares not do anything about it. When I read in the paper, for example, when Dr. Shulman brought out his report—a report which he sent in and which was not sent forward to the appropriate authorities—that Dr. Cotnam is quoted in a headline, "Shulman a swellhead, says Cotnam."

The hon. Attorney General says he is not going to criticize, publicly, people in his department, and he was very wise not to be publicly criticizing his department. But I think it might be appropriate some time soon for the hon. Attorney General to ask Dr. Cotnam to follow the same advice. We need Shulmans to clean up precisely the kind of situation we have got here, because the supervising coroner's office was given some indication that the evidence would be suppressed, yet witnesses were not called, and witnesses who were called suppressed evidence.

Finally, to keep this closed circle beautifully closed, who went up and did the investigation? The supervising coroner. And if I ever read of a whitewash, it is a statement that the hon. Attorney General put into the record this afternoon—a whitewash which is discredited because it reveals it as a typical kind of bias toward an opposition in saying that I ran to the press, or some such comment as that. I did not run to the press. The first comment I made was a two-minute one in this House after my colleagues had put all the details on the record. Secondly, and even more significant, the report is completely discredited because it is factually in error on the key bit of information as to the time that this boy died in the institution.

Here is a man—presumably an authoritative person—who was doing a thorough investigation. He makes a report, comes back, and has even got factual areas—

Mr. Bryden: He has not even got the basic facts right.

Mr. MacDonald: He has not even got the basic facts right as to the time of the man's death. I suggest to the hon. Attorney General that if he will maintain his normal reasoned approach to this, he will have to conclude that this is not a closed area. Indeed, the final and most important thing, Mr. Chairman, is that the supervising coroner and everybody else did not go to the one person to whom the evidence points more and more conclusively as being in control of this situation. In trying to make an investigation, he did not go to that one person, Superintendent Sanderson. He did not even interview him. Surely for the hon. Attorney General to come into this House and say that this is a thorough investigation when it is factually in error, and did not go to the key person whom he should have approached, nothing more need be said. If the Tories want to close ranks and cover this up as they cover up everything else because they have to protect the establishment of which they are a part, fine—we in the Opposition cannot do much about it. But we will get these facts out, and we will document the suppressed evidence which is now on the record.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, I cannot let this occasion go by without defending the reputation of one of the most respected men in corrections in the whole of Canada—Mr. Sanderson, the superintendent. I did not pay attention in the past to the business about whether he had interviewed him after he had said he did not, because at the time you were discussing the matter of the coroner's inquest. It was a matter for another department, particularly when the allegation was that it may prove that there was some dereliction on the part of some officers of my own department. It would have been ridiculous for me to give an opinion on it.

Whether, in fact, Mr. Sanderson has contradicted himself in this particular instance, I do not know—I will go into this a little more tomorrow when I get an opportunity. But to say that he deliberately perjured himself is an outrageous charge to make about an honoured civil servant in this department.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. Grossman: But to suggest that he deliberately perjured himself is, I repeat, outrageous.

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): You read it into the record.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I did not read anything into the record about him perjuring himself. Maybe that is the kind of terminology that the NDP likes to employ, but we do not like to hear it unless you can definitely prove it. Just because a man may—and I have not established that to my satisfaction as yet—he may have contradicted himself in one or two instances on unimportant matters—

Mr. MacDonald: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman! If the hon. Minister has not established the fact, I would suggest that he is premature in coming to all the conclusions—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, it does not take me more than a few minutes to make up my mind that I will defend Mr. Sanderson against the charge that he deliberately perjured himself. That is all I am saying. He would not deliberately perjure himself. He is not that kind of gentleman. Mr. Chairman, the suggestion is that it is an old Tory tactic that if you—

Mr. Bryden: It is.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: You have not even heard what I am going to say.

That it is an old Tory tactic that, in coming to the defence of a member of the civil service, we attack the reputation or sincerity of the person making the charges, or originally was responsible for the charges. I think it is important to establish the credibility of the people involved, and I am going to do that right now about our friend Mr. Lindsay.

I say the NDP has lent itself, wittingly or unwittingly—I am not going to say wittingly, because I do not know that—to a most fantastic conspiracy to destroy the reputation of the superintendent of Guelph reformatory. You never heard of such cloak-and-dagger operations in your life, and I am rather surprised that a couple of the hon. members engaged in this cloak-and-dagger comic opera—

An hon. member: That is their usual procedure.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Let me inform hon. members about this. On April 28, 1964—

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: On April 28, 1964, Mr. Lindsay—

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order! Does the hon. Minister for Reform Institutions always have an opportunity to make statements at times when he has no right to make statements? He made a statement before the orders of the day when he was not subject to being questioned; he is now speaking on a matter which has nothing whatsoever to do with the supervising coroner—

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): You are an uninformed novice, you are.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) wants us to keep to the estimates, I suggest that he should intervene. We are going back and thrashing over a battle with regard to Mr. Sanderson and the reform institution, which has nothing to do with the inquest—

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Who started the inquest? You started it.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Do you rule, Mr. Chairman, that I am in order?

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order! Is the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions in order or not?

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Certainly he is in order; this is the inquest, is it not? The same one you are talking about?

Mr. Chairman: You have made your accusation against the Minister of Reform Institutions, therefore he should have the opportunity to reply.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, what I am attempting to do is to establish the basis for some of these allegations which have been made, and which caused the questioning about the inquest.

On April 28, 1964, Mr. Lindsay wrote the Minister of Reform Institutions with a petition signed by 73 employees out of a total complement of 406, requesting the Minister to meet with them to discuss their wages and related details of unemployment. Later it was found that, except for one or two, those signing the petition were not aware of the contents of the letter, nor the manner in which it was forwarded. They had assumed that the petition would be forwarded to the superintendent or the civil service association, through the branch. Mr. Lindsay was informed that there were established procedures dealing with matters such as the grievance procedure, the departmental council and the civil service association, which is recognized by the government as the official bargaining agent for civil servants.

On November 9, 1964, Mr. Lindsay wrote to the hon. Attorney General, making allegations, inferences and accusations about the operations of the Ontario reformatory at Guelph, as well as its superintendent and other senior officials of the institution.

In this letter he also implied that the Minister of Reform Institutions refused to see him about complaints made in this letter, including the death of inmate R. F. Cross. This was certainly not the case, as only salary and ancillary matters were referred to by Mr. Lindsay to the Minister of Reform Institutions. I received no other complaints from him at that time.

Mr. F. J. Matthews, inspector of prisons, made an exhaustive investigation into the charges made by Mr. Lindsay and found:

1. Mr. Lindsay was not apparently concerned about the possibility of being dismissed, as he had stated there were eight good reasons why he would not be fired—

Mr. MacDonald: They are right there.

Hon. Mr. Grossman:—referring to the eight NDP members in the Legislature. 2. Mr. Lindsay had written this letter to the hon. Attorney General to embarrass the department and senior officials, and 3. Mr. Lindsay's accusations were maliciously misleading and could not be substantiated in fact.

On January 27, 1965, Mr. Lindsay submitted an application—

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): How do we know they were? You did not tell us what they were.

Hon. Mr. Grossman:—for a hearing by the public service grievance board, stating, and I quote: "I grieve against unjust dismissal."

A hearing was set by the grievance board for February 17, 1965, but at the request of the civil service association, representing Mr. Lindsay, the hearing was postponed. Incidentally, there is no doubt in my mind at all, that it was deliberately delayed so other matters could be brought up by the hon. members on the other side.

Mr. MacDonald: You can impute motives to suit your own political purposes.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: On April 1, 1965—

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, may I just put the hon. Minister straight in this regard? There was absolutely no direction as far as I know between the two incidents that the hon. Minister is referring to, and he knows it.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: On April 1, 1965, when the estimates of The Department of Reform Institutions were before the Legislature, the hon. member for Yorkview asked why pages were missing from the detention record book. I might say parenthetically here, Mr. Chairman, in one way I was a little surprised that the hon. members had not mentioned this in quizzing the hon. Attorney General, because they made quite an issue of this before. But of course in the interim they have found out—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order I would like to be accurate here and inform the hon. Minister, through you, that the missing pages were first mentioned to us by the superintendent himself.

An hon. member: You are sure you did not find them under a rug?

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, this is completely at odds—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I do not know what point of order there is there.

Mr. MacDonald: You are not only fabricating facts but—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: How am I fabricating facts? I said, and I quote again:

On April 1, 1965, when the estimates of The Department of Reform Institutions were before the Legislature, the hon. member for Yorkview asked why pages were missing from the detention record book.

Is that not factual?

Mr. Young: All right!

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Well that is all I said.

Mr. Young: Okay! Just tell the truth.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: We will hear about the couch after a while, I suppose.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: When the hon. member for Yorkview and the hon. member for Riverdale had visited the Guelph reformatory a month earlier on March 5, 1965, they asked to see this book and found pages missing from the period inmate Cross was in detention.

Mr. MacDonald: This has nothing to do with the inquest.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: It has not? These missing pages covered the period inmate Cross was confined to the detention cells. The Department of Reform Institutions has a signed statement from an employee of the institution that he was informed by Mr. McQuillan and a reformatory guard, who, incidentally, has also since been dismissed and is grieving, that Mr. Lindsay had removed some pages from the detention book, passed these pages through a window to Mr. McQuillan, who returned them to Mr. Lindsay upon leaving work—

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: That is your friend.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: By removing these pages, Mr. Lindsay and Mr. McQuillan conspired to cast suspicion on institution authorities. This not only would discredit senior civil servants, but raise doubts in the minds of the parents of the inmate who died.

On April 14, 1965, the grievance board held a hearing in Mr. Lindsay's case. At this hearing the board ruled that Mr. Lindsay's charges regarding unjust dismissal were not substantiated.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is not all. The hon. members will recall a certain chesterfield incident, the famous chesterfield—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. MacDonald: If it suits your purpose we can discuss anything except the hon. Attorney General's estimates.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The released inmate involved there—

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Honest men, ha, ha!

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, I am trying to establish what led up to certain guards, Lindsay and McQuillan, engaging in a conspiracy to destroy the reputation of the authorities at the Guelph reformatory—

Mr. Bryden: What has that to do with this vote?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: —and deliberately then cast aspersions upon how the inquest was being held and I am trying to give their motives for so doing.

Mr. J. H. White (London South): Quite right.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, that man—

Mr. Bryden: Without bothering about the facts.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: That man whom, I think, was in the office of the hon. member for Yorkview and whom I interviewed at his request, was going back and forth under—I was going to say lock and key, but if an armoured car was available I think Mr. Lindsay and/or Mr. McQuillan would have arranged it.

After he was released, after his term had expired, he was kept for a few days in the home of one of those two guards while he handed out information. He was kept there even though those guards were under the impression, and were told, that the RCMP were looking for this man. These are the two guards who have been giving this kind of testimony.

Mr. Young: Why would they be looking for him?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: As a matter of fact, they are looking for him now. I do not know whether they have got him yet, but this testimony, this was admitted in the investigation. They were told by—

Mr. Young: Could I ask the hon. Minister why the RCMP were looking for him?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Just a minute!

Your friends admitted that the released inmate had told them that the RCMP were looking for him; but they thought he could fill them with all this information about contraband in chesterfields and all over the place and so they kept him there and fed the information to the hon. members of the NDP while they brought it forward here and made headlines in the House.

Hon. Mr. Wardrobe: Your usual pals!

Hon. Mr. Grossman: And these are the kind of people from whom they have been getting their information.

Hon. Mr. Wardrobe: That they associate with; the NDP Opposition members associate with!

Mr. MacDonald: Talk about fabricating a conspiracy—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, all I am attempting to do here is explain to the hon. members of this House why I would not hesitate for one minute in taking the word of Mr. Sanderson against this sort of person.

Hon. Mr. Wardrobe: Now tell us something about your NDP pals.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, we have just seen an hon. Minister of the Crown engage in a long deliberate attempt to assassinate a man's character on the basis of hearsay, unsupported allegations. No one knows where half this came from.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Do you want me to read it?

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, what is particularly regrettable about the whole miserable performance is that it is totally irrelevant to the matter we are discussing, which is an inquest.

Hon. Mr. Wardrobe: Listen to the evidence.

Mr. Bryden: It has absolutely nothing to do with that inquest—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The hon. member said it was unsubstantiated. I will read him the evidence.

Mr. Bryden: Just sit down and let us proceed. I cannot even hear you with all this noise over—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Would the hon. member like me to give him the evidence? I have it here.

Mr. Bryden: I will be quite happy on another occasion to see it.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bryden: I would point out to you, Mr. Chairman, that a man's name has been dragged in here, and his character assassinated; yet this matter is completely irrelevant. I will be happy to look at the evidence.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I will read it.

Hon. Mr. Wardrobe: I want to hear it, too.

Mr. Bryden: Why should we have any more of it read? What has it to do with this vote? It has absolutely nothing to do with the matter before us. It is nothing but a red herring to distract attention from the issue that is before the House and on which the government is on the ropes. They have no defence.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bryden: But they bring in every conceivable irrelevancy; apparently this man Lindsay is going to be used as a whipping boy to cover up government sins of omission and commission until the cows come home. Let the irrelevancies and the red herrings follow their normal course.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I am not going to let you—

Mr. Bryden: Let us still bear in mind that the point that we are dealing with was not in any way affected by anything that the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions said; in fact what he said was out of order from beginning to end. It was totally unrelated to the vote.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, allow me simply to put the matter on the record which was raised this afternoon and raised again tonight. It was simply this, that the evidence that was given in the inquest by the superintendent was: "That was the final dealings I had with him." I quoted this, and then against that I quoted the statement of the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions on page 1888.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: To which date was it referring?

Mr. Young: May 26. Now then, we have the statement of the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions. "He was not put in detention until August 10 and 11. He was brought before the superintendent on the two consecutive days on a series of charges."

This is all I talked about this afternoon.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, with all due respect—

Mr. Young: I have nothing to say about anybody else.

I have the floor here for a moment, Mr. Chairman. I had nothing to say about any other person or any charges made by anybody else except by the hon. Minister himself.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: All right!

Mr. Young: I just wish to put this on the record, that is all.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Well, that is different.

Mr. Chairman, with due respect all I am saying is, and this is what I was trying to clarify in the first place: You are saying Mr. Sanderson perjured himself on the basis that he made one statement and I made another.

Mr. Young: I did not. I said Mr. Sanderson made one statement and the hon. Minister made another, and this afternoon I asked the hon. Attorney General to clarify what this meant.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Well, that does not mean Mr. Sanderson perjured himself, I just may have had the wrong information myself.

Mr. MacDonald: Can it be explained to the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions that Mr. Sanderson testified that the last time he had seen Cross was in May. And the hon. Minister comes in and puts on the record that Sanderson had seen Cross two days in succession at the time of his detention. It was impossible for Sanderson to have forgotten that he had seen Cross on those two days. Therefore, he misinformed the coroner's inquest.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Maybe I inadvertently misinformed this House, which is quite possible. Now, when I read it—I am not quoting, Mr. Chairman, I mean in all fairness to Mr. Sanderson, I do not know the facts about this yet. It may very well be; I was reading from the report which was prepared for me by one of my officials, not necessarily Mr. Sanderson. I may have just had the wrong date.

I do not think one should say that Mr. Sanderson perjured himself on this basis. I will find this out. But I think the hon. member should be careful about making such rash charges about a man on this basis.

An hon. member: Sit down, sit down!

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. Minister may have a point—that I should be careful in taking anything he says as factual.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Well now, you are stretching it.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister cannot wiggle out on this thing.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Bryden: I cannot hear you, Mr. Chairman, for the noise.

Mr. Chairman: I wish you would direct your remarks or statement to the Attorney General. It is his estimates that are before the House at the present time.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, with the noise back here it is impossible to hear you, I am sorry.

Mr. Chairman: I would like you to direct your remarks or statements to the Attorney General whose estimates are before the House at this time; please, from here on.

Mr. Bryden: If that applies to everybody, I will be glad to accept it.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, I would just like to say to the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions that this is not the night to bring it up, because on April 6, we asked the same question.

Mr. Chairman: Direct your remarks to the Attorney General at this time. I have allowed considerable leeway and I feel that, to bring order out of chaos, we should do this.

Is vote 208 carried?

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): No, Mr. Chairman. There are a couple of matters in this estimate to which I want to address some remarks.

The first one that I want to speak about quite briefly is the fire marshal's office. As far as I have been able to figure out, the fire marshal's office is theoretically designed for fire safety and fire prevention. The hon. Minister opposite has over 30 different statutes which deal with everything, from children's boarding homes to lightning rods, I have compiled a list, Mr. Chairman, of the numerous Acts and regulations now in force which deal with fire safety and protection; it is a long list, and a rather interesting one. There is The Fire Marshals Act, and regulations under that; The Fire Departments Act and The Lightning Rods Act, Hotel Fire Safety Act, Egress from Public Buildings Act, The Fire Accidents Act, The Firefighters Exemption Act, The Fire Extinguishment Act, The Fire Guardians Act, The Public Halls Act, The Charitable Institutions Act, The Children's Boarding Homes Act, the criminal code, day nurseries, Department of Education Act, The Factory, Shop and Office Building Act, The Gasoline Handling Act, certain parts of The Highway Traffic Act, The Homes for the Aged Act, The Mining Act, The Municipal Act, Niagara Parks Act, Planning Act, The Public Commercial Vehicles Act, The Public Health Act, The Public Hospitals Act, The Public Vehicles Act, The Theatres Act, and The Tourist Establishments Act. All these, Mr. Chairman, and regulations under them, deal with various responsibilities given to people for controlling, inspecting and regulating fire, prevention of fire, and that sort of thing.

I noticed when Mr. Silverthorne, of the theatres branch, tabled his report to this House a few days ago, that one of the things he commented upon was the number of obstructions his inspectors had found in theatres. It seems to me that Mr. Silverthorne's branch examines plans for theatres as well. So they concern themselves with buildings, with plans, and with fire danger. Under the various statutes I have detailed here, there seems to be a plethora of different authorities that have somewhat similar responsibilities, but different people are doing the various jobs.

It would seem logical to me, Mr. Chairman, that the most cogent difficulty in this branch of government endeavour is the extensive geographic overlapping that exists in all of these statutes. In most cases, the fire marshal appears to be little more than an advisor; it seems that he can step into a situation only where a specific municipality has not passed the necessary or adequate bylaw under The Municipal Act to implement their own individual fire protection and safety. Under The Municipal Act, each municipality has wide powers to determine its own particular system of fire protection and prevention. These systems vary greatly from municipality to municipality.

Sir, as we have gone on in this vote we have seen that many things—including the police function, and the votes of the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions, the vote of the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond), when that comes, the hon. Minister of Public Welfare, when that comes—all of these have overlapping jurisdictions.

We have difficulty, sir, in the great multitude of authorities, the multitude of statutes, and so on. In this field of fire protection and control, we not only have it so subdivided over all the municipalities, we have it subdivided through a multitude of government departments, branches authorities, boards, and so on. It would seem to me that we could perform a great public service if there was some sort of a consolidation of all of these statutes into a uniform one which would indicate to people concerned with fire prevention and protection just what has to happen. Someone begins to ponder the various problems raised by erecting a safe building—blocking exits in a theatre, things under The Municipal Act, who controls the fire department, should it be voluntary or should it not? You have to be pretty well a full-time employee of the hon. Attorney General's department to determine which statute you go to, which set of regulations you look for and who is supposed to govern them.

If there is any validity in the argument that has been put forward about the importance of regional government and consolidation of these various public services, surely this is a topic for important discussion. The time is now that there should be a real examination of a consolidation of our fire forces to provide better fire protection. There has been serious doubt expressed from time to time about how efficient in preventing fire and in putting out fires are the various volunteer brigades. There are thousands of people throughout the province who have given yeoman service to the people of Ontario as members of volunteer fire brigades. But in this day and age, sir, I begin to wonder—no matter with what goodwill or what good intentions—just how efficiently a volunteer brigade, which often does not have the sort of equipment a permanent brigade would have, is going to be able to control fires when they do break out.

My feeling in this part of vote 208 is that a real examination should take place of the multitude of statutes concerning fire protection and fire prevention, and that the government embark upon some sort of a policy of consolidation which will bring order out of chaos and indicate that we are moving in one direction. I would like to hear the comments of the hon. Attorney General on that, if he has any. I have one more point I want to deal with here, as well.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I readily admit that the fire marshal and his office and staff do have duties under a number of Acts, all related to protection against fire. The office is a most important one; it has been in existence I think since 1916. It maintains training courses, operates the fire college and assists municipalities.

Now, sir, I have never heard of a complaint yet of a volunteer fire force being something that should be done away with, or that it was not something to be encouraged. Perhaps it could be more efficient if the municipality in which it operates had the funds and supplied it with the most up-to-date equipment, but we have many small municipalities where the volunteer fire brigade is most efficient and the best protection that can, in the circumstances, be provided. It is all very well for the hon. member to suggest bringing order out of chaos, but I do not admit there is chaos in this situation. I think we have quite an efficient system, particularly in the larger and medium-sized municipalities, where they have efficient fire forces getting assistance, training, advice, and being encouraged to come to the fire college. They are all being visited by inspectors from the fire marshal's office, and in every way having standards raised. They are given the best and most modern methods, and I feel the fire marshal's office is doing excellent work, as it has down through the years. I cannot conceive how the hon. member thinks we might bring about the suggestion which he puts forward. How might he accomplish this in the small municipalities? What would he do—abandon all these forces? Where would he station the fire forces to provide protection for the small municipalities? I do not follow how he would carry this out in practice.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Attorney General poses three or four problems in his answer to me. He asks: Where is the confusion? I pointed to one obvious example of the confusion when you pick up Mr. Silverthorne's report; he puts forward a section of it saying: "As a result of the inspection of my offices we found that in X number of theatres the exits were blocked, which presented a fire danger."

It seems to me a strange place—

Hon. J. A. C. Auld (Minister of Tourism and Information): Not a fire hazard; it is a safety hazard.

Mr. Singer: Well, if it is a safety hazard it would be a fire hazard; and if it was a fire hazard it could be a safety hazard. It seems to me a strange place, Mr. Chairman—

Hon. Mr. Auld: Just in this connection, I would say to my hon. friend, and he knows this very well, that the matter of exits in public buildings is not necessarily related to fire, it can be related to panic and all kinds of things. My hon. friend is, with his usual skill, attempting to confuse the issue a bit.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, just let us talk about the blocking of exits in public buildings insofar as they are a fire hazard and I will leave the rest of it to my friend, the hon. Minister.

It would seem to me still to be a strange place to lodge inspectors, in the theatres branch, which seems substantially to concern itself with the control and exhibition of films, censorship or noncensorship and that sort of thing. It seems to me the very argument that the hon. Attorney General puts forward is that since this has existed since 1916 it is right.

You have a multitude of inspectors in various departments and it would seem much more logical to me that if you would concentrate these persons in one control and in one branch, that would be a more logical way to go about the various duties that are there. The hon. Attorney General says, where is the confusion? Some 30 Acts deal with various aspects of this very important problem. Surely it would be logical—and the hon. Attorney General as a lawyer I would think would be one of the first to admit it—it would be logical to find all of the provisions of our statutory powers and our regulations and so on, together in one place so that people who concern themselves with the safety of public buildings and that sort of thing, would say: Well, here is The Fire Protection Act; or here is The Public Safety Act, whatever you want to call it; this is what it says, this is what we must do.

We are concerned with the fire marshal's office; if you want to leave it with your colleague, the hon. Minister of Travel and Publicity, give it all to him. But someone—one branch, one group—should be in control of this. I say the fact that it has existed since 1916 and the fact that now no one can identify some 30 different statutes where you have to look to get all of the law on that subject, indicates that there must be some confusion in the public mind.

Insofar as the small brigades are concerned, the volunteer brigades, I say, with the greatest respect to the fine work that those people are doing that as techniques get more and more advanced, as equipment becomes more and more expensive and as the persons who embark upon these—with the few exceptions of those persons who have nothing else to do during the day except sit and wait, and there are some occasions an occasional fire brigade is made up of civil servants in a municipality who can go from their job to fight the fire—as we get into these more serious problems, as we are talking about regionalization, as we are talking about bigger police forces, I think the time has come to turn the same sort of attention to the functioning of our fire prevention and our fire fighting systems through the province as has been turned upon the efficiency of police.

Now the information is not here as yet. The hon. Attorney General talks in fine terms about the availability of the fire college and so on. I do not know—there was not a series of questions this year but there will be next year, about how many firemen we have, how many have received training, how many are volunteer, how many hours and so on, how many forces there are, how many conflicting authorities there are. This is the sort of examination that is going to have to be done, because I do not believe, with the hon. Attorney General, that our system is all that fine.

I have not the statistics before me, but the rate of fire damage and the deaths caused by fire in this province I think is quite high in comparison with other jurisdictions in this country and in American jurisdictions. There have been some very tragic fire deaths in this province because on occasion, and you have seen it in the press, because aid from a municipality can only go to its borders, even though it is closer to the fire. They do not cross the borders, whereas municipality B has to go 10 miles to fight the fire. In the meantime, while they are concerning themselves about jurisdiction the house burns down, sometimes with serious personal injury and loss of life.

This is the sort of thing, Mr. Chairman, that indicates to me that the time has arrived that we should have a real study of our whole system of statutory enactments and our regulations and the efficiency of our fire fighting services in the province of Ontario.

Mr. Chairman: Is vote 208 agreed?

Mr. Singer: No, Mr. Chairman, there is another point in this vote; and that is the problem of—well, it is not a problem, it is a question of the Attorney General's laboratory.

I did ask a number of questions about the Attorney General's laboratory and they have been quite fully answered. I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that in the Attorney General's laboratory, particularly in its head in the person of Dr. Ward Smith, we have a very efficient and capable operation. The substantial problem in this branch has been that there just has not been enough money given to it over the years.

The hon. Attorney General nods his head. I suppose in any branch that we are talking about there has not been enough money given to it.

There was an article in the Toronto Globe and Mail about a year ago which suggested the laboratory needed about eight times more space and about three times more staff. The appropriation rose from $428,000 to $537,000 a year ago, and this year I think it is up to, what, about $600,000?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: $679,000.

Mr. Singer: $679,000. So in the period of two years it has gone from $428,000 to $679,000, which is a fairly substantial increase.

But with the great work that is done; and they have moved to new quarters, they have moved now to the college of pharmacy building and there have been some additions to staff; I think their money has been well spent.

As I say, I have the highest regard for the leadership of that operation. I think Dr. Smith who leads it is a devoted man who could without any trouble find similar employment in many other jurisdictions at substantially higher salaries than he is now being paid. I think he deserves to be highly commended.

But one of the problems here is the delay that some of their studies take. There is a suggestion that the scientific study of Crown cases awaiting trial was backed up on an average of four to six weeks. This sort of suggestion is confirmed, I think, from some of the answers to the questions I have put in.

A further suggestion given to me was that technicians were working 10 and 11 hour shifts, four days a week, to cope with the problem of inadequate facilities.

So, very briefly, it is my opinion that this particular operation, which is one of the good operations that we have here, needs even more money than is in the estimates and needs the full support of the hon. Attorney General. I would have been quite happy if he had taken that money that we were talking about earlier this afternoon out of the emergency measures vote and put it in here, because in here it would be doing some good for the people of the province of Ontario. In emergency measures it is not.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, could I just say for the benefit of the hon. members of the House that the increase this year is $142,000 in the laboratory vote, in that portion of this vote. And $125,000 of that is to be employed in salaries. A staff increase is planned as follows: five scientists of class 1, a scientist class 2, three laboratory technicians of grade 3 and one of grade 4; and then document examiners, firearms examiners, photographers, clerk-typists. So of our increase of $142,000, it is practically all going into increase of scientific staff.

Vote 208 agreed to.

On vote 209:

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, vote 209 is the securities vote and I think that we should have a bit of a discussion on some of the things that are here before us insofar as securities are concerned and the administration of it.

We have this report—and I think it is a good one, I have commented briefly upon it before—of the hon. Attorney General's committee on securities legislation. We had the hon. Attorney General's word that it is being carefully studied and it is to be hoped that we are going to have—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: It is not only being studied but some of the legislation is already in draft form.

Mr. Singer: I am delighted to hear that, because that was my next question. I would have hoped—and now the hon. Attorney General has helped me along a bit—that we would see some legislation that would implement some of the very important recommendations that are here.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Singer: As we read about a certain investigation that is going on—and I do not want to comment on that until the report is in—it certainly should be obvious to anyone who just casually scans through it, that we seem to have a long, long way to go to put this important branch of our public business under proper control.

Some of the answers are in here, and from what the hon. Attorney General says I would hope that the statutes that he talks about being in draft form will be seen by us before this session comes to an end. Am I correct in presuming that we will?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I doubt that.

Mr. Singer: You doubt that? All right. You are drafting it and it may well be, what, a year from now?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: This is no childish task, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Singer: I recognize it is no childish task.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I would just say that we have—as the hon. member has said—the investigation going on by the Royal commission into certain areas of the securities commission itself and trading done by certain companies. And we have the report which has been tabled and on which we are now drafting legislation.

Apart from that, I do not propose to say very much more except that it is one of the matters which is receiving our most careful attention. There is a great deal of activity being devoted to it, and I do not think we should be discussing the field that is being studied by the Royal commission upon which we expect a report very shortly.

Mr. Singer: I do not propose even to attempt to discuss it, other than in a general way. I have been disturbed by some of the things I have read, but until I see what Mr. Justice Kelly has to say about them, and perhaps look at some of the evidence, I will reserve my comment.

In the meantime, and quite apart from what that investigation covers, there is a tremendous field of endeavour into which we have to turn our attention. The hon. Attorney General said he is drafting some legislation and this is fine. But there have been thoughts about that. It is fine, but it would be finer if we could see it in this session.

It may well be a year before we see it, and discussions are going to take place—sides are being chosen already. There are people who trade on the street who believe the recommendations in here are far too severe. Lobbies are growing up. They are referred to frequently in the press who say, "Let us not do this, you are going to destroy initiative," and so on. There are people who say let the stock exchange control this. The exchange will be able to look after it and everything will be fine.

Mr. Peck: Where are all your party?

Mr. Singer: The hon. member for Scarborough Centre has made a series of very intelligent contributions all evening to this debate, and I am certain if he wants to get up—

Mr. Peck: Where are all your people?

Mr. Singer: I am certain that if he wants to get up and make a speech we will be glad to hear him. But just to allow the House to continue on in what I think is a reasonable discussion, perhaps you could keep him quiet for a bit. I doubt it, but I think it is worth an effort, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. R. A. Eagleson (Lakeshore): We have to have some stimulation.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order! Proceed, before there are more interruptions.

Mr. Singer: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. The exchange problem has been outlined to the public in more detail than ever, and I think the publicity attached to these various investigations has been good in this sense. The Kimber study of securities law has shown us the speculative stocks. It has also outlined the problems of the exchange in compelling desirable disclosure. There is no doubt that the exchange has been embarrassed by revelations of its ineffectiveness, even though much of this can properly be blamed on the pitifully inadequate provincial laws that go along with this. Particularly painful must have been the recent revelation of indiscretions in brokerage firms that were closely connected with the exchange.

But the dissatisfaction with our investment atmosphere will probably focus increasingly on primary distribution. This is still an exchange-administered system which allows promoters to feed new company stock into the open market. Because it can be a vehicle for large profits, it is also a temptation for phony rumours, for doctored information. The higher the price can be pushed, the more chance the promoter has for profit.

Mr. Peck: Who wrote that for you?

Mr. Singer: In the past, the exchange has taken an attitude which suggested it does not like this system much but it knows of none better. Under the rising pressure for change, its opposition to reform of primary distribution has hardened. Many brokerage houses are so closely connected to the penny mining market that they will fight to the last ditch to retain the present system.

The exchange has pointed out correctly that no detailed workable alternative has as yet been put forward. The exchange is rapidly tightening up its standard, it has done much more than the government has to improve the climate, and it is rather interesting that the exchange should be able to move more quickly when public record has been made clear, and when they have been embarrassed.

I would have enjoyed seeing the government move equally as quickly as the exchange seems to be doing in certain of its phases. But we are still studying this report. We are drafting legislation which will come before us, not in this session, but in due course.

There is the very serious problem, Mr. Chairman, as my hon. friend knows, of making staff available to Mr. Kimber. You have only just put Mr. Kimber on full-time duty at the exchange. You have to give him staff, and you have to give him money to hire staff, and you have to give him enough money to hire good staff, because if you are serious about securities reform, you have to give someone the tools to do the job.

It is only now, in the last few weeks or months, that you have moved Mr. Kimber into the position and given him the full-time job and the full-time responsibility. How good or how bad he is we will see in due course, but in the meantime you have to give him the money to be able to have the staff to do the job.

Mr. A. E. Reuter (Waterloo South): That is a profound statement.

Mr. Peck: Who wrote that for you?

Mr. Singer: Well, I think it is profound, and I will tell you why. If you look back through the estimates over the last half dozen years, you will see that this government, of which you are a part, has paid no more than lip service to controlling or attempting to control the administration of securities. There has been very little research done in the companies branch, and there has been no real effort until crisis descends upon us, and until scandals appear to be obvious, or until Royal commissions have to investigate a particular problem, to have a new revolution insofar as the province's exercise of control. The duty of the province is to force disclosure, to control insider trading, to deal with take-overs, to deal with wash trading. All these things which our neighbours to the south have been dealing with much more effectively over many years, have been ignored in this jurisdiction. And over the years again—if you will look back into the record of debates on this particular estimate—you will see that there has not been any real encouragement at all from government to embark on this kind of an effort. It is true we have made some very substantial progress. We have a pretty good report here. No doubt, the hon. Minister has dozens of good reports cluttering up the pigeonholes all over the—

Mr. Eagleson: Put the axe on and grind it.

Mr. Singer: I would like to see some action on this statute, and I would like to see the reform in the exchange we have been talking about. I would like to see some sort of time limit, because the state into which our investment market has come is a pretty grim one. The public is losing their faith in it. The public does not believe that they are getting a fair break, and in many cases, when they read about stocks shooting up and then falling down again they wonder just who has been making the money, because obviously it is not the ordinary investor who tries to get information, who tries either to take a reasonable gamble or to make a reasonable investment in the securities market.

In general terms, that is all I want to say at this moment about the securities vote in this estimate. But I think it is a matter that deserves priority in government intentions, and in government thought.

This report did not arrive here until March—about six or eight weeks ago—and there are opposing views as to what should be done with it. All the recommendations here are far from being accepted, and there are many things here in this report that the report passes over quite lightly, that perhaps should have been examined at greater length.

But let us get a starting point, and let us get it before the next session of the Legislature; because we are not going to get it this time. One of the first statutes that we would like to see are amendments to The Securities Act and to The Companies Act that will start to implement some of these things.

Mr. Chairman: On vote 209.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, on this vote I have a few comments I would like to make about the Kimber report, and on related matters to try to put before this House our position.

I would like to say, first of all, that we would like to see the recommendations of the Kimber report implemented, and implemented as quickly as possible. I have the sensation that the government, and probably the hon. Attorney General in particular, will be subjected to a substantial amount of pressure on two or three of the recommendations made by the Kimber report to make certain that they are not implemented.

There is already abroad some feeling that the recommendations of the Kimber report should not be implemented, but that the whole matter of securities legislation should be turned over to a conference of the Attorneys General throughout Canada for the purpose of coming up with a uniform code of securities regulation and legislation.

We would like simply to state our position on that. We are not prepared to wait until some distant date on which such a uniform code would be either drafted or acceptable to all the provinces in Canada, or until such a time as it would be possible to have a national securities code, desirable as that would be.

I think one thing which the Kimber report very clearly does, is to state that regardless of the constitutional problems involved in the implementation by Ontario alone of certain corrective measures about securities legislation, for practical purposes the legislation will be effective if the Ontario government puts it through, simply because of the importance of the Toronto security market to the security industry throughout Canada.

Having said that, I would like to indicate that to us the Kimber report failed on two counts, having nothing to do whatsoever with the personnel of the commission—because there were some very able men on the commission—but it failed because it chose not to deal with the general terms of the reference that was made to it. It simply limited itself to the five specific items that were listed, together with the question of the constitution of the Ontario securities commission itself.

The second count on which the Kimber commission failed was that it carried through its work, and its study, only on an analytical and comparative basis, and did not produce by way of questionnaire or surveys or studies any investigation in depth of just exactly the way in which the securities industry in Canada, and particularly in the province of Ontario, does operate. I think one of the results of this analytical comparative method that was adopted by the committee is that the government is going to be more open to pressure against the acceptance of these recommendations, because people are going to be in a position to say, well, you have not studied it thoroughly enough to come to the conclusions that you have come to.

I think the one example that is perfectly clear is the decision that primary distribution through the stock exchange of speculative securities for practical purposes was ruled out as an acceptable procedure, simply because it had been ruled out some 25 or 30 years ago in the United States, and because it had been ruled out some 65 or 70 years ago in the United Kingdom.

There is certainly some validity in adopting a practice which the two leading securities markets in the world have adopted, but there is no study in depth about whether or not this particular method of financing in Canada for speculative mining issues has, in fact, a real value in terms of the development of mines both in Ontario, and of mines in other countries in the world.

I think that most of us in the House are quite aware that the Toronto stock exchange and listed mining companies are used not only for the development or the raising of money for the financing of mining operations in Ontario, but also for financing operations in other countries of the world. I think the classic example at the present time is, of course, the financing of mining operations in Ireland.

Now, this leaves a very difficult area for anyone to argue effectively against when one does not have the kind of studies which should be available before the decision—which is undoubtedly the right one—is reached in the way in which it has been expressed in the Kimber report.

I would like to comment, before returning to the Kimber report, on the question of the Windfall inquiry which is proceeding at the present time. I would hope that we would not accept the Windfall inquiry, or other incidents which have led to this kind of investigation, simply as isolated violations in a securities market which otherwise is operating properly. I think that most of us are becoming convinced that the events which have led to both the Attorney General's committee report, and the events which have led to the Windfall inquiry, are ones which are exaggerated, but are exaggerated only in the sense that they do reflect deficiencies throughout the whole of the marketing structure, and the organization of the securities industry in the province of Ontario.

I think that on this question of financing, and without referring again to the Windfall inquiry at all, but simply to the study which was prepared for the Royal commission on banking and finance by E. K. Cork headed, "Finance in the Mining Industry," there is a tremendous amount of information in that study about the methods of financing in the mining industry. I would comment very briefly on Chapter 5, which is headed, "Financing with Junior Exploration Companies" which explains in some detail the method by which financing takes place by primary distribution through the Toronto stock exchange. It comes up with some very interesting comparisons of the number of dollars which are raised, the number of dollars which are in fact spent for exploration.

It has been estimated, he states:

That of the total funds received by the broker-dealer in primary distribution, on an average perhaps 60 per cent goes to distribution costs and profits, and only 40 per cent to the corporate treasury. The cost of raising capital by a listed company is less than for an unlisted one, but it is still substantial. The net profit to the underwriter can be greater because of the wider scope of the operation.

He goes on to compare the actual funds which are raised in Canada for exploration expenditures, and he compares those with the total expenditures that were used for mine exploration and he comes to the conclusion—despite the difficulty of the comparisons involved—he comes to the conclusion that no more than about $150 million—this is during a period, I believe a seven- or eight-year period in the recent past—no more than about $150 million apparently was spent for exploration by the junior companies which raised funds from the public, even though $340 million were raised for the purpose of exploration.

The magnitude of the discrepancy is too great to be brushed aside merely because of possible weakness in the figures. The discrepancy is large enough to cause concern whether a significant portion of these funds might have been diverted to the benefit of promoters and other insiders rather than for the benefit of the shareholders. Only a series of detailed audits following through on the use of funds raised from the public would provide definitive answers and this is beyond the scope of this study.

I would suggest to the hon. Attorney General that kind of definitive study certainly deserves the attention both of the hon. Attorney General and of the hon. Minister of Mines to ascertain to what extent the moneys which are raised for mining exploration in Canada are in fact used for that purpose, and for what purposes is the difference, between the amount raised and the amount actually expended, for what purposes is that money used. I think this strikes to the question which has been raised in the minds of many people about the adequacy of the traditional method of financing mining development in northern Ontario by junior exploration mining companies.

Without commenting or without expressing a view one way or another, I think it is significant that in the United States the junior mining company has for practical purposes disappeared; first because of the high cost of financing exploration and second because it is subject to similar regulation under the securities and exchange commission as are companies in lines of business other than the mining business.

The Kimber report was rather a curious report in the sense that it ignored the principal term of reference entirely and dealt almost exclusively with the following specific problems: Take-over bids, insider trading, disclosure of information, proxy solicitation and primary distribution of speculative securities. One need only comment that a great number of the matters which were recommended in the Kimber report are matters which to anyone reasonably conversant with business operations and investment procedures would think: Well, why are we so far behind in adopting a great many of these recommendations? It is in that sense that I think there is a very real urgency for the hon. Attorney General to bring forward legislation.

I was disappointed to hear that it was unlikely legislation would be brought forward. I think particularly in the field of proxy solicitation it should be possible for the hon. Attorney General to bring forward the legislation in this session, because the deficiencies in our corporation law and the deficiencies so far as the exchange requirements for proxies are concerned are so great; and yet the examples of what could be done are so readily available that it should not be difficult for the drafting to be done immediately on the solicitation of proxy requirements.

Indeed, with minor changes the provisions for solicitation of proxies under The Securities Exchange Act in the United States are in substance the recommendation which was made and it is available in detail from the SEC rules. This one particular topic, in my view, could be dealt with immediately and would be, I think, a tremendous advantage as a first start towards proper and complete information to shareholders about what takes place within the framework of corporate organizations, of what the management of those companies are doing and the extent to which they are fulfilling their obligations as management.

The report itself did not make any statement about the working of securities legislation in Ontario in the light of modern business conditions and practices, which of course is its main term of reference. It simply, as I stated, dealt with the five specific topics. There is very little reference to existing legislation, either to its adequacy or inadequacy in the areas which it covers. It simply goes on to say that there are a large number of things which should be covered, without commenting in any way except indirectly on the existing legislation.

The committee departed from its terms of reference to deal with the Ontario securities commission itself and it calls for the commission to be re-established as an independent administrative agency competent to perform its role. I think that one need only say that what they are in substance calling for is a securities and exchange commission or an Ontario securities commission similar to the securities and exchange commission in the United States.

One of the three further studies recommended by the committee is an independent study of the structure of the commission itself.

Certainly one of the matters which we hope the hon. Attorney General would comment on tonight is whether one or more of these three studies which have been recommended by the Kimber report are going to be undertaken, and if so at what time are they going to be undertaken.

The gaps and the inadequacy of the study—again in the framework within which it was carried out—is not a reflection on those men who served as members of the committee; but its inadequacy is shown in that there was no study whatsoever made of the relationship of the Ontario securities commission to the Toronto stock exchange and its members, of its relationship to the investment dealers and to the broker-dealers, let alone to the inter-relationships of these various organizations which are at the heart of our whole securities industry. Similarly, no study was made of the mechanism of the Toronto stock exchange as a market or of the other security trading markets.

The committee in its second study recommended an immediate special study by the Ontario securities commission of market manipulation in all its phases. The inadequacy of the Ontario securities commission as it now exists is highlighted by the committee when it urges that special staff and legal counsel be temporarily attached to the commission to facilitate this study. I would suggest that that study, if it is going to be undertaken, should not be in terms of market manipulation in all its phases, which bears a connotation which I think is most unfortunate, but should be a study of how the securities market in Canada and in the province of Ontario in fact operates.

Similarly, no consideration was given to the Toronto stock exchange, to the broker-dealers' association or to the investment dealers' association as self-governing institutions and their responsiveness to the public interest; and little consideration was given to the continuing responsibilities of security issuers.

I think the whole of the report raises very serious questions about whether the statutory scheme of self-regulation is at the present time sufficient or adequate in any way in terms of the way in which the Toronto stock exchange appears to have been governed. Indeed, there is no clear-cut recognition in the record of the public interest involved, apart altogether from investor protection.

The committee recommended that primary distribution through the facilities of the Toronto stock exchange be discontinued. It was discontinued, as I say, 30 years ago in the U.S., and over 70 years ago in the U.K. The report recommended in substance the adoption of the proxy rules of the security and exchange commission. It recommended, so far as prospectuses and financial statements are concerned relating to disclosures, that in substance the SEC procedures, rules and requirements be adopted. Its recommendations for take-over bids were simply a statutory code of procedures adopted from the U.K. rules, and from the code of procedures to be applied in connection with take-over bids of institutional investors and stock exchanges which was promulgated in 1963.

With respect to insider trading, it simply recommended that public reporting take place substantially, as in the United States, under the securities and exchange commission, and defines the term "insider." It recommends civil liability for improper use by insiders of confidential information not available to the public.

I think when the actual recommendations of the committee are stated in as simple terms as possible, which I have tried to do, it will indicate that it is not a phenomenal task which the hon. Attorney General is asked to undertake in terms of implementing the recommendations of that report. I think those recommendations, unless there are substantial questions of policy which the government is considering, can be implemented quite readily, and that the hon. Attorney General and the Ontario securities commission should be concerned with getting on with the unanswered matters of the securities industry in Ontario and of its operations in Ontario, so that we can have an up-to-date and efficient security market.

When one really looks at companies in terms of the people who have invested money in them, really all that an investor asks for, or indeed is entitled to, is complete financial disclosure. Second, he is entitled to be satisfied that there is no fraud or overreaching within the management group in the corporation itself. Third, that he have a reasonably stable market in which he can dispose of his investment, or exchange it for another investment.

I think that placed within the context of investments by individuals or by institutions in corporations, there should be no hesitation about the government adopting rules, both for the Toronto stock exchange and for the over-the-counter markets in Toronto and elsewhere in the province. And there should be no difficulty, if one adopts those principles, as to what an investor is entitled to receive in making the necessary amendments to The Corporations Act, and whatever other related statutes are involved.

I would hope that there would not be any undue delay in adopting as many as possible of these recommendations, and getting on with the three studies which have been recommended, the last of which is the study of mutual funds which today, of course, account for a substantial amount of the individual person's investment in the securities market.

I would hope that the hon. Attorney General would feel free to comment somewhat more than he has tonight on some of these questions, and let us know what future plans there are in connection with the other recommendations that are included in the Kimber report; about the three subsequent studies which should be made, and, I hope, are underway at the present time.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I think it is only fair that I should make some brief comment, particularly on the remarks of the hon. member for Riverdale.

I would say this, and I will try to be brief in my reply, that in the vote requested to furnish the Ontario securities branch, we are asking mainly for funds for the purpose of increased staff, an increase of 13, which will increase our staff from 44 to 57. In the staff I think it is interesting to note, we are asking for a securities analyst as one of the members of that 13, someone who will be able to analyze securities and make studies of the nature that the hon. member mentioned, and to come forward with suggestions and conclusions and advice for the commission. In addition, five security auditors and financial analysts, two investigators, and clerical assistance, and secretaries, and an additional legal officer, and it is intended to increase the commission itself, the personnel of the commission. The Act that was introduced in the House the other day, the amending Act, makes provision for a commission that could consist of at least five members.

On one of the other points that the hon. member raised, I would inform the House, that early last year, a study was directed by the securities commission itself into the trading in securities, the business of raising funds, primary distribution and the methods that were used and how much of the funds raised by these methods went into the development, particularly in the mining companies, of the properties themselves. This study was going forward, and had advanced quite a distance when the Windfall inquiry was begun. We then felt that should stand unfinished for the present. Then with the report of the securities commission coming forward, I think these all will fit in together, but that study will be completed.

With respect to the legislation, I could just say this. I think the hon. members realize that not only is the securities Act affected, but in large measure, The Corporations Act, because many of the things and many of the recommendations will naturally have to be incorporated into changes in The Corporations Act, if they are to be brought about. I can only say this, as I have already stated, the legislation is being drafted.

Naturally, when it is in shape for study, it will then be submitted, and while some of the features could be implemented piecemeal, I think that is not the better way to do it, and some of the recommendations may very well be matters which will need to be discussed as matters of government policy. So I think it is impossible to ask in the circumstances, on the receipt of this report, all the surrounding circumstances which are still obtaining in this field, that we should present legislation within the next week or so.

Mr. R. M. Whicher (Bruce): Mr. Chairman, I would just like to say a word or two about this vote, and I hope I will not repeat words that have been given by the hon. member for Downsview, and the hon. member for Riverdale.

Since I have been in this House for the past ten years, I really think, after due consideration, that there is no issue of which the public could be more critical of the government sitting on the opposite benches than in their running of the securities commission of the province of Ontario, which controls the Toronto stock exchange.

Since I have sat in this seat on the Opposition side, there has been much criticism of government, in all departments of government. Some of it has been justified, and some of it unjustified. But in dealing with the securities legislation and the securities commission which, as I say, controls the major trading device of the securities and stock transactions in Canada, I can think of nothing where the government has left itself open to more criticism than in this field.

I think it would be fair to compare the running of the Toronto stock exchange to the New York stock exchange. I would hope, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. Attorney General, with his colleagues in the Cabinet, that when they are drawing up legislation that will affect the securities commission which completely controls the Toronto stock exchange, they will read carefully the legislation that our friends to the south have, in New York and other stock exchanges in the United States of America. I can think of no similar circumstances where the government—and this has been going on for many years, of course; and I do not accuse this government particularly, because it has been going on I suppose for 100 years, ever since the Toronto stock exchange came into being. But I can think of no organization where there is so much legalized gambling, that actually steals from the public, as in some devices that are used to dupe the public, and which are allowed by the securities commission, which is controlled by this government, and run by the Toronto stock exchange.

Mr. Chairman, as a matter of fact last fall I was in Europe and I went to several gambling casinos over there. Many hon. members of this Legislature have been in places such as Las Vegas and they go to the races—for example, whenever the hon. Prime Minister allows us to have a night off. When we go to the races here in the city of Toronto we know that we are going to pay 17.5 per cent to the Ontario government, to the jockey club and to the federal government.

We know that we have to be exceedingly lucky to walk away from there at the end of the night and make any money. But when you walk into the Toronto stock exchange—and I am talking more particularly, Mr. Chairman, of the mining issues of the Toronto stock exchange which are controlled completely by this government—you do not know really whether you are going to come out with one nickel or not, because fortunes have been lost on the Toronto stock exchange and they have been allowed, many of them, have been allowed by the actions of this government.

Without reading the Kimber report—and I do not want to go into what the hon. member for Riverdale has said or repeat what he said, which I thought provided a very good background—without suggesting that the hon. Attorney General should accept the recommendations, many of the recommendations, of the Kimber report, may I remind this honourable House that the securities commission already has many rules which have been completely tossed overboard by the securities commission and this has been allowed to take place by this government. There are many rules as far as the Toronto stock exchange is concerned that I have here in front of me, rules and regulations that have not been kept.

I would just like to repeat for one minute what the hon. member for Riverdale said, and which was answered by the hon. Attorney General, as far as staff on the securities commission is concerned. Of course, you have not enough staff, you have not enough staff in numbers and you do not have enough in quality, with all due respect to the members who are sitting there now, whom I know do their best indeed. It is not my intention to read many articles from the paper, but I would just read one paragraph which came from the Toronto Telegram of only a few weeks ago, which says this:

In the past few years the Ontario securities commission has been treading water in a desperate attempt to keep its head above water. Existing staff has dwindled through death, retirement, resignation, while replacements have been hard to find.

The biggest stumbling block has been the necessity to process applicants through the regular civil service red tape machine with its low pay ceilings on high responsibility jobs. For instance, last fall an advertisement appeared in local papers for investigators. The head appeared under the trillium logo of Ontario, province of opportunity. The salary? $5,000 to start, rising by annual increments to $6,000. The job? To conduct investigations into the operations of individuals and companies engaged in security transactions.

Mr. Chairman, this is absolutely and completely ridiculous. Here we are asking people to work for $5,000 or $6,000 a year, to investigate into the operations of individuals and companies worth millions, and, yes, billions, of dollars. You, sir, are asking these people to investigate such companies as this.

This is utter nonsense. I would hope that the hon. Attorney General means it—which I believe that he does—means it tonight when he says that the staff is going to be increased. Mr. Chairman, I beg him to get quality, and necessarily quantity, in the Ontario securities commission. Then when the rules are laid down by this commission that the government, of which the hon. Attorney General is a member, back them up 100 per cent right down the line.

If you do, there will not be the legalized robbery of the hundreds and thousands of people, not only in Ontario but all across Canada, and indeed, in the United States, who have gambled in many instances not through their own wish by any means, gambled their life's savings on the Toronto stock exchange.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have in my hand a letter from the Toronto stock exchange which gives the listing requirements for many companies—oil and gas companies, and industrial companies—but the one that I am going to speak about for just a few minutes is the minimum listing requirements for mining companies. I quote from their own list, the rules of the Toronto stock exchange controlled by the securities commission, controlled by this government. One of the rules is this:

As a general rule, a minimum net working capital of $100,000 shall be required which may include an underwriting payable forthwith on approval for listing. The required minimum net working capital shall be earmarked for the exploration and development programme as recommended.

Mr. Chairman, my question to the hon. Attorney General is this: Is this $100,000 as laid down in the rules and regulations of the Toronto stock exchange, is that money always put in the bank before it is listed on the Toronto stock exchange? I would appreciate an answer now.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I can answer that very briefly. The Toronto stock exchange operates under its own rules. Those are its own rules and I would expect the exchange would enforce them, but I cannot tell you whether they do or not.

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the answer of the hon. Attorney General, but is he indicating that the securities commission does not control the Toronto stock exchange?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: There are certain areas where it does not.

Mr. Whicher: If you wish—which I know would not be done—but if you wished, could this government not put the Toronto stock exchange out of business?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I presume we could pass an Act to put any corporation, any organization in this province out of business, if that were deemed desirable.

Mr. Whicher: Without passing an Act, could you not suspend their trading tomorrow morning if you wished?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No.

Mr. Whicher: Well, Mr. Chairman—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I do not think so.

Mr. Whicher: As a layman I would hesitate to disagree with someone like the hon. Attorney General, but I suggest that you could very well suspend the Toronto stock exchange in trading tomorrow morning or any other morning that you wished. Certainly the chairman of the securities commission suggested that the securities commission could control the Toronto stock exchange and you, of course, control the securities commission. Would you care to elaborate on that?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The exchange has the licence or consent of the commission, and I suppose it is conceivable that could be cancelled if one wanted to act precipitately. You asked me could it be done tomorrow morning; if the commission decided to cancel its consent, to cancel the consent that has been given, that could, I presume, be done.

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Chairman, I would ask the hon. Attorney General this: In this democracy of ours where we live by the laws of this government, is it not right that such a huge corporate effort as the Toronto stock exchange should obey its own rules, the same way as I, as an individual citizen, have to obey the laws of the province of Ontario?

This, Mr. Chairman, is the trouble. For years and years this large financial institution, a corporate body if you wish to call it that, the Toronto stock exchange, has not obeyed its own rules which are controlled by the securities commission of this province, which is controlled by the government of this province. They have not obeyed the rules, not only in one instance, but in dozens of instances. For example, in their rules and regulations under "Public Distribution," which I received only a few days ago, they say this:

Before any company can be listed on the Toronto stock exchange—and I am talking only of mining companies, I assure you:

—a minimum of 1,000,000 shares shall be issued and at least 333,000 free shares shall be held by a minimum of 200 public shareholders, each holding one board lot or more. A substantial number of shareholders shall be residents of Canada.

These are the Toronto stock exchange rulings.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would ask the hon. Attorney General this: As the ruler of this body, what steps does he take to guarantee that a substantial number of any shareholders of any company listed on the Toronto stock exchange are Canadians, as their rules regulate?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: This is a rule of the exchange again, which the government does not look at and we are not expected to enforce that rule as a government. It is a rule of the exchange which they lay down, which they may adhere to or may not. I do not think there is any rule or legislation we have in Ontario which requires that a person must be a Canadian to be a stockholder or shareholder, director or officer of a company.

I will say to the hon. member that he is aware of what we have been discussing here tonight. There is a study going forward of the whole securities world, the industry of our securities here; recommendations have come forward in the report; there are other types of investigation under way at this present time; I have informed the House that legislation attempting to formulate into law the recommendations which have come forward in the report is being prepared. These proposals will be submitted to government and then, in due course, presented to this House.

A number of the recommendations, I think the hon. member is aware, have a bearing on securities, their handling by the exchange and to what extent it should be—the exchange itself, should be controlled—and how this should be done. I think I would have to leave it at that. The matter is being studied; legislation is being formulated.

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Chairman, I certainly accept the hon. Attorney General's word. Unfortunately, the people of Ontario are not too concerned with the future; they are very much worried, Mr. Chairman, with the past and the present, and the present includes tomorrow, the next day, the next week and the next month. Until this legislation that you promised us is coming comes, and from what I can see it is not going to come until next January, when there will be another sitting of this Legislature—much damage can be done by this large financial corporate body that this government controls and has done practically nothing to look after in the past X number of years.

I have every confidence in the present hon. Attorney General; I know perfectly well that when he stands up and tells us that the studies are going to be looked into and that legislation is coming forth, he means business. But, Mr. Chairman, there are many of us in this Legislature who have been sitting here for many, many years. If you read these criticisms of the securities commission and of the stock exchange, you will find that it has been going on for a long time. We are no further ahead now than we were ten years ago, when I first walked into this Legislature.

So, Mr. Chairman, let us not just come forth with words of what is going to happen in the future; let us have an intelligent discussion; let us acknowledge the fact that the Toronto stock exchange, as far as the mining issues are concerned, is the biggest crap game in the whole world.

Mr. Bryden: Crap games are honest.

Mr. Whicher: Some of them are honest, but this is more than some of the things that happened in the Toronto stock exchange. The word Windfall has been mentioned. As a matter of fact, as a layman and one who has nothing to do with law, I do not even know whether I have the right in this Legislature to talk about something that is under an investigation such as that. But there have been other issues besides Windfall and what has happened was this. The participants of various scandals dealing with stock market manipulations, and so forth, on the Toronto stock exchange have been nothing but crooks and robbers, uttering legitimately under the laws of the province of Ontario, laws which endorse the securities commission which, in turn, endorses the Toronto stock exchange, allowing these people to legally walk inside a vault, take out a million dollars and walk out again. Then they give him a pat on the back. But the only thing, Mr. Chairman, is that they have not taken the million dollars from a cold vault in one of the banks of Canada; the million dollars comes from stockholders—in many instances, little stockholders, little people in this province. I would say that the hon. Attorney General and the government of the day should be very interested in this.

Companies listed on the Toronto stock exchange and, indeed, on any stock exchange in the world, have certain obligations. One of the obligations is that they run what is called an orderly market—in other words, if it goes up or it goes down too fast, they owe an explanation to the public; not in a week, or a month, but immediately. If it goes up too fast, they also owe an explanation to the stockholders, through advertising or through the newspapers, but this is not done.

Mr. Chairman, the hon. Attorney General and many of the hon. members of this House know full well that all they have to do is read the papers for the past year. We will go back to the Timmins discovery, and they will see that many, many companies have jumped up and down like a rubber ball on the stock exchange and there have been no explanations to the public whatsoever.

The hon. Attorney General should give an answer to this; I would certainly hope that he means business when he says that he is reading the Kimber report right through, and that he intends to act on it, because this is something that causes anxiety to all good people—not only in Ontario, but in the whole of Canada.

I remember when the hon. Minister of Economics and Development (Mr. Randall) was giving his report to the House for his estimates just a few weeks ago. I think that he gave the indication that we, as Canadians have not got too much stomach for risk capital. Mr. Chairman, this is complete and utter nonsense. Millions and millions of dollars are thrown into the Toronto stock exchange every day in risk capital, but in putting millions and millions of dollars in, in many instances they are not taken out again. It is no wonder that we, as Canadians, are a little bit leery in putting our money into risk capital for which, in many instances, there is no exploring or drilling, as far as planning is concerned at all. It is very interesting to know that since the Texas Gulf discovery in Timmins, dozens of mines have sprung up overnight and were listed or re-listed on the Toronto stock exchange. But to my knowledge there is only one other mine that has done any real exploratory work there, and where a shaft has been put down.

Thousands and thousands of dollars, Mr. Chairman, have been taken from the public through people sitting down here on the stock exchange; various people who are members of the Toronto stock exchange have taken it from the good people of this province, and if a man goes in and holds up a bank tomorrow morning, with or without a gun, and takes a couple of hundred dollars, he is put in jail, as he should be. But these people are not interested in a couple of hundred dollars; they are interested in hundreds and thousands of dollars and up to now they have been successful in their endeavours.

Mr. Chairman, I, together with all hon. members of the Opposition and, I am sure, all the people of this province, wish the hon. Attorney General and his government every success in cleaning up this mess, because mess is the only proper word that really describes it.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I do not think that anyone would ever accuse the hon. Attorney General of precipitate action. He proceeds always with due deliberation and I have no doubt that, normally, that is a good quality in an Attorney General. At the same time, Mr. Chairman, it can become a vice. It can reach the point where it is barely distinguishable from merely contemplating one's navel. The hon. Attorney General does not want to proceed precipitously, as I understand it, in implementing the recommendations, or in considering the implementation of the recommendations of the Kimber committee. I would point out to the House, Mr. Chairman, that there is nothing new in any of the committee's recommendations of the Kimber committee. The recommendations contained there have been put forward on the financial pages of the newspapers and in the financial press and, to a considerable extent, in this House for years. So it could hardly be said that the hon. Attorney General, who is a knowledgeable man, was caught by surprise, was faced with a radical, new report that required long, careful study and consideration. He was faced with a knowledgeable committee, placing its imprimatur on recommendations that have been in the public view for a long time and which, in my opinion, ought to have been acted upon by this government long ago—or most of them, at any rate. The question arises as to how long are we going to go on considering the same matters that have been considered for years? I would consider it regrettable if legislation to implement the principal recommendations of the Kimber committee were not introduced at this session of the Legislature. Now that does not mean they will necessarily be introduced next week. I have no idea how long the session will go on, but I suspect it will go on till the middle of June at least, and I would think that the hon. Attorney General ought to be prepared to have legislation before this House before that time.

It may be that he will have to give still further consideration to the legislation and bring forth further amendments next year. I cannot see anything wrong with that. Let us proceed with what we know on good authority to be well-founded amendments in the law. Then if further amendments are found to be necessary, we can proceed with them later.

For example, the recommendations of the committee—well, on any of the items that other gentlemen mentioned; insider trading, take-over bids, and so on—why can they not be proceeded with now?

It is possible, I do not feel this way myself, but it is possible that we may not at this moment eliminate primary distribution on the Toronto stock exchange. I think we should; but whether we should or should not, surely we can at least do something about dormant and inactive companies. Something can be done about that and this is one of the keys to this whole gambling racket about which my hon. friend from Bruce was talking. The Kimber committee states on page 60:

Inherent in the existing system are the dangers among others, of market manipulation, false rumours, artificial excitement and inside advantage by promoters, brokers and floor traders.

Now, I do not think we really needed the Kimber committee to tell us that situation existed, but there it is at any rate. It has now been confirmed without any doubt that it exists. Are we going to sit back, contemplate the matter, think about it while the people of this province are still open to that sort of skulduggery?

It is not necessary here, I think, to go into the Windfall inquiry. There is a commissioner at the present time who is considering the matter, but enough has come to light in connection with that inquiry to underline again the sentence that I just read from the Kimber committee's report.

Why do we have to wait to have action taken to correct that sort of thing? On a number of occasions in the past, people have described the Toronto stock exchange as nothing but a gambling casino. I notice that both the Toronto evening newspapers, within the last few days, have editorially used that type of terminology in referring to the exchange. Well, Mr. Chairman, as I understand the operation of regulated gambling casinos where they are permitted to operate lawfully, at least one has an even chance. There is nobody monkeying with the roulette wheel or slowing it down or directing it to a certain spot.

This is not a gambling casino, it is a real clip joint. People who gamble their money do not have a chance. I am not myself much of a man for gambling, but I believe that if somebody is going to gamble, he should have an even chance. He should have as good a chance as anybody else around the table. That is not the way it is on the Toronto stock exchange.

The practice and policy in the past has been to permit, and indeed encourage, a substantial degree of self-regulation by the exchange. I do not object to that principle as such. I think there is a lot to be said for trying to encourage a group of people engaged in a particular type of business to regulate themselves according to certain standards of ethics and to interfere with them by law and to regulate their activities by law only as much as is necessary. But surely it is self-evident, Mr. Chairman, that the Toronto stock exchange and its directors have not lived up to the challenge of the trust bestowed upon them. They simply have failed. They have failed to show themselves capable of self-regulation.

We saw not long ago the incredible episode of this gentleman, Ketchen. I do not know if there is any significance in that name, but we saw a gentleman called Ketchen, a vice-president of the stock exchange, indicating that he had bought certain stocks on a tip of a certain gentleman who wanted certain favours from the exchange, and that the stocks had not panned out very well and that he sold them back to this gentleman at the price he had paid for them. That is certainly not a privilege that very many people would enjoy. In my opinion it is incredible that a vice-president of the Toronto stock exchange would be prepared to say openly in public that he had received this sort of benefit from a person who in return was seeking and obtaining benefits from the exchange, and would say it brazenly and openly without apparently any consciousness that anybody might consider there was anything wrong with it.

That was incredible enough in itself, but then the totally incredible thing was that the board of directors of the Toronto stock exchange rushed into print the next day to say this was fine, there was nothing illegal about it at all. Well, unfortunately, I presume there is nothing illegal about it. But certainly it is—

Mr. Whicher: Legalized robbery!

Mr. Bryden: My hon. friend says it is legalized robbery. It is one phase of it; I suppose this was a particularly small phase. But it certainly demonstrated, I think, beyond all conceivable doubt that the Toronto stock exchange is incapable of regulating itself. It is incapable of enforcing a code of ethics, because it does not understand what ethics are. It has not the vaguest conception of morality; otherwise it could never have condoned the conduct of vice-president Ketchen.

Under those circumstances, Mr. Chairman, I fail to see how we can continue to permit the Toronto stock exchange to go through a mock procedure of regulating itself. It is obvious that the government has to step in. It is obvious that it has to step in as quickly as possible—before the end of this session—to impose some sort of standards of conduct on these people, since they seem incapable of arriving at reasonable standards of conduct themselves.

I think that the hon. Attorney General and the government are derelict in their duty to the people of the province when they fail to bring legislation in at this session to implement all or most of the recommendations of the Kimber committee. I cannot see that there can be any legitimate excuse for inaction.

It is not as if this was something new. There were no proposals put forth here that the government could not have contemplated before now. It has before it now authoritative support for recommendations that have been put forward on many occasions in the past; it ought to act upon them. If it fails to do so, if we have to wait yet another year before there is any action, then one or two things are bound to happen, and I think there may be a combination of both.

We run a great risk that more suckers may be taken to the cleaners at this crooked gambling joint. What is probably even more unfortunate, even in terms of the total development of the country, people will lose confidence in the stock exchange altogether and its legitimate activities will suffer; the legitimate activities which the Kimber committee stressed as being highly necessary in a country which has reached the stage of development which has been reached here, the activity of providing a secondary market for the exchange of securities that have been demonstrated to have a market value. That will suffer, yet in the kind of system under which we operate it is essential that there be such a market. If people lose confidence in that market, then I think that we will have serious consequences to face.

The government by its inaction, its refusal to accept the plain evidence before it, is running the risk that this situation will develop.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, there is a company called Black Cliff Mines Limited that issued a prospectus dated May 7, 1963. It was accepted by the securities commission. A few days after it was accepted, a prominent solicitor who practises in this city wrote to Mr. Kimber suggesting that he had some substantial doubts about the prospectus; he asked Mr. Kimber if the matter could be investigated. Between that date and early 1965, I am not too familiar with what happened; in any event, just prior to January 8, 1965, the same solicitor again wrote to Mr. Kimber, enclosing an affidavit in relation to this prospectus.

The affidavit indicates that there is substantial evidence — in my opinion, in any event, seems to give substantial evidence—that sections 3, 14 and 20 of the prospectus might not be true. That is the story, and it is a very brief one, Mr. Chairman.

To date, people complaining about the authenticity of this prospectus—people who have offered evidence that there is substantial doubt about the above-mentioned three clauses of it, have received no answer; they are not aware of whether any investigation is going on; whether there has been agreement with their allegations. There has been no cancellation of the registration of this company and it would seem to me, sir, that where this matter is drawn to the attention of the securities commission in this fashion, the commission should be prepared to say, within a reasonable time, whether or not they accept the charges that are made.

The evidence is here, and it is in the hands of the commission. I do not know if the hon. Attorney General at this moment can give me an answer, but the allegations that are set forward here are quite serious and there has been no answer at all, although the complaints have been before the commission in one form or another for two years, with better evidence since early January of this year.

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the hon. Attorney General if he would acknowledge if the government has some responsibility where a prospectus is given that is not correct?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Of course we acknowledge such responsibility. I think I heard the hon. member say that the letter actually was May 3, 1965?

Mr. Singer: No, sir.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: When was the last—

Mr. Singer: The letter forwarding the affidavit was January 8, 1965.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I may be able to give the hon. member an answer in the next few moments.

Vote 209 agreed to.

On vote 210:

Mr. Singer: On vote 210—that is the insurance office, Mr. Chairman.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Chairman, in view of the hour, and since the hon. member has some questions in regard to this item, I would move that the committee rise and report certain resolutions and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report it has come to certain resolutions and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow

we will continue with these estimates and go on to The Department of Public Works, Treasury, the civil service commission and Agriculture, in that order.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour) moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 11 o'clock, p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

TUESDAY, MAY 18, 1965

The House met at 3 o'clock, p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: We are always pleased to have visitors to the Legislature and today we welcome as guests students from the following schools: In the west gallery, Lampedea honour students, Brock district high school, Cannington, and Wells Street public school, Aurora; and in the east gallery, St. Theresa's separate school, New Toronto.

Petitions.

Presenting reports by committees.

Mr. M. Hamilton (Renfrew North), from the standing committee on agriculture, presented the committee's report which was read as follows and adopted:

Your committee begs to report the following bill with certain amendments:

Bill No. 135, The Milk Act, 1965.

Mr. Speaker: Motions.

Introduction of bills.

THE MUNICIPAL ACT

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Municipal Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this bill contains a considerable number of amendments, mostly of a tidying-up nature. I think that perhaps the more important ones relate to some of the functions of municipalities and municipal councils, and also the dissolution of police villages under certain circumstances, and power to establish boards of control in towns of over 45,000 in population. Other amendments deal with the acquisition of land for various purposes, including land for parking lots, the matter of licensing of certain kinds of businesses, and a considerable number of matters of this type, including provisions for stopping up highways, other amendments authorize municipalities to permit the owners of property abutting on sidewalks to have certain rights over a portion of the sidewalks.

In due course, sir, this bill will be referred to the committee on municipal law.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I stand in my place on a matter of personal privilege. A Toronto newspaper yesterday carried the heading: "Sopha criticizes liquor board as dictatorship."

This heading was on a news story relating to the presentation of a brief by myself before Mr. J. C. McRuer, sitting upon his Royal commission inquiring into civil rights.

In my brief, I did not use the word dictatorship.

In reference to the liquor licence board, I did not use any words which would justify the innuendo contained in that heading. I have too great a respect for Judge Robb, the chairman of the liquor licence board, who has given many years of valuable public service to the life of this province, to use such a term of opprobrium.

In my brief, I used the liquor licence board as an example of a tribunal from which there is no review in the courts on the merits of the decisions tribunals make. The same observation applies to most of the 100 other tribunals, courts, commissions and agencies operating in this province.

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary) begs leave to present to the House the 1964 annual report of the workmen's compensation board of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Speaker, if I may with your indulgence, and that of the House for a moment make further reference to the amending bill to The Municipal Act, and advise the House that I omitted to mention that among the amendments proposed were amendments relating to the matter of store closing hours within municipalities. There has been a considerable amount of interest in this impending legislation, I might say, so in order that hon. members will know that the amendments are contained within this bill, I thought it would be desirable that I should mention it, because it will be several days before the bill is printed.

Under section 379 (A) of The Municipal Act.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): What section of the amending bill?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: It is known as 28.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The sixteenth order. House in committee of supply; Mr. W. G. Noden in the chair.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

On vote 210:

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Chairman, before we proceed with vote 210; as we were closing the debate with respect to vote 209 in the House yesterday, the hon. member for Downsview (Mr. Singer) had raised a question under vote 209 with respect to the Black Cliff Mines Limited, and an inquiry or a complaint which had been made to the commission, to which it was indicated an answer had not been received. I undertook to get information on the question and to give an answer. I should like to do that at this time, Mr. Chairman, and I have the information, I think, in satisfaction of the inquiry.

I might say that the matter involved in the question first arose in connection with a prospectus filed by Black Cliff Mines Limited with the Ontario securities commission on April 22, 1963. In that filing, the company showed as part of its assets, claims in the province of Quebec. While the prospectus was being processed by our commission, certain information was received from a prior owner of the claims in question, and in attempting to reconstruct that information, the facts appeared to be that a company called, Twentieth Century Mining Company Limited—I think that is the complainant that the hon. member referred to—had staked the claims in question in 1961, and had held them until October 1962. These are the Quebec claims.

At that time The Department of Mines in Quebec treated the claims as having become open for staking. Claims were staked by other individuals, and Twentieth Century claimed that the new stakers then sold the claims to Dysart Holdings, who in turn sold them to Black Cliff Mines Limited. The suggestion was made that the transactions were not at arm's length, but that Dysart and Black Cliff were the alter ego of the stakers.

The information was conveyed to us by the solicitor for Twentieth Century, and he advised that an application was being made to appeal, under the provisions of The Quebec Mining Act, the decision of the Minister of Mines of Quebec, which decision had confirmed the ownership of the claims in Black Cliff Mines Limited.

On receipt of that information, the securities commission of Ontario contacted the solicitors for Black Cliff and received an opinion from Quebec counsel that the Minister's decision—that is the Minister of Mines for the province of Quebec—not having been appealed from within the proper time, was final. This confirmed the letter previously received from The Department of Natural Resources in Quebec that Black Cliff Mines Limited had a clear and unencumbered title to the claims. That letter was sent by the registrar of mines of the province of Quebec.

In addition to that, the securities commission made contact with the Hon. René Levesque, Minister of Natural Resources in Quebec, who answered by letter and telegram, advising that the position taken by the Minister on the subject is final, that is, that the claims belong to Black Cliff Mines Limited.

He also advised that he had no authority under the Quebec law to reopen the matter. On the basis of that information, the prospectus of Black Cliff Mines Limited was accepted on May 21, 1963.

The prospectus so accepted was effective for a period of one year; consequently in May, 1964, it lapsed. A further prospectus was presented for acceptance in July, 1964, and again during the period that the prospectus was being processed by the Ontario securities commission, certain information was received respecting the claims in question, which was to the effect that Twentieth Century had taken injunction proceedings against Black Cliff relating to the title to the claims. Those would be the claims that were in the province of Quebec.

These proceedings were commenced about July 20, 1964, and in those proceedings there were joined as parties with the stakers, the registrar of mining titles of Quebec and other civil servants. Two limited companies which had been the subject of purchases from the stakers—including Black Cliff Mines Limited—and the Hon. René Levesque, were also made parties to the proceedings.

Part of the allegation was that one of the original stakers had conspired with other persons to bribe an employee of the Quebec government so that he would refuse to renew the claims in the names of the plaintiff, Twentieth Century. Upon being advised of this court proceeding which was being taken, apart from The Mining Act of Quebec, the prospectus which had been received—the second prospectus—was not processed further by the Ontario securities commission.

The commission was also advised at that time that one of the stakers and the mining recorder were being prosecuted for fraud and bribery. Those are officials of the Quebec government.

In addition, a request was made to the Ontario securities commission to investigate certain allegations to the effect that a false prospectus had been filed. The commission requested that the allegations be verified by an affidavit, upon which an investigation order could be based under section 21 of our Act. This was, I may point out, Mr. Chairman, our commission requesting the complainant to file an affidavit to support the allegations.

The affidavit requested by the commission was not received and, by a letter from the chairman of the securities commission, Mr. Kimber, dated August 14, 1964, this oversight was pointed out to the solicitor of Twentieth Century. Here we have the commission seeking support for the allegation.

An affidavit dated January 8, 1965, was eventually supplied, which substantially supported previous allegations. Certain inquiries were made and information received. Part of this information was by way of affidavit from officers of Black Cliff Mines Limited, denying the allegations. These inquiries are proceeding. They are not likely to be completed until the determination of the civil proceedings in the province of Quebec which raised the very items to which our investigation is directed.

The prospectus filed in July, 1964, is still being held in abeyance. The criminal proceedings dealt with by the Quebec court and the criminal proceedings which were taken have been dismissed; we are informed that the judge rejected the evidence of the complainant, Twentieth Century.

So the matter, in brief, is that we are investigating; civil action is proceeding in the province of Quebec; criminal proceedings based on allegations made by the complainant have been dismissed; and the commission has found itself in the position of seeking from the complainant information supporting its allegation. So that far from not answering the inquiry, the commission is in the position of seeking further information from the complainant.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Chairman, I thank my hon. friend for that information. He has filled in some of the blanks. On the basis of what he tells me, it seems to me that the matter is proceeding satisfactorily.

Mr. Chairman: On vote 210.

Mr. Singer: Is vote 210 the insurance vote, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I want to make a few remarks about The Department of Insurance. I would suspect, Mr. Chairman, by reason of the reorganization we have had, and the fact that vote 210 deals solely with The Department of Insurance, that there has, in fact, been a physical separation of the catch-all duties that were attached to that department in previous years. Am I correct in that, Mr. Chairman? We have now severed from it used cars, real estate and mortgage brokers and all these other things, so that The Department of Insurance now goes back to its traditional role, looking after insurance for the province of Ontario.

I happened to be glancing through the Parliamentary Guide not too long ago and I noticed that one of the hon. Attorney General's predecessors took great pride in inserting into his biography the fact that in addition to all of his other duties, he was the Minister for The Department of Insurance. That looked nice in the biographical sketch, but it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that even though The Department of Insurance has existed for a considerable number of years, or insurance responsibility has been accepted by this government for a considerable number of years—going back close to 1900, and there are some references to the government being concerned in it even in the 19th century—very little has been done except to place on the statute books a long and complicated statute to have a staff called The Department of Insurance, but really not to give that staff the equipment and machinery, the personnel and the money, to do a proper job.

I would think that anyone who has concerned himself at all about insurance in recent years would notice that there has been something less than overwhelming enthusiasm among the public and the press generally for the way insurance companies appear to be operating. There have been questions asked, and in this day and age when we talk about pension plans, about the role of insurance companies in pension plans, and we are now ready to talk about medical care insurance plans, there is great concern in the minds of many people about what the role of insurance companies is going to be. There has been great discussion about the role of insurance companies so far as automobile insurance and fire insurance is concerned.

When the hon. Attorney General first came into this House as a private member, I recall that we were discussing with the Minister of Transport of that day—I am not sure whether it was the present incumbent (Mr. Haskett) or not—the recommendations of the select committee on automobile insurance. I recall, as well, that the hon. Attorney General, when he was a private member, asked for a copy of that report and I sent it across to him.

We have been hammering away at the hon. Minister of Transport in regard to the recommendations in that report and he has seen fit to cause more investigations to be conducted. We have become very impatient about this and we have suggested from time to time that the recommendations are abundantly clear and should be implemented. But it occurs to me as this vote comes for discussion, Mr. Chairman, whether our criticism was not being addressed to the wrong department, and whether logically it should not go to the Minister who is the head of The Department of Insurance.

What does The Department of Insurance do? Does it supervise, examine, or control existing insurance companies? Is that all they do? Or do they advise the government in connection with its insurance policies? It would seem to me that perhaps they should do both. It would seem to me that they have a supervisory jurisdiction; they should concern themselves about the practices of insurance companies and what is in the policies; how insurance agents are licensed; whether, in fact, the product being sold is as represented, and that sort of thing.

But I would think that they would have an additional role; they should be general adviser to all of the government departments about their insurance practices and about their insurance policies. In fact, sir, the Minister at the head of The Department of Insurance should be the person who would substantially recommend to his colleagues in Cabinet what insurance policies should and could be.

It has been my strong feeling over the years that The Department of Insurance really has not adapted itself to this role, and to a very careful examination of the role of insurance companies in all of these various fields. It would seem to me that The Department of Insurance should be right in the middle of this sort of discussion. There have been long and substantial criticisms in this House and other places about the action of certain insurance companies. I have yet to hear anyone rise in this House and say that our administration in the government of Ontario so directs, controls or suggests to insurance companies that this sort of thing does not happen.

What I am urging, Mr. Chairman, is a greater responsibility in The Department of Insurance for getting into the control and supervision of insurance companies. It must have come to the hon. Minister's ears that people are unhappy about premium rates for automobile insurance; I am sure he is in no different a position than his colleague in Alberta, the Hon. Mr. Gordon Taylor, the Highways Minister, who quite recently assailed surcharges on car insurances. We have heard that sort of thing here many, many times. This sort of control and jurisdiction lies properly within The Department of Insurance, but to date the department has neglected not only to take advantage of the powers that it has, but has really seemed to pass this whole problem by on the other side.

I have referred on many occasions, Mr. Chairman, to those sections of The Insurance Act that give to the government the power and the duty to supervise, control and listen to complaints about premiums. Those sections, as I am sure my hon. friend is aware, are sections 336, 337, 338 and 339 of The Insurance Act. Sections 337 and 338 of The Insurance Act have been in that statute since 1924, and section 339 has been there since 1930. Each one of those three sections has as a part of it which does not come into force until a day to be named by the Lieutenant-Governor by his proclamation. In other words, those three sections mean absolutely nothing until the Lieutenant-Governor in Council has chosen to proclaim them. From 1924 to 1965 is 41 years, and from 1930 to 1965 is 35 years, so those sections have sat moribund on the statute book for, in the one instance, 41 years, and the other, 35 years.

One can hardly escape the conclusion as a result of this, Mr. Chairman, that the government seriously has not been interested in the powers that are given in these sections of The Insurance Act, because through all these many years no government has ever chosen to proclaim these sections as being in force.

There was a nine-year period where there was a responsibility other than with the representatives of the party opposite today. But certainly for the last 22 years, the responsibility has resided with my hon. friends who presently occupy the government benches, and they have not chosen to exercise their discretion to proclaim these sections.

It would seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that there is a big task to be done. I had the privilege and opportunity of addressing a group of underwriters in this city a few days ago. They asked me to come to them and be as critical as I could, and I was very critical insofar as my understanding of their approach to the business. It was my suggestion that they have a real task, in co-operation with government, to set their house in order; to have government help them set their house in order, because I do not think it does any good at all to allow this continued harping and criticism to go on in this very important industry without any remedies actually being effected.

In this, there is a clear distinction between our views and the views of our hon. friends on the left. They say the government could run the insurance business far better, and I am sure that before the afternoon is over, my friend, the hon. member for York South (Mr. MacDonald) will be elaborating on that and I do not want to make his speech for him. He will do it for himself.

We believe, Mr. Chairman, that this is an important industry. We believe there is no reason for the government to get into this business unless it turns out to be such a dismal failure that this is the only way to save it. We see no necessity to put the government into business where it is going to take away—and the hon. member for High Park (Mr. Cowling) should be interested in this—the livelihood of perhaps five to eight or nine thousand agents; deprive their families of positions that they are entitled to because of the work of the breadwinner and so on. But we do believe that there is a lot of work to be done within the insurance business itself, and within government, to set the house in order and to bring this industry into the public reputation that I think it deserves.

But when we look at these sections in the Act and see that in over 30 years they have not been proclaimed, we wonder about the government's seriousness in their approach to this industry.

I am sure the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) will remember with me when we sat on a committee which the hon. Provincial Treasurer chaired, and we brought the then superintendent of insurance before us, and we asked him what his role was in examining new rate schedules. He said, "Well, I look at them." And we asked him whether during the number of years he had been in office he had ever questioned them. He said, "Well, occasionally I asked a question." And then we asked him, "Have you ever suggested any change?" He could not recall any change ever having been suggested.

When the industry comes to the superintendent of insurance with their rate schedules—and I think they only do it as a courtesy because the pertinent sections here in the Act have never been proclaimed—they are armed with what they call their "little green book," and they are also armed with the assistance and advice of actuaries. It is very difficult, I think it would be almost impossible, Mr. Chairman, for anyone in the office of the superintendent of insurance to competently or adequately argue, criticize, suggest or recommend, in the face of the best advised and best informed actuarial talent that is available to the industry, but is not available to government.

In other words, what I am saying is that I think it is a shocking omission in the government's conduct of this office of The Department of Insurance that there is not a government actuary on full-time strength of that branch, so that he can prepare a competent and an adequate analysis of the various matters that are presented by the actuaries of the insurance companies, and so that he can be in a position adequately to advise government insofar as their course of conduct should be.

I think this is obvious. I am not suggesting, Mr. Chairman, that the actuaries for the insurance companies cook the books, or that they deliberately present the wrong picture. But I am suggesting that since those people are employees of the industry, they are going to present their facts in the light that will look best for their employers, and you cannot blame them for that. These are well-trained people. They are unique in their field. The government is not able to cope with this because the government does not have the same sort of advice. In fact, when the government gets into this kind of a discussion it goes with one or both hands tied behind its back. It really is not competent to discuss rate schedules or rate structures at all.

It would seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that now that The Department of Insurance is standing by itself, the government has a duty to place in that department at least one well-trained actuary so that he will be able to advise, to suggest and to criticize.

These sections that I referred to in The Insurance Act have been noted by the committee that I also referred to earlier, headed by the hon. Provincial Treasurer, and at least on two occasions—possibly three—the committee unanimously recommended that these sections be proclaimed.

I think the sentiments I am expressing in this regard, and the type of government supervision that I am suggesting, is endorsed by the hon. Provincial Treasurer; certainly this is the impression I gathered from listening to his remarks on this committee. I think that the government would be well advised to accept the responsibility for this type of an investigation, because in that way the government will be accepting its role and its responsibility as set out in The Insurance Act. It will be fulfilling its role insofar as the public is concerned. It will be saying to the public, "We think these rates are reasonable and logical."

But we are not going to get this sort of thing. So we must go on assailing them, as the Hon. Mr. Gordon Taylor has assailed in Alberta, as the hon. member for York South has assailed here many times, and with good reason. It is very hard to understand and explain some of the peculiar rate structures that exist, particularly in the automobile insurance business. And fire insurance is another aspect. It is very hard to understand and explain, Mr. Chairman, even though the insurance industry nominally has said, so far as automobile insurance is concerned, "We will give insurance to anybody whom the Minister of Transport allows to go on the highways."

What does that mean? If they give insurance to anybody whom the Minister of Transport allows to go on the highways, you would think they would give it at a rate which is within the reach of those people to whom the Minister of Transport gives a licence. But in so many cases that come to our attention, we find that the surcharges—the additional fees involved in getting into the assigned risk, the involvement in the various categories; the insurance company's checking insofar as points are concerned—make it almost prohibitive for an individual to buy insurance and continue his right to drive on the road.

So I say, Mr. Chairman, that we have got to take a very serious look at this whole procedure, and the nominal titles under which it parades at the moment, which in many cases, mean absolutely nothing.

It would seem to me that when the surcharges get above what is a reasonable rate, and what an individual driver can be reasonably expected to pay, that the insurance companies are saying, "You cannot get on the road because we are going to make your premiums so high that you could not possibly afford to have insurance."

Then, I think I want to deal just for a moment with the general recommendations made by the select committee. As I say, it has been my experience, having tried two or three years now to get an opinion from the Minister of Transport, that the hon. Minister of Transport is really loath to give any opinion on it himself. Perhaps my remarks should have been addressed to the office of the Attorney General all along. Sir, you have had the opportunity to read the report, and in its recommendations up to a point—with a minor divergence by the hon. member from the NDP who wanted to go somewhat further in one respect—it is a unanimous report that there be a system of compensation without fault established, and it be in accordance with a schedule.

The facts are fairly simple. This committee worked long and hard and it was an excellent committee. It received opinions in this particular field from a committee of the benchers of the law society. It received opinions in this regard from the insurance industry itself; it received opinions in this regard from all of the people who could be concerned with this particular aspect of the development of insurance. Those opinions were substantially unanimous, Mr. Chairman, and were unanimously reflected in the report of the committee. Yet two or three years have now elapsed, and all we are getting is a statistical analysis emanating, apparently, from The Department of Transport, because the hon. Minister of Transport I am afraid, has gotten himself into something that either he does not like or he does not understand. So he is finding excuse after excuse for not dealing with it.

I make an appeal, Mr. Chairman, through you to the hon. Attorney General. For goodness sake, if there is not going to be any action on this report out of The Department of Transport, let The Department of Insurance take over. Let one of its roles be as adviser to the government in connection with insurance; let it do something about this report.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the government has at hand a vehicle—The Department of Insurance—which it has inadequately used over many, many years. The time is now that the government should accept its responsibilities under The Insurance Act; that it should accept its responsibilities insofar as the public is concerned; that it should concern itself with the way the insurance business is being carried on to a far greater extent than it does; and that in co-operation with this important business it should begin to explain to the public the government's concern about how the insurance business is run.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Mr. Chairman, in this day of the locust when death and suffering stalk our highways to an extent greater than in any previous period in the history of this province, I wish to point to what I conceive to be an injustice in respect of giving compensation to persons injured on highways within The Insurance Act. I am told from a person of great authority that in Ontario only approximately 43 per cent—I emphasize that figure—of those who suffer injury to themselves, or sustain property damage on our highways in Ontario, recover any form of compensation. Only 43 per cent.

The majority—57 per cent—of those who sustained injury, loss and damage on the highways received nothing. Of course, in the 57 per cent, there is a large number of gratuitous passengers. In this, enlightened Ontario, the province of opportunity, the hub of the country, is the only province of ten that gives no relief to gratuitous passengers.

Even Newfoundland gives relief to gratuitous passengers; only Ontario denies them recovery. It is interesting to know the history of how that came about. I will take leave to relate it.

My predecessor in this House, the Hon. Charles McCrea, in 1933 chaired a select committee which looked into much the same matters of reference as the select committee my hon. friend from Downsview just referred to. He recommended that gratuitous passengers be put outside the ambit of those who recovered—that is to say, until 1934 gratuitous passengers could recover in Ontario. The government of the day took no action on the McCrea report. Mr. Hepburn acceded to the office of Prime Minister in 1934. The story goes that in 1918—no, after the war; around 1921 or 1922—Mr. Hepburn had given a lift to two soldiers who were hitchhikers. They thereupon became gratuitous passengers. He was in a motor vehicle accident. They sued him and recovered a judgment. Hardly was he in office in 1934, with my hon. friend from Grey South (Mr. Oliver), when he enacted the recommendation of the McCrea report to put gratuitous passengers outside the ambit of the law, where they have remained ever since.

It is an interesting story. I am told it has great validity, and that that is how it came about.

Fifty-seven per cent of people in Ontario recover no form of compensation for injury loss and damage sustained on our highways. I have no responsibility for Mr. Hepburn; I take no responsibility. Let history judge him. This is a new era. Let me tell you about one group that recover nothing under this Insurance Act. I wrote to the hon. Attorney General about this group. As is usual, he kindly replied; he had taken the matter up with his officials. I know that within the bureaucracy—I do not use bureaucracy as a term of opprobrium; I mean those who work in the civil service and administer the affairs of government—there is an ingrained resentment of suggestion from outside about changing statutes. They do not like people to suggest omissions or improvements. I have come to believe that. The hon. Attorney General's letter indicated to me that the bureaucracy did not see the problem, or did not feel that the problem needed rectification. I am going to relate the facts against this background.

Every owner of a motor vehicle in Ontario is liable for loss and damage caused by the operation of that vehicle on a highway in Ontario; unless his—the owner's—vehicle is out of his possession without his consent, he is liable. The owner takes out an insurance policy for public liability and property damage. The Act provides, in section 213, that every person who has the owner's vehicle with his consent is an unnamed insured. That person is insured as if he were named in the policy. That is what it says in 213. The person driving the vehicle is insured.

Previous to the enactment of that section in the 1930s, there was a case which went all the way to the Supreme Court of Canada. The court, bound by the classical stultifying concepts of the law of contract, held that the insurance company was not liable because the person driving the motor vehicle was not a named insured—that is to say, there was no privity of contract between the driver and the insurance company. That was a very unjust decision. But the court was bound by the hoary law of contract, which had been in that state for at least 300 or 400 years. So the Legislature changed that and said that everybody who has an owner's vehicle with his consent is insured by that policy of indemnity, whether he is named in the policy or not.

There is another section that provides that the person injured through the driver's negligence may bring an action against the insurance company to pay the money under the policy over to him, and be credited against the judgment that he has won against the negligent driver and/or owner. Against that background, the person who has sustained damage through another's negligence—the widow at home waiting with supper for the husband who is killed by the drunken motorist on his way home—may maintain an action against the insurance company for that money.

Now I turn to the part of a PL and PD policy known as medical payment. Many hon. members of the House have paid an additional premium under their policy for a medical payment, usually in the sum of $500; that is the normal sum. The reason for that coverage, of course, is to provide some relief to the gratuitous passenger who is riding in the vehicle. The insured, being a responsible citizen, protects himself for a coverage normally of $500 so that if the person riding in his vehicle was injured he can take that money, go to the person and say: "Apply this toward your medical and hospital bills."

That, of course, is a responsible action. The sad part of the story is that the company, having taken the premium for the medical payment coverage and undertaken that medical payment, cannot be made to pay it. That is the state of the law. Nobody can enforce it. If the company takes the position that they do not want to pay the $500 for medical payment or, indeed, toward the cost of the funeral of a gratuitous passenger who may have been injured, it does not have to. If it pays the $500, it is purely ex gratia; purely something akin to a charitable act on its part.

Within this statute, there is no place that gives the gratuitous passenger any right to enforce the payment of the medical payment coverage to him. If he sues the driver, he being a gratuitous passenger, then he is met with section 1051 of The Highway Traffic Act—I hope that is the right section—that denies recovery to a gratuitous passenger. The defence of the company is that we pay only for legal liability; there is no legal liability to a gratuitous passenger, accordingly we do not have to pay the $500 medical payment coverage. If he sues the insurance company for the $500, there is no comparable section in The Insurance Act to the one I have referred to where the third party with a judgment for indemnity—that is, the person outside the car, the person hit on the street by the drunken motorist—may maintain his claim against the insurance company directly.

I state that with some assurance, because I know of a case where the gratuitous passenger died in an accident. The driver also died. Nobody took out letters of administration for the driver, he having no estate. Three days before the limitation period expired, which is one year, the father of the gratuitous passenger consulted his solicitors. Three days is too late to have an administrator ad litem appointed for the deceased driver; you cannot do it in three days.

The only alternative if any recovery was to be gained was to sue the insurance company directly, to attempt to force payment. By analogizing from section 213 over to the later sections, around 220 to 225, analogizing the right of the injured third party to the gratuitous passenger—I hope I have made myself clear—an action was brought against the insurance company. They had accepted the premium, there was the coverage of $500 and by analogy and by argument that the Legislature must have intended, the Legislature permits companies in this Act to have the medical payment feature. They are not put in there at the instance of the company, it is permitted by the Legislature to put that medical payment feature in this Act.

The Legislature must have intended that if a company sells coverage and accepts premiums for the coverage, then somebody must have the right to force payment of it. That would seem to be a logical proposition. "Ixnay," said the court. "No," said the court, there is no privity of contract. Listen to the two propositions on which the case fell.

There is no privity of contract between the gratuitous passenger and the insurance company. The gratuitous passenger did not pay the premium for the medical coverage feature; he is not named in the policy. The company never heard of him before. No privity of contract. Accordingly, the action must fail on that ground.

Secondly, the gratuitous passenger could not sue the owner for payment of the medical payment coverage because of the section in The Highway Traffic Act which absolves the owner from liability to the gratuitous passenger.

Thirdly, if the owner-driver of the vehicle survived, or indeed his executors or administrators standing in his shoes, they could not sue the insurance company nor could he sue them. The owner, the driver, cannot sue the insurance company to compel them to pay over to his gratuitous passenger the $500 medical payment, because there is no liability. The owner-driver has no liability to his gratuitous passenger.

What kind of a ridiculous system of law is that? Where does all that redound in common sense? If insurance is sold and premiums are accepted for it, surely it must follow in mandatory fashion that somebody can enforce the payment of the insurance coverage sold? There is the state of the law in regard to this medical payment feature.

Compare it to life insurance. My policies are payable to my wife. I pay the premiums. She did not make the contract with the insurance company; she had nothing to do with it. She never puts up a dime for the payment of my insurance premium. When the day comes that I go to my great and eternal reward, and if the company does not promptly pay my insurance, my wife may maintain an action.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): She is named in the contract, though.

Mr. Sopha: Not necessarily. Suppose my policies are made payable to my estate. My executors may come forward and maintain an action. That is in this Act, too. So I say my plea is that if the medical payment feature means anything at all in that policy, let somebody enforce it. Give somebody the power to enforce the payment of it.

It is appropriate that I should name the company. You have all guessed the company that resisted the payment of the $500. I give you three guesses and almost everybody in the House knows the name of the company. Other companies, without argument, would pay over the money rather than fight about it. But Allstate takes a rigid line. They go to the great extent of sending lawyers from Toronto into the north to argue about $500.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the hon. member would permit me to ask a question? I understood earlier in your remarks that you were citing what I thought was an actual case. I wonder if I could have the citation of that? I am very interested.

Mr. Sopha: Yes. A district court action commenced in the district of Sudbury, Calben against Allstate Insurance Company. Tried at Sudbury, decided by Hugill, a great and old friend of the hon. Attorney General, the district court judge of Rainy River.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: And when?

Mr. Sopha: Decision rendered in late 1964. The decision is in the record at Sudbury.

I am not going to make a security council case out of this. I merely say let us amend the statute in respect of that. All it requires is a little amendment somewhere around section 220 to say that the gratuitous passenger may maintain an action against the company for the payment of the medical payment feature.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I do not know what luck we are going to have with the hon. Attorney General in the broader considerations that were raised by the hon. member for Downsview, or the specific considerations raised by the hon. member for Sudbury, but I want to come back to another area of specific consideration. The hon. Attorney General will not be surprised to learn that it is car insurance.

After I put on the record half-a-dozen of the cases that had been drawn to my attention throughout the period from last fall until the end of January or early February this year—I put them on the record during the Throne debate—I was rather curious at two reactions. One was the hon. Attorney General's personal comment to me afterwards that he was a little surprised that all these reports came to me and not to him. Also a number of other government hon. members who may or may not be in the House today said that they had received a great many letters indicating the kind of abuse that I had put on the record; they felt something should be done about it.

I want, at the outset, Mr. Chairman, to make this basic plea. The hon. member for Downsview is correct that there is a distinction between the desirable objective as sought by this party in terms of car insurance, namely, a public car insurance policy in which the insurance would be sold along with the licence, and the policy of the Liberal and the Conservative parties, which is to handle it through the private insurance companies.

In my view, what is happening today represents the growing body of experience which justifies even more conclusively the case for public insurance. However, before I get into detail I would like to urge the hon. Attorney General or the hon. member for Downsview and others—all those who wish to live within the framework of the existing system—that even if you cannot see your way clear to move towards a public car insurance system, something must be done within the framework of the existing system to cope with these obvious abuses that have emerged.

Without going into all of the detailing I did during my Throne speech, in essence what has happened is that the car insurance companies are increasingly resorting to the practice of finding out, by the $1 payment to The Department of Transport, the driving record of a person, then of notifying him directly or through his agent that as of such-and-such a date his policy is going to be cancelled because they have come to the conclusion that he is a bad risk.

In those letters that I placed on the record, there were specific cases of people who had no more than four, five or six demerit points. In some instances they had not made a single claim on their insurance policy, yet their company saw fit to get this abstract of the driving record from The Department of Transport and to arrogate unto itself the right to arbitrarily decide that this person could not henceforth get insurance at the normal rates. By their action he, in effect, becomes blackballed in the fraternity of the insurance industry, and the only way he can get coverage is to go to assigned risk at two, three or four times the normal cost. I gave a specific case of those costs where they sometimes go up to $400, $500 or $600.

In effect, Mr. Chairman, what has happened is that the car insurance companies have set up their own demerit system. They are above the law as established by this Legislature. They make the decision as to when the insurance is going to be cut off, and it has no relationship to the driver's legal right to continue to drive on the highway. In practice, their law supersedes the law of the province of Ontario.

Even if I went no further, surely here is the situation that the hon. Attorney General should take a look at. I do not know by what argument or by what reasoning one can tolerate the proposition that any group of people, essentially irresponsible in that they are responsible to nobody other than themselves, can set up their own law which shall supersede the regular law of the province.

Let me give you a few new cases to refresh the memory of the House and the hon. members of the kind of thing that is happening. I have here a letter received from a man in Cobourg on March 8. I am not going to give his name, but I would be glad to pass the letter to the hon. Attorney General if he wishes it. Let me read this letter, or parts of it:

I am a Canadian citizen. I have driven a car and truck since 1924 and have never had an accident. Never been stopped by the police nor even a parking ticket against my licence.

I would interject here, Mr. Chairman, that here is just about as close to the perfect driver as I have heard of.

I carried liability insurance with an insurance company and had a fire. On getting it fixed I was charged 25 per cent of the cost, so the agent and I had a few words, so I said I would insure with somebody else. He then told me if I did he would stop my insurance wherever I got it. Since then I insured with Allstate and paid the premium and within the month I was turned down as a risk.

The word had gotten around in the insurance fraternity.

I then insured with Canadian Home Assurance of Montreal and was carried for three years. Now they have stopped the insurance and as I have to have a truck for my work, I need the insurance. I have been to the police here to see if they could give me any reason for the cancellation and they have shed no light on the situation but the chief of police has said he would gladly write a few lines stating that there is absolutely nothing against my licence. The car and truck were always in perfect running order; the wife and I are the only drivers. She has had a driver's licence since 1925 and has never had an accident or a mark against her licence either.

I am a painter and have to rely on the truck for my living and I need insurance but feel I should not have to pay for risk insurance when I have no demerit points against my licence.

Mr. Chairman, I submit that that case is solid, that this man has been done an injustice and if the insurance companies are acting illegally, I think the hon. Attorney General should take a look at the law.

Let me give you one or two other cases. This is from Toronto earlier this year, and I am going to refer with initials to two people in this letter. Again, I would be glad to show it to the hon. Attorney General, but I do not want to involve the insurance agencies.

I might say to my hon. friend from Downsview who referred to the 8,000 insurance agents as being opposed to public insurance that he might be astounded, together with the hon. member for High Park, to know the number of insurance agents today who would be delighted to get out of car insurance; who are fed to the teeth with the problems involved in car insurance, and who are so increasingly indignant at the injustice involved in some of the practices in car insurance that as loyal members of the industry they would like to rescue the insurance industry from the kind of opprobrium it is falling into because of the practices in the car insurance industry.

Mr. J. H. White (London South): Impossible.

Mr. MacDonald: It is not, and that is one of the reasons why they suggest that we get out. The answer, of course, to my hon. friend over here as to why they do not quit is because they want to stay in the insurance industry and they know they can make a living out of the remainder of the coverage being sold.

Mr. White: The hon. member for Woodbine gave a long speech proving how highly profitable it was—

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): When was that?

Mr. MacDonald: This letter has reference to Mr. A and Mr. B. Mr. A is a man who came from Europe; I learned for the first time that apparently insurance companies look with a jaundiced eye on an application for insurance from anybody from Europe or the Near East, on the assumption that if they come from those areas they are automatically bad drivers.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): Were you ever in Rome or Paris?

Mr. MacDonald: I am quoting from the experience of only one insurance agent. I add that because it may not be the general picture, but in his experience he has found it increasingly difficult. In this instance, the man finally got insurance through some pretty vigorous efforts on the part of this independent insurance agent. On January 26, 1962, he had property damage for $35. This occurred when the insured hit a car in a parking lot. Two and a half years later, July 11, 1964, he sustained a serious accident; there was a rear end collision and there was $900 damage. Admittedly, this is a serious claim, but this kind of thing is happening more and more frequently on our crowded highways. The insurance agent received a notice from the insurance company saying that as of such-and-such a date, this policy is going to be cancelled. But, Mr. Chairman, I ask you to consider this: There was a friend of Mr. A, whom I shall call Mr. B, who also came from across the seas. He got his insurance coverage because he was a friend of Mr. A, and through the intercession of the insurance agent. When the company cancelled the policy of Mr. A, they also, in the same paragraph in the same letter, said:

Regarding the file for Mr. B, we note that when this was written last October, the reference was made on the application to this policy for Mr. A, and in view of the experience under the A policy, we would ask that you please return Mr. B's policy number . . . for pro rata cancellation.

In other words, he had his policy cancelled through guilt by association—no result of accident, and no relation to anything else.

Mr. Chairman, how far above the law can you get in terms of unjust and discriminatory action than that? And what does our Department of Insurance do when that kind of thing exists and is drawn to their attention? At the moment, the answer is nothing, as far as I know.

I have here a copy of the March 10 issue of the Northern Times, a paper published in Kapuskasing, so that we will not be ignoring the north. This is delightful; let me read it. It is a vignette of life in the north:

Several weeks ago we commented on the inequities of a law which would convict a person who failed to render assistance to a policeman when requested to do so, particularly if that assistance happened to be required to quell a brawl.

Readers will recall that such a case arose in Kapuskasing. A young fellow was sitting in a restaurant drinking a cup of coffee and minding his own business—or trying to—when a fight broke out on the other side of the premises. The proprietor called for the police and a lone officer appeared. He was unable to handle the miscreant and he asked for help from the observer. As would be the case with most people, the lad gratefully declined the invitation to fight and he was promptly charged with failing to assist.

In his subsequent court action he was convicted and sentenced. He now has a criminal record, but that is not the end of the story. Last week the insurance company which covered his car learned that they had a desperate criminal on their books. It matters not that the car was not involved in any way in a court action, the insurance company cancelled his insurance anyway; on general principles, we presume.

Like a lot of other insurance company regulations, this move would seem to put the private citizens in the situation of always giving and never receiving anything but unfair treatment, that is.

I know the hon. Attorney General could not and would not defend that kind of action, but it is happening, and with increasing frequency.

The cases that I put on the record in January and February are not the rule as yet, and I am not going to suggest that they are; but certainly they happen with increasing frequency.

Here is another case. I am not going to defend the driving record in this instance, Mr. Chairman, but I have just sent a note to the hon. Minister of Transport over there because there is one angle that comes under his department that rather intrigues me. This is the instance of a man who wrote to me with regard to his son who had his driving licence cancelled for a six-month period for loss of 11 demerit points—not 15—

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. MacDonald: Right! I am curious to know on what grounds, legally, The Department of Transport can cancel it at 11 demerit points. I understand that all losses were with regard to speeding; it was not drunken driving, or impaired driving or anything of that nature.

However—

Mr. Singer: Without any demerit points he can—

Mr. MacDonald: He can?

Mr. Singer: Yes.

Mr. MacDonald: Maybe he did exercise his discretion. He looks like a kindly man, as I see him reclining in his seat over there, but maybe he has his vicious moments.

Let me proceed. This insurance company wrote to the father and indicated that they were willing to give collision insurance to the three cars involved in this family—the husband, the wife and the son, who was working and who drove, incidentally, as part of his work. But since the husband had car insurance for his and his wife's car elsewhere, he was not interested in this big deal that was offered to him. But the big deal involved this, Mr. Chairman, and it is to this that I draw the attention of the hon. Attorney General. The Department of Transport cancelled the licence for six months, but the insurance company arbitrarily said that they would not give them collision coverage for a year. In other words they say, in effect, that—by what right or by which law, I do not know—that they are going to extend the legal cancellation of this government, through The Department of Transport, for another six months. It is in the category, once again, of this being above the law—they are making their own law.

Let me give you another example of how far this has gone, Mr. Chairman. I will not quote the agency, but the date is April 1965. I will name the company—it is Canadian Indemnity—which wrote to a certain agent in the city of Toronto. Let me read the second paragraph of the letter:

In the past two years our automobile experience has not been satisfactory and as a result we are no longer writing as new business any persons who have been involved in an accident during the last three years.

So there they are arbitrarily saying—

Mr. A. H. Cowling (High Park): What is wrong with that?

Mr. MacDonald: I will come to that in a minute, if you do not grasp what is wrong with it.

Mr. Cowling: I will wait.

Mr. MacDonald: Right.

Mr. Bryden: You would not grasp—

Mr. Cowling: I will get it.

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Minister of Highways): Do you never get any nice mail over there?

Mr. MacDonald: What do you mean? Do you mean mail saying that this is a fine government or something? Is this your definition of nice mail?

I am sorry, my capacity to live on thank-you letters is a little limited. I get a little sick after a while; it is a thin diet. I am glad to get letters that reveal to me the realities of the difficulties of living under a Tory government in the province of Ontario—because of their sins of omission and commission—

Mr. Cowling: The hon. member is the only one who gets them.

Mr. Singer: Oh, I would not say that.

Mr. MacDonald: I would feel flattered if—

Mr. Cowling: I wish the hon. member for Woodbine would wake up—

Mr. Bryden: Do not worry, I am usually awake.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, in addition to drawing to the attention of the hon. Minister in these specific cases—the fact that now insurance companies are, in effect, saying they will give no insurance to anybody who has had an accident for the past three years—I draw to his attention something else. I must confess, once again, this is something I was not aware of.

I received from somebody in the industry—

Mr. Cowling: They must be dumb, the people who send you letters.

An hon. member: They must be.

Mr. MacDonald: No, they went to the insurance underwriters' convention and they watched some of the leaders in action and they came to the conclusion that they were dumb, and they are smartening up now.

An hon. member: Imagine that.

Mr. MacDonald: If I may quote from this letter: "The assigned risk plan, however, is not the only market for these risks."

In other words, what I have been saying up until now is that a man was forced to go onto a signed risk when this arbitrary action was taken by the car insurance company.

Mr. Cowling: Maybe he should be off the road.

Mr. MacDonald: But this is not the only market for these risks. About three years ago, a company called the Adanac—which incidentally is a subsidiary, a division, of the London and Midland Insurance Company, located at 376 Richmond Street, London, Ontario. I quote:

About three years ago, a company called the Adanac began writing insurance for any driver who was having difficulty getting insurance due to accidents or convictions. The advantage of this company over the assigned risk market is that the insured can also get collision coverage, along with the minimum limits of $35,000 for public liability and property damage.

The premium is based on points figured from the number of accidents, convictions, etc. For example, a young man picking up a careless driving charge, one speeding ticket and an improper parking conviction would have a premium of $344.00 for bodily injury and property damage. If there had been an accident at fault in the last three years, the premium would be $448.00.

Within the last year—

if I may skip further down the letter:

—we have a new company writing this type of insurance.

In other words, this is a second company that has emerged in the field writing insurance specifically in this high risk area of people who have been shoved out into this assigned risk plan, or that is the only other alternative.

It is called the Pacific Automobile and Fire Insurance company and is located at 60 Yonge Street, Toronto. On their prohibitive list is anyone who has not had an accident or a conviction record—

Mr. Cowling: Well, what is wrong with that?

Mr. MacDonald: It indicates that you have insurance companies that will exploit every area.

Mr. Cowling: That is all right; that is fine.

Mr. MacDonald: Right!

The premium for a conviction as shown above will be $328; without an accident and for two accidents within the three-year period, the premium would be $410—and so on. In other words, Mr. Chairman, I say to the hon. Attorney General this high risk field has developed until you have a group of insurance companies that are coming in and offering insurance at the high risk area, throwing in collision coverage so there is an alternative to assigned risk, and even refusing to take insurance from anybody except a person who has been designated as a high risk—

Mr. Cowling: That is fine; the others should maybe not be on the road.

Mr. MacDonald: Now I come to some suggestions and conclusions that I want to raise with the hon. Attorney General.

I want to suggest to the hon. Attorney General that within the framework of this system with which he presumably is happy, he and the Liberals along with him, even within the framework of this system something has got to be done. Whether the hon. Attorney General wants to do it through the superintendent of insurance or not, I do not know; and what conclusion he wants to come to, I do not know. But I would suggest at least this: We should remove the anomaly of insurance companies being able in effect to establish their own demerit system and establish it above the demerit system of the province of Ontario.

If the province of Ontario, in its wisdom, decides that a person who has not acquired 15 demerit points, retains the right to drive on the highway, I would suggest that the insurance companies should not have the right to arbitrarily cancel policies or arbitrarily refuse to grant insurance to people who have had an accident within the last three years. In effect they should have to live up to the law of the province as it is established in this provincial Legislature. It seems to me that this is plain common sense. That is point one that I want to draw to the attention of the hon. Minister.

The second thing that I want to query him on, because I am increasingly puzzled about this, in a reply to a question that I put on the order paper, the last sentence of the reply reads as follows, in reference to insurance companies' costs:

These surveys that have established that on an average 37 per cent of the premium dollar is required for expenses which would include a profit margin or not more than 2.5 per cent.

Mr. Chairman, I draw your attention to the fact that it says "37 per cent of the premium dollar is required for expenses." This is from a survey.

Now, two years ago, as I noted in my Throne speech this year, my colleague, the hon. member for Woodbine, asked of the hon. Attorney General's predecessor, Mr. Cass, some questions with regard to car insurance. After he had asked them, the then Attorney General sent him a copy of a reply he got from the then superintendent of insurance. In that memorandum, a copy of which Mr. Cass sent to the hon. member for Woodbine, dated December 26, 1962, the final paragraph reads as follows:

The allowable amount required for expenses has been established at 37 per cent of the premium income.

Now I am curious, Mr. Chairman. This year's reply says that "surveys indicate that the charge is 37 per cent"; the statement of two or three years ago indicated that "the allowable amount was 37 per cent."

I have spoken to people who are familiar with the insurance industry, including the hon. member for Riverdale (Mr. Renwick) who says he knows of no law that requires that companies cannot go beyond 37 per cent for expenses.

Mr. Singer: Those sections I referred to would give them the power, but they have never proclaimed it.

Mr. MacDonald: All I am saying is that they have not specified any limit for expenses.

Mr. Singer: No, they have not any right to until they proclaim those sections.

Mr. MacDonald: If I interpret that statement of the superintendent of insurance three years ago as meaning that the department had formally or informally, legally or illegally, fixed a limit of 37 per cent, I again draw to the attention of the House the record of the last two years, for which figures are available.

In 1962, the loss ratio, that is the percentage of the premium dollar that was paid back in claims—was 69.5. The expenses for that year were 40.3, for a total of 109.8. In other words, Mr. Chairman, what the insurance companies as a whole are claiming is that out of every dollar in premium that they took in, they paid out either in expenses or in claims $1.09.8.

In 1963 the loss ratio, namely, what was paid back on claims out of the premium dollar, was 76.2. Their expenses that year were 42.1, for a total of 118.3. So, Mr. Chairman, the insurance companies would have us believe that in 1963, out of every dollar they took in they paid out $1.18 on automobile insurance. This, incidentally, does not take into account investment revenue that they got perhaps on premiums and things of that nature, so that this is not the whole story.

Mr. L. Letherby (Simcoe East): On automobile insurance!

Mr. Singer: It does not take any of it in.

Mr. MacDonald: In short, the insurance companies are losing money! If they are losing money this badly, what puzzles me is why they are so desperately anxious to stay in the field.

Mr. R. M. Whicher (Bruce): They do not all.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, in a few instances they have been instructed by the superintendent of insurance that they had better get out. I was told by one of the officials in The Department of Insurance that two or three companies in the last year were advised that their financial position was coming into jeopardy and they were advised to get out of car insurance. I do not imagine that they can be legally forced out. I do not know what the power of the superintendent of insurance is in this connection.

But what I want to draw to your attention—apart from this very intriguing situation as to how much the insurance companies are losing, Mr. Chairman—is that if that memo of the superintendent of insurance three years ago was fixing a limit of 37 cents as the allowable maximum for expenses, the fact of the matter is that in the two years to which I have drawn attention they had gone beyond that allowable limit. In 1962 their expenses were 40.3, and in 1963 they were 42.1.

Now, finally—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I wonder if I could interject here.

When the hon. member uses the word “allowable” I think it should be clear that this was not something that was fixed or established by any department of government as an allowable margin at all but simply, if I may use the word “marginal,” a marginal percentage on which they could do business and make a reasonable or fair profit. They have now reached beyond that and are losing, not making the profit which was considered to be allowable or reasonable, if you accept that as the percentage which should be allocated to the expense of doing business. It is not in the sense that it was fixed or something by which they had to remain by virtue of any law or any ruling, it is simply their own business margin.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I am near the end of my comments, but I want to make a few general observations in drawing some conclusions from this up-to-date picture of the car insurance industry at the present time.

I repeat, I think that for those of you who want to retain this system the obligation is on you to clean up these abuses. But the point I want to make, Mr. Chairman, is that this experience, to my mind, is the most convincing evidence for a public car insurance policy in the province of Ontario. I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, as a general rule—and this is particularly in reply to the interjection of the hon. member for High Park a few moments ago—that when private insurance refuses to service the market, they themselves have given conclusive evidence that they have outlived their usefulness.

Mr. L. M. Hodgson (Scarborough East): That is not right!

Mr. MacDonald: Well, I am asserting it for the moment.

I am saying that when private insurance refuses to service the market; when they deliberately cut insurance policies off; when they send letters out and say, “We will give nobody any coverage that has had an accident in the last three years”—in short, when they refuse to service the market; then somebody has to service the market at other than exploitive premium prices. When you get to that stage, I think the answer is a public insurance policy.

Indeed, Mr. Chairman, I think it goes—as the hon. member for Downsview alluded in passing during his comments—not only to the field of car insurance, but I think it goes to the field of fire insurance. For example, in the city of Toronto in much of the residential area that lies between Parliament and Spadina up to Harbord or up to Bloor you simply cannot buy fire insurance from any company at all. Now, to what extent this situation obtains in other cities across the province of Ontario, I do not know; but I can assure you as far as we are concerned, in the New Democratic Party, we are going to find out, because I think the case is being built up—by the failure of the insurance companies to provide fire insurance to people who are entitled to it—for public ownership of fire insurance. Moreover, it would be public ownership not only in the high risk areas, because any plan that is set up by a government should not be pushed into just the high risk areas.

The only persons who would do that are the Tories in medical insurance; have the government take the high risk and leave the insurance companies the lower risks. Any public plan will have to sell all across the board.

This is the situation that has developed in the heart of the city of Toronto, it is the situation that is emerging in the car insurance field. I submit to the hon. Attorney General that the insurance companies have to face up to the fact and that he, through his Department of Insurance, has to make them face up to the fact.

For example, if we in society, through any one of our levels of government, decree that a building in the heart of the city of Toronto is fit for human habitation—in other words it is a building that is not going to be condemned, is not going to be torn down, human beings have a right to live in it legally—I suggest to you that those human beings have the right to buy fire insurance. The fire insurance companies have not the right to say, in effect, “We will not sell in this area, because it is a high risk area.”

Those people are being discriminated against. In other words, the insurance companies are not servicing the market. When the private insurance companies cease servicing the market, then the case has been conclusively made for the government acting in establishing public insurance.

Hon. I. Haskett (Minister of Transport): Mr. Chairman, may I make a comment on the driver whose licence has been suspended, to which the hon. member for York South has referred? He thought the licence had been suspended at the 11-point level. I have checked with our records, and as I think the hon. member did not put the name of the driver on the record, I shall not mention it; but the person about whom he asked me, in the two-year period up to January, 1965, had 13 convictions—two accidents, two warning letters and two interviews. He was suspended at point accumulation level in 1963 and again has reached the 17-point level, when suspension is mandatory, and has been suspended for six months.

Mr. MacDonald: I thank the hon. Minister for the explanation. I will pass it on to the family.

Mr. Singer: Is the hon. Attorney General going to make a reply?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I perhaps might take a moment to answer some of the comments or at least speak to them.

Perhaps I might first advise the hon. members of the House that in the organization of The Department of Insurance in 1964, the department was divided into two separate branches with the registration and examination branch being a separate branch of The Department of the Attorney General. The superintendent of insurance, or The Department of Insurance, administers these Acts: The Insurance Act, The Loan and Trust Corporations Act, Prepaid Hospital and Medical Services Act, The Investment Contract Act. I think hon. members are aware that insurance companies—and this is a large field of the insurance industry—companies which are federal or Dominion companies are administered, supervised, inspected by the superintendent of insurance in The Department of Insurance of the Dominion government at Ottawa. So that a very large part of our insurance industry is a federal area, and in that sense a federal responsibility.

Mr. Singer: That is substantially in relation to financial matters.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That is right, and a very important area, too.

I might say to the hon. members of the House that we have applications now coming forward from companies which seek to get provincial charters to come into the provincial field, to be incorporated in the province. There are other companies from other provinces seeking to be chartered or incorporated in another province of Canada, to gain admission by extra-provincial means into the province of Ontario.

This entails a problem of how they are to be supervised, how they are to be administered, how to be supervised and inspected, and the necessity of either having a policy that they should come under the Dominion supervision or an actuarial branch set up under our own Department of Insurance to properly see that they carry on business in a way which is sound and satisfactory. That is one of the problems which is before the department now, and I thought the House would be interested in knowing this, and one that is receiving immediate attention.

The sections of The Insurance Act to which the hon. member for Downsview referred, I can only say, as he has related to the House, have been on the statute books for some 41 years. As someone pointed out, they have been there through the administration of different governments in this province; and I must say to the hon. members that it is not the intention to have them proclaimed, as the Act provides they may be proclaimed, at the pleasure of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council. I think they are there for the purpose of use if rates, insurance rates, become out of line. They are there for immediate application as and when it is deemed necessary. At the moment I have to say to the House that it is not deemed necessary that they be proclaimed.

Mr. Singer: Shame!

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I wonder if the hon. member, when he was talking to the insurance companies the other evening, told them he thought they should be proclaimed?

Mr. Singer: Yes, I did.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: He did not tell the House exactly that, although he urged that the government do it.

Mr. Singer: Yes, I was a signatory of that report. The hon. Provincial Treasurer was. He agreed with it. Several of the hon. members over there agreed.

Mr. MacDonald: A split in the Cabinet apparently.

Mr. Singer: The hon. Minister without Portfolio from Lanark (Mr. Gomme), he agreed with it.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That was the main burden of the hon. member's remarks to the House, and I simply have to tell him that it is not intended to proclaim the sections at this time. I say they are available, as they have been available, for use when and if it is deemed necessary to make them applicable.

Mr. Singer: Again I say: Shame!

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I must, with respect, congratulate the hon. member for Sudbury for what I thought was a very excellent and certainly a very correct and clear presentation of the law as it relates to certain phases of insurance. But I have to draw to his attention the fact that the gratuitous passenger situation is something that is in The Highway Traffic Act. Likewise the motor vehicle accident claims fund is in The Department of Transport. It was taken out of The Department of Insurance when it was known as the unsatisfied judgment fund, moved over to Transport and given the name of the motor vehicle accident claims fund. I do not think that it is the responsibility of the Attorney General to start commenting on the administration of the gratuitous passenger legislation which is in the Act of my colleague, the hon. Minister of Highways, or on the motor vehicle accident claims fund, which is in The Department of Transport.

Mr. Singer: You have a problem fractionalized and nobody is responsible.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Fractionalized, if you like that word. It certainly is set in the department where I think it belongs and there it is administered and there I think it should be administered. The hon. Minister who is responsible for that department, I am sure, can comment with respect to it.

I am in agreement with the hon. member for Sudbury. The law, I think, should have a different approach to the third party situation. It is something, I may say to the House, that will be represented at the meeting of superintendents of insurance; we approve of the suggestion which was put forward and it will be urged that that situation be corrected.

I will agree with the hon. member for York South that there are problems now arising in the insurance field. I am aware of them and many letters such as he has received have come to my desk—complaints of cancellations, complaints of the difficulty of getting insurance when a cancellation occurs and of the manner in which it is done, and of the lack of notice with which cancellations are received.

But I must say, in fairness to all concerned, that this is not a company doing something which is illegal. I do not think you can use the word injustice. Perhaps it verges on what the individual may feel is an injustice to have his insurance policy cancelled, but this is a right implicit in a contract written by a free agent in the contract field with another free agent, to take or refuse a contract of insurance and to cancel the contract—

Mr. MacDonald: You might pass a law that they cannot do this, as you are going to do in medical insurance.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: We might do this. When I say we might—

Mr. MacDonald: Under certain conditions.

Mr. Singer: We want to control the—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: When I say we might do this, I want to put it in this light. We have the right, of course, to do this and it might well be done in the sense that we have the power to do it, but at the moment that right is not in the law. The legislation is not there saying you must, having written a contract, stay with it.

Mr. MacDonald: The law was written by the insurance companies, and passed by the government.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The law was passed by the government. The contract, at present, is a contract between two free parties, with the right of either one to cancel.

Mr. MacDonald: What is free about it?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: There is nothing illegal, I want to make this clear; there is nothing illegal about it. Perhaps the hon. member feels it is an injustice. I will go so far with him as to say that a problem arises now in the insurance field, in the light of the difficulty which insurance companies are having, particularly in the motor vehicle field. I think this is quite apparent, with their reluctance to take risks which are bringing about losses on their ledgers.

I think I must say that the problem is before us, but I do wish to make it clear that this is not an illegality that is being allowed by the government. There is nothing illegal about the contract being cancelled, and the company has the right. He gave the citation of the company that would take only a certain type of risk, and then the other type who wanted the bad risk, because they got, I suppose, a higher premium. These are quite free and proper endeavours in our society, and in our system of enterprise. So let us be clear that there is no illegality here.

I must take issue with his words. Companies have not set themselves above the law, and there is still the assigned risk field, so that even if the policy is cancelled there is the right to go over and get insurance, at an increased cost. I am not sure that I can find it in my mind to say that that is wrong, or that is injustice, or that there is not good reason to justify the assigned risk basis of contract.

Mr. MacDonald: Would the hon. Attorney General permit me to intervene? Here is a man who has had no accidents, and has accumulated five or six demerit points. This is cancelled, legally, and then he is forced to go onto the assigned risk plan and pay two or three times more. Surely that is not a defensible kind of proposition? They are above the law in the sense that this man has only five or six demerit points, and he can go to 15 before he is denied his driving rights on the highway. This is what I mean when they are above the law. They are making their own laws. It is operative in terms of who is going to be able to get insurance to be able to drive on the highway.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Chairman, might I also add just one further point here? The letter I have in my hand is an illustration of it, that we buy and pay premiums for insurance for protection in case of accidents. This is the purpose of it. So for years the premiums are accepted, and then something happens. We have the accident against which we were insuring ourselves and then we find that the company is not willing to carry us beyond that.

This letter tells of a man who has been driving for 35 years. His wife has been driving for ten; the son for six. Two years ago, the son had an accident and smashed up a car—his own car. No other damage was done to persons or even to himself. The husband then had an accident which involved a whip-lash, $130 damage, and then the whip-lash cost $1,800. That was two years ago. Now the insurance is cancelled by one company. He has tried, and I have the names of eight companies here. They all refuse insurance. The Royal at first declined, but now covers him with a 21-day binder, whatever that is. Perhaps the hon. member for High Park can explain what binder is. I thought it referred to cheese, or something like that.

Mr. Cowling: It refers to the NDP. They are kind of binding. Most of the time.

Mr. Young: I see. In any case, the New Democrats are covering these people for 21 days then, this is what you mean? I am glad to know this. They are being covered now for this period of time, but what will happen then? Perhaps they go into assigned risk, high-cost insurance, if they are going to get any.

Mr. Cowling: The best thing to do is get off the road.

Mr. Young: But this is the problem. These people paid premiums over all these years against a possible accident, then the accidents occurred, against which they insured. Now the companies say because you had these accidents two years ago, no insurance. This is the problem.

Mr. Cowling: Mr. Chairman, if I could just get into the debate—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Cowling: Yes, I am an insurance agent. I am not speaking for the companies; I am speaking for ourselves, and I have been debating this with the hon. member for York South since 1955. Naturally, I feel that the private insurance companies can do a better job on insurance of any kind than the government can. I say, of any kind. Now you mention all the problems of—

Mr. MacDonald: That is why you opposed hospital insurance, even when your own government brought it in?

Mr. Cowling: I voted for hospital insurance and I supported this government, but I spoke against it many times before that. You know it.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Cowling: I wish the hon. member for Woodbine would go back to sleep. Would you do that?

Mr. Bryden: I do not emulate you at any time.

Mr. Chairman: Order. Will you address the chair when you are speaking?

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Chairman, will you ask him if he is in favour of the Canada pension plan?

Mr. Cowling: Mr. Chairman, I agree that there are some problems in the automobile insurance business, but there are a lot of problems in every business. We have a lot of problems right here in this House; there is no easy solution to them, and certainly I would not be in favour of—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Cowling: I simply say this, Mr. Chairman, that as difficult as the automobile insurance business might be for the industry today, it would be a lot more difficult for the government. Believe me, I know that. You have heard from three, four or half-a-dozen people—including insurance agents, and I do not know why in the world they would write you. Because you have heard from a few of them, remember there are hundreds of thousands of insured people in our province who are quite satisfied with their insurance and their coverage and the way the insurance industry is operating. Hundreds of thousands, so you read us two or three who are not. It is something like we had last night about Guelph reformatory.

Mr. Young: Are they satisfied, or are they just keeping quiet because there is nothing else to do?

Mr. Cowling: They are perfectly satisfied.

We must remember, Mr. Chairman, that the insurance companies do not make the rates; the driving public make the rates. If you will refer to an article of two or three days ago in one of our papers about the increase in the accident rate this year over last year, this first three-month of 1964, is simply fantastic. It has gone up 51 per cent. Are the insurance companies supposed to be responsible for this? I say that if we are going to do something to cut this great accident rate, one way we can do it is by much stricter enforcement of the laws as they are today. If somebody is driving at 35 miles an hour in a 30-mile-an-hour zone, they should be stopped and hit really hard for disobeying the law and I think in that way we are going to do something to cut down on the accidents and subsequently cut down on the insurance premiums.

But the question was raised this afternoon, why car insurance policies are cancelled. Well, there is a very good article in the Timmins Press and it is headed: "You Wonder Why Firms Cancel Car Insurance." I think it is very apropos here, Mr. Chairman. It goes on to say:

Are you a highgrader, a habitual drinker, a speed lover or open-handed when it comes to lending your car? Are you a poor driver? Do your neighbours call their children into the house when it is time for you to drive home? Do you have a police record? Are you considered an undesirable character? Does you wife talk too much to strangers?

If the answer is "yes" to any of these questions, you may have your driving insurance cancelled without any reason given.

Insurance companies never give a reason for such action. After all, if they put it in writing, there are not enough courts in Canada to handle the resulting actions.

The driver who suddenly gets such a notice is the first to scream that there is no reason for it and members of his family and his friends take up the cry. Of course, the fact that he has a heart condition, suffers from some disease that makes his driving dangerous to the public or may have defrauded the company on a claim, never gets mentioned.

I had this very personal experience just a few days ago. A young lad said to me that he had to pay $60 on his car insurance. He wrote to The Department of Transport and said that he had never had anything wrong; he had never had a summons; he had never been stopped for speeding.

So I went to the department and in his name were two convictions for speeding. I went to the young lad and asked him if he had been speeding on such-and-such a day on Lawrence Park and on such-and-such a day on Spadina. He replied that he had not been, but he had a couple of brothers and suggested that maybe it was them. So a few days later I talked to him and he said that it was not him, but one of the brothers had taken out the car and was involved in the speeding accident. Is that the responsibility of the insurance company? I do not think so.

The reasons for a company wanting to terminate a client are many, but the basis for all of them is the same. The company is in business to make money. If it loses money on certain types of drivers, it retires from the risk.

However, the general rule is that if you have a driver's licence, you can get insurance. It costs money, though. If the company feels that you are going to cost it money under the normal insurance rate it cancels the policy and lets the assigned risk provide the insurance at higher rates.

Human nature being what it is, when a person has his normal policy cancelled, he usually switches companies. If he tells the truth, he obtains insurance under the assigned risk plans at higher rates. If he does not tell the truth, he has provided another company with an excuse to cancel the policy.

Now, I do not say that all people operate that way, but I say in most cases where you find that there has been an increase in insurance premium rates, there is a very justifiable reason for it. I say with this, Mr. Chairman, that the insurance rates on an automobile are not predicated by the insurance companies, they are strictly up to the driving public. If we are going to do something about this situation, we are certainly not going to take over the automobile insurance business. That is ridiculous!

One way that we can help to at least hold the line on rates or reduce them, is stricter enforcement of our laws on the highways.

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the hon. Attorney General would say something about the allegations that were made by the hon. member for York South when he said that there was a large block of buildings in the city of Toronto on which no fire insurance could be bought. To me this is an incredible situation where buildings are used for human habitation and yet insurance cannot be bought at any price. I would just ask the hon. Attorney General to look into that situation, and if it is true, I think that something should be done about it.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I am only able to say to the hon. member at this time that this is the first I have heard of this situation. I am glad that it has been brought to my attention, I shall look into it at once.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, when the hon. Attorney General is looking into it—I know it exists in Toronto, there is no doubt about it and coming from Sault Ste. Marie he has not been exposed to some of the horrible things in Toronto—but would the hon. Attorney General find out to what extent, if any, the same situation obtains elsewhere across the province?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes, I shall, Mr. Chairman. I will give an undertaking, it shall have my close attention. I will certainly look into the matter.

Could I ask at this time—and this is all I wish to say—I would like to have the complaints which hon. members have mentioned, which they have in their possession in the insurance field generally.

Vote 210 agreed to.

On vote 211:

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, vote 211 is the vote dealing with the law reform commission. When this bill was brought in just a couple of years ago, we generally greeted the advent of the law reform commission with approval. But we did try to get from the Attorney General of the day its composition and the particular fields of reference to which its attentions would be directed.

This information was not forthcoming at the time the bill was introduced. Much of it is available now, certainly the composition of the law reform commission is known to us.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: And the terms of reference, if I may call them that, are in the bill.

Mr. Singer: Well yes, all right; perhaps my choice of phrase was not the happiest one. The terms of reference, as in the bill, pretty well say that the government can refer anything they want to the law reform commission. You can pretty well ask them for their opinion on anything that comes within provincial jurisdiction.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That is right.

Mr. Singer: And ask them to do studies and to make suggestions.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think the first, if I may say—I have not got the bill in front of me—but there are four things. The first three are things which they are directed to do: The study of all the laws, the statutes or common law, the courts, rights generally, procedures and so on. And then, fourth, if I recall, any matter referred to the law reform commission by the Attorney General; but it is a broad field of study.

Mr. Singer: That is right. That was the point I was making, the hon. Attorney General has perhaps phrased it better than I, but they can do almost anything that the government wants them to do.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Or that they want to do.

Mr. Singer: Or that they want to do. What we were concerned about was that they be directed reasonably immediately to certain urgent problems. That was number one.

The other thing that we were concerned about was the personnel. Now, the government decided that Chief Justice McRuer, former Chief Justice McRuer, would be the head of that commission. At the same time they have given Chief Justice McRuer one of the most comprehensive jobs that has ever been given to anyone in the province—and as a matter of fact if anyone sits and listens to these debates one would imagine that Chief Justice McRuer is going to rewrite, in his capacity as commissioner of the civil rights investigation, rewrite almost all of the laws that are wrong in the province. The ones that he has missed, apparently, he is going to be able to look after under the law reform commission.

I have the greatest respect for this gentleman and I think the intelligence, training and knowledge that he brings to his task on the civil rights commission is of inestimable value to the people of Ontario. But it would be my thought that he has got enough on his hands for the next several years to fully take care of his time; it would be my additional thought that the time that is going to be ably devoted to the proper direction of the law reform commission, perhaps, is not available. I want to make it abundantly clear. I am in no way criticizing him! I have the greatest respect for this gentleman. I think that being seized of the one task that he has his hands full for some considerable time to come. As I say, when you add to that what we have heard here in the debates of the number of things he is considering, and the government does not want to decide upon until they have heard his opinion on them, his task in the civil rights commission is a mammoth one, Mr. Chairman.

At the time I made these remarks when the announcement of his appointment as head of the law reform commission became public, it was suggested to me that perhaps the two jobs went hand-in-hand, and it would be better if the same person, or the same direction, applied in both fields. When I heard that suggestion I said, let us wait and see how it works out. Well, the law reform commission has laboured mightily and they brought forth a mouse, I think, in the form of their first recommendation—a very important one—the one that deals with the law of perpetuities. As the hon. member for Sudbury says, he can hardly find a voter in his constituency who does not ask him about the state of the law of perpetuities as he walks around his riding. I have found the same thing in Downsview, and I am sure the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs has found the same thing, too.

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Never heard of it until today.

Mr. Singer: But as important as this field is, and as a real concern as it is to the community of Ontario, I think it is well known to anyone who is at all familiar with this subject that there is one man in the province of Ontario, sir, who knows all about the law against perpetuities. In fact, he is the man who is the prime consultant, one of the foremost legal scholars not only in Ontario, but in Canada and the whole of North America, in the Commonwealth system.

Mr. Sopha: Give us the name.

Mr. Singer: Dean Caesar Augustus Wright.

Mr. Sopha: Cecil Augustus Wright.

Mr. Singer: Cecil Augustus Wright. Now, he is the man who did it; he is the man who wrote the report; he is the man who reframed the statutes. The law reform commission read it over very carefully, I would think, and adopted his report almost in toto. I am advised that they looked at his statute references and they came to one section in one of the statutes, and said: "Maybe your wording in that section is a little vague. How would it be if we changed it this way?" And Dean Wright is reported to have advised them: "I think that is a good idea. I was not too happy with that wording myself."

As important as this is, surely the services of Dean Wright were as available to my friend, the hon. Attorney General as they were to the law reform commission. So, while all of this time was being spent by the law reform commission on reviewing what Dean Wright did, and being very sure that what Dean Wright had to say in this field, was going to be the last word in any event, surely there should have been some direction to take them into such questions as the law about divorce, or the law about securities, or the law about fire enforcement and control that I was talking about last night. Even the suggestion of the Katzman committee which they are presently reviewing, I understand, about the law of personal property. But there are things that really cry out for this sort of a body to get at, and these are the things the hon. Attorney General keeps telling us he is investigating, and in due course we are going to be able to bring a statute before the House.

To my mind, sir, and these remarks are very brief, the performance of the Ontario law reform commission, to date, has been disappointing. There is a real task to be done by this commission, and to date the indications of their having grasped that task have escaped me in any event.

Mr. Sopha: By sheer coincidence, yesterday in Sudbury when Mr. McRuer was holding his Royal commission inquiring into civil rights, the Sudbury law association, comprising all the members of the Bar, tendered him a luncheon. He spoke for three-quarters of an hour or more on that occasion and, in his introductory remarks, he said that it would be inappropriate for him to make any comments on the nature of his inquiries into civil rights before he submitted his report to the government. But he felt free to make some comments upon his activities as chairman of the law reform commission. He outlined the nature of the work, the approach of the commission to its task, and he told us that they had had this significant addition to the staff of W. B. Common, who apparently is devoting most of his time in the capacity of counsel to the commission. The vice-chairman of the commission is Dean Leal, of Osgoode Hall, and there is Mr. W. Gibson Gray of Toronto, a member of the commission. He informed us that it was never intended that the commission itself would be a research body; the commission was merely to identify the fields where inquiries might be made to ascertain whether reform in the law was necessary. To that end, the commission delegated Dean Wright to look into the rule against perpetuities which, of course, is a very archaic and well-encrusted body of law that has grown out of the common law. It has had a great inhibiting effect upon the carrying into effect of testators' intentions. To the layman, this has been a prolonged discussion by lawyers, but if one told the layman how outdated this rule against perpetuities was an illustration would be that the rule against perpetuity holds that a woman can have a child at 95 years of age; which, of course, in the light of modern medical science and modern knowledge, is a biological impossibility.

It is interesting to note in the amending statute that for the first time, certainly in the law of this land, we are going to enact by statute, as if we were all biologists, which we are not, we are going to enact and enshrine in legislation that no male can father a child under the age of 14, and no female can bear a child under the age of 12 or over the age of 55. This problem, I say to the hon. Minister of Highways who looks up in startled fashion, this problem of at what age a woman can have a child has vexed the law lords for a good many centuries. In reading the decisions of the House of Lords, one might say that there is no subject that the law lords are more familiar with and are greater authorities on than sex. Of course, all that is going to be abolished now, when the law against perpetuities is going to be melded into reasonableness, as it should be.

The commissioner told us yesterday that the law reform commission is not a research body, they farm out the projects. He said the next one they have begun to farm out is in the realm of family law. The person who prepared the hon. Attorney General's estimates here got it down wrong. That person, whoever prepared this, put it down as domestic relations project, and that is not quite an accurate description of what the law reform commission is looking into.

Family law is a much broader subject than domestic relations. Some domestic relations are not in the field of law at all, have nothing to do with the law, but they are going to look into the matter of separation allowances, the handling of cases of deserted wives in the family courts, the care of children, particularly neglected children; and they are going to look at this vexatious question of dower.

Maybe there will be a government with sufficient courage some day, whether it be Conservative or Liberal, that will have the courage to abolish dower. Now I am not saying today that I am advocating the abolition of dower. I do not want to receive 5,000 letters next week from women's groups in this province. I am just saying it is a possibility in the future that dower may be abolished.

I just want to say this in conclusion—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: What about courtesy?

Mr. Sopha: Well, courtesy. I do not think men, now that they get the first $20,000 of the wife's estate, I do not think they would be worried if it were abolished.

I just want to say this, that in James Chalmers McRuer we have one of the finest judicial minds that ever practised law or sat on the bench in this province. He is now approaching his 73rd or 74th year and I hope that he—I fervently pray—that he is granted many more years to address himself to the tasks that have been assigned to him. He had a very able career at the Bar before he was appointed to the bench and then of course after he succeeded Chief Justice Rose as chief justice of the high court he had 20 years as chief justice of that branch of the supreme court of adjudicature.

He is a very dedicated man in that he would never assign one of his fellow judges to try a case that he would not try himself, and over and above his duty of administering the supreme court of adjudication he never relented in the application of his own time and talents to the trial of cases himself. We are indeed fortunate to have this man of the very highest integrity and the strongest intelligence and endowed with a great sense of wisdom, to address his talents to this task.

One might say in conclusion that law reform, of course, is an area, a significant area, where we are much behind the British. We are usually, as I calculate in my mind, we are usually about a generation behind the United Kingdom in making reforms to our laws, just about a generation.

For example, they had their Law Reform Act in respect of real property in 1924, I think it was, where they did away with all these silly and useless rules such as the rule in Shelley's case and that type of thing and revised the whole law of real property and made much of it statutory. Now here it is 1965 and we have not even begun to approach that task in Ontario.

He was telling us yesterday—this is an anecdote that should be put on record—he was telling us that he discovered in some of his researches that there are statutes in this province that are in force, are viable, that one cannot even find the statute, all one can find is reference to the fact that the statutes are in force. He said he is looking desperately for a statute that is in force in this province that adopts the law of the reign of Henry VI—and Henry VI, if I am not mistaken, was one of the Lancasters, perhaps just before Richard III, and that would put him in about the early 15th century. He said before his life expires that he is going to find that statute that adopts the law of the reign of Henry VI into this province.

He says there are many others, and indeed anyone who practises law is perfectly aware of that, that all of the statutes in force in this province by no means are printed with those several hundreds that are in the revised statutes of Ontario. There are many more over and above those.

I share the view of my friend, the hon. member for Downsview, that there are many urgent areas in which inquiry ought to be made. One of the ones that always strikes me as being very necessary is whether some research might not be made to reduce the number of statutes in force in the province. I counted them up and my memory serves me ill but I think there are about a thousand now. We have been passing statutes at a rate that is properly described as geometric proportion; that is as the years go by we pass a greater number of statutes per year. It is not an arithmetic progression, it is a geometric progression. In another ten years—I figured it out one time—if we keep on at the same rate, at the time of the next revision in 1970 we will have something like 1,700 or 1,800 statutes in force in the province. Well, when you get a body of law like that, the layman, the citizen, is in a bewildering state of confusion.

Now just one additional thing. Mr. McRuer told us that after the law reform commission was set up in Ontario two years ago the Parliament of the United Kingdom, following Ontario's example, set one up. They allocated to it the task of reforming their law, which has never been revised. They do not revise their statutes in the way we do. Let us remember that William Joyce, Lord Haw-Haw, was tried under a statute of 1351, The Treasonable Offences Act. They do not make any effort to revise them. He told us that in the United Kingdom they voted the equivalent sum in sterling of $750,000. Well, if we can give $60,000 or $75,000 to the thoroughbred horse society, then perhaps—

Mr. Singer: Thousand dollars! It is half a million.

Mr. Sopha: Yes, indeed, and half a million dollars to the emergency measures branch, which is a matter of federal jurisdiction. I was not here for that vote, but I just wish the hon. Attorney General would go down and tell Mr. Hellyer that comes under national defence; a federal matter, his responsibility.

Well, then, if we can do that, I would think that I would be one that would be in favour of increasing the vote to the law reform commission in order that perhaps several projects could be going on at one time, rather than farming out just one at a time. If we farm them out just one at a time, it may take us a couple of decades until we get all the law reform that ought to be reformed in the province.

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Mr. Chairman, I would not take the time of the House to reiterate the points which have been made by the hon. member for Downsview and the hon. member for Sudbury, but I would ask the hon. Attorney General to let us know what fields are presently under review by the law reform commission, to find out whether or not they are realistic and have any relevance to the matters which are of concern to the people of this province.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, this is one vote in which I am sure we have the support of all hon. members of the House, moneys that are being allocated for the studies of the law reform commission. I will come to the answer of the question of the hon. member for Riverdale in a moment, but I would like to just take a brief moment to let the hon. members of the House know the terms of reference, if I may use that again, given to the law reform commission by the Act which was passed last year, 1964, chapter 78. It was empowered and instructed to inquire into and consider any matter relating to:

(a) Reform of the law having regard to the statute law, the common law and judicial decisions.

(b) The administration of justice.

(c) Judicial and quasi-judicial procedures under any Act.

This is something that the hon. member for Sudbury was speaking about in the House a few days ago, and saying that there should be a study of procedures and methods of carrying forward hearings before boards and commissions. This is item (c), one of the matters referred to the law reform commission by the Act which incorporated it—one of the things it is doing.

(d) Any subject referred to it by the Attorney General.

Now, Mr. McRuer was appointed as chairman of that commission in June of last year. Dean Leal of Osgoode Hall law school was appointed in July, and then three further members, who have been named here today, in November of last year.

The hon. member for Downsview asked in his question number 90: "Inquiry of the Ministry, Will the Attorney General advise." Now, this is one of those famous questions which is numbered 90 but breaks down into (a), (b), (c), (d), (e), (f), (g), into seven parts and (g) is again broken up into two more. So I think we have actually nine questions here in the one. But in item (d) he asked: "To what projects has the law reform commission directed its attention?"

The answer to that, as tabled, was as follows:

Item (d) of question 90 sub-(d): The Perpetuities Act. The Accumulations Act. The Trustee Act. The Conveyancing and Law of Property Act. The Judicature Act. The Wagers Act. The Securities Act. The Personal Property Law. The Family Law. The Law of Condominium.

The new concept—I am sure the hon. members are aware of this law coming forward and being proposed—

The Wills Act. The Uniform Wills Act. The Mechanics' Lien Act.

Several of these have been referred to the law reform commission by the Attorney General's department. Several they have undertaken as a study of their own. I think I would say that the large project, the main chief project, which is being carried forward now by the law reform commission is the whole field of family law, which, as the hon. member for Sudbury says, embraces separation, perhaps divorce, custody and access to children, support, maintenance, dower, and all the things which relate to family relations, family law generally.

I think it would be proper for me to say, particularly in view of the suggestion that has been made that possibly the law reform commission and the human rights study is too much to combine and to carry on together—and I do not think the hon. Mr. McRuer would mind my saying in this House, although I have heretofore kept quiet when I have seen these suggestions put forth—I think he would not mind my saying that the two are closely related and that the one sheds light upon the other and that they should be carried on together. Furthermore he feels quite capable, with the staff we have given him—and we will give him more if he needs it—of conducting these two studies, these two researches, and that is what they are, side by side. So I would like to make that clear at this time.

I refer to the law reform commission as what I like to call a continuing research facility into the law. And when the hon. member for Sudbury says that we are behind the United Kingdom, I am quite prepared to give credit where it is due and always have felt that there is a very capable and excellent conduct of the law, both in the Bar and the bench over there, and in Parliament, but I think it is only fair to say that the law of real estate, particularly, and many of the other laws of the United Kingdom contain ancient vestiges of law which we never had in this country.

There were estates entailed and so on, which we have never had to contend with here, so that perhaps they need to do some reform. But it is a fact that in this instance, the United Kingdom has followed us and it is only this year that a law reform commission has been established in Great Britain. We are a year ahead. Our law reform commission was underway a year before the United Kingdom's.

I can recall, and I cannot recite the words, but I remember reading in Hansard where the hon. member for Downsview said—and he said this last year, I am quite certain, possibly the year before—“Why do not you do something about the reform of the law? Why do not you get your bright young students from the law school; why do not you get your law professors; why do not you get the best legal brains you can get from the law schools and do some research?”

Now, I am sure that he is not taking objection to the fact that the law reform commission has, as one of its members, Dean Leal of Osgoode Hall law school—

Mr. Singer: I just want you to speed up the—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: —and that it retains eminent persons from every law school in this province, members of the staffs of all the law schools are being retained, and their services made use of by the law reform commission and that young graduates, bright young lawyers, medalist men, are being employed to do researches in all these fields and there is no lack of personnel. And I think there will be no lack of support for this commission, in its continuing research. One of the things in which I am very interested and of which I am very proud, is the accomplishment that we have it going forward.

Could I just say that when you see there the item of, I think it is called “family law”—which is probably not the right name—when you see $35,000 allocated to that, this is a continuing research which will certainly take two or perhaps three years and it may run, before it is finished, to perhaps 130, 140 or $150,000 in that one great field of law. For this year's purposes, I think the amount we have asked for will probably be sufficient.

That is something of the work of the law reform commission.

Vote 211 agreed to.

On vote 212:

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, vote 212 deals with the Ontario police commission, and I think it is most important that we comment on what appears to have been the requests of the Ontario police commissioner, addressed to his Minister and which the Minister either rejected himself or perhaps passed on to his Cabinet colleagues and were later rejected.

I am sure the House will recall that in 1961 there was a study conducted by the Northwestern University traffic institute—in fact, there was some $67,000 paid for that study—into the sort of policing that might be recommended by that important institution.

Now, it was indicated that our force was short—in the opinion of these people—our force was short in staff, and at that time the force had some 1,880 men, or rather 1,888 men in uniform and 321 civilians. The study suggested that 797 civilians were needed and that the force should be increased to some 3,366 men.

In addition, it made several recommendations about administrative procedures. As far as I can understand it, most of the administrative recommendations were adopted, but the big problem comes with the increase in staff as recommended by the force and as requested by the commissioner of police. It would seem that he asked this year—based on that report and based on the aggravation of the situation which was investigated, the aggravation being the increased number of vehicles that are on the road—he asked for some 500 more officers and 200 more civilians. In fact the increase in budget that is being granted to him will allow the employment of only some 200 additional recruits and 140 civilians.

The hon. member for High Park earlier this afternoon made mention of the fantastic increase in traffic accidents in the first quarter of this year. The deaths in the province are 272 in the first three months, as against 261 last year, and this is something that causes alarm to all of us.

It would seem certainly from the studies that have been done and from the requests that have been addressed to the Cabinet and to the hon. Attorney General, that one of the answers could well be the availability of more provincial police, the availability of more civilian help in the office of the OPP. Naturally, to get that increased police and civilian strength, there are going to have to be an awful lot more dollars.

I noted with some interest that the hon. Minister of Transport sent out onto the highways and bylaws examination units and they are conducting compulsory examination of vehicles—those vehicles they happen to find in the far east end of the province and the far west end of the province. I hope that this will have some effect, but I think that, as the Northwestern traffic institute discovered and as we talked about in this House many times, one of the best ways, as the hon. member for High Park mentioned this afternoon, one of the best ways in controlling traffic to limit the number of accidents is in better policing. As our roads get longer and wider and bigger, and as we get more and more vehicles on to the roads, surely, Mr. Chairman, it must be obvious that we need more policemen to properly control that traffic.

The travelling public needs to see policemen in their uniforms and in their vehicles and recognize that there are constant patrols on the highways. In so doing, and I suppose most of us in this Chamber drive our own cars, in so doing I think you will agree with me when you see a uniformed policeman and you see a recognizable police vehicle, if perhaps you are going over the speed limit or perhaps have a tendency to cut from one lane to the other, the idea that a policeman is there, whether he is doing nothing more than sitting by the side of the road and watching the traffic, will bring under control the careless driving habits of most of the drivers that I know.

But to do this properly, Mr. Chairman, to do this properly, there has to be available to the police arm of government, to the Ontario provincial police, enough money to hire enough men to do the job. The study that we paid for, the study that the people of Ontario paid for, indicated in 1961 that we were far short. The request that was addressed to the hon. Attorney General indicates today that the money that is being asked for this afternoon is not enough to do the job properly. The statistics are there; the first quarter of 1965 is the worst yet, a shocking increase over the first quarter of 1964.

Mr. Chairman, in this field above all I would have hoped that the hon. Attorney General would have come forward with a request for enough money to do this job properly. It would seem to me that he has not and I think, even at this last hour, there should and could be an amendment upward of the item in this vote which would provide more policemen and more civilian help so that the OPP can get on with the job.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Chairman, yesterday the Royal commissioner was inquiring of Superintendent Whitehouse, the commanding officer of District 13, how many detachments, sub-detachments he had—maybe the word is detachments—he had in his district headquarters. First of all the commissioner asked him what the dimensions of his district were, and Superintendent Whitehouse told him it was 300 miles long by 200 miles wide. Now I am a member of the Macaulay school, and perhaps somebody would tell me how many square miles that is—60,000? Sixty thousand square miles and he said he had 14 detachments.

Now, I would not think—it is my personal opinion—that is enough for appropriate policing. He has one or two or three or four on Manitoulin Island; he has one at Chapleau and one at Espanola; one at Foley and one at Gogama—that is in the boondocks, the far-flung outskirts. Sometimes those detachments are policed by one or two officers, but within the environs of the city of Sudbury, the large metropolitan area, there are virtually—I can think of only one detachment outside of the district headquarters I referred to this earlier. They travel long distances to get to the area that they police.

I would think that the commissioner ought to be directed to establish one somewhere in the township of Rayside, to look after a fairly heavily populated area—Blezard, Rayside, Dowling, Balfour; then perhaps the town of Chelmsford, if it moves to give up its policing activities.

Another comment that the Royal commissioner made—and we will not wait for his report for me to relay these to me, Mr. Attorney General, which I think are of interest. The commissioner asked the superintendent whether he would have any objections if the officers in the detachment had the power to grant bail, which is quite a departure from established notions of granting of bail. We know, of course, that provincial police officers using common sense grant bail now. They grant bail in the sense that they let the fellow go home.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: It is an interesting idea, but a curious idea when we have just finished saying that a justice of the peace should not have any connection with the police office at all. He is the party to grant bail today.

Mr. Sopha: As I was saying, we know that provincial police officers in many cases exercise an extra quasi-judicial function in effect by letting the offender go home, when they know him and he is not likely to run away.

They take him in on a drunk charge or something like that, then let him go, where a justice of the peace might require bail. No one objects to that.

Now the thing I want to ask, and it is the very last word I want to say on these estimates—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I thought the hon. member might say—I thought he was coming to this when he described the 60,000 square miles, with 20 men or 16 men or whatever it was—that he would have made the point that that was a very law-abiding area.

Mr. Sopha: It is known as such. It is famous far and wide, except for the large number of crimes of violence which we have to try at every fall assizes.

I want to tell the hon. Attorney General that before he came into this House—perhaps he does not know it—but the amendment to The Police Act that established the Ontario police commission, and to some extent re-organized the Ontario provincial police, that we in this party voted against that Act.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: All of it?

Mr. Sopha: Yes, we voted against it on second reading and we voted against it on third reading.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: You could find nothing good in it?

Mr. Sopha: No, we could find nothing good in it. But I want to tell him that we do not bear the responsibility for the relationship of the Ontario police commission to the provincial police. Then at a subsequent time, when we were expressing our anxiety about how it was working out, how the nexus between the police commission and the provincial police was working out, I believe it was here—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Could I get this clear, Mr. Chairman. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that he voted against the entire provincial police Act, or just one section or so of it?

Mr. Sopha: We voted against the amending bill that established the Ontario police commission, that is the one.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Oh, I see.

Mr. Sopha: I think I sent for it, and that is the statutes of 1961-1962, chapter 105. When we inquired at some subsequent time, and I believe it was in this House, how the Ontario provincial police commissioner was getting on with the police commission, the Attorney General once removed, the one from Grenville-Dundas (Mr. Cass)—two of them have been removed but the once removed is the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas—told us that he found it necessary to separate the police commission and the commissioner of the provincial police by a floor of the building. When they first started out they were next door to each other, then they put one on one floor and one on the other—they made a geographic separation between them which leads to certain logical inferences which I do not have to detail to men of intelligence such as sit in this House. I would like to hear from the hon. Attorney General, I would like him to give us his assurance that the relationship between the police commission and the commissioner of the provincial police is one that is devoid of friction, that is to say, that there is good rapport between them in the administration of their responsibilities.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I can give the assurance immediately and completely and without any reservations; it is excellent.

Mr. Sopha: Fine.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, following up the hon. member for Downsview, I would like to ask of the hon. Minister whether any serious consideration is being given to the matter of a significant increase in the size of the force of the Ontario provincial police? The hon. member for High Park is very concerned about the automobile accidents and I am sure he would back up any move of this government in adding to that force to a point where it becomes effective in cutting down this accident rate. I think we should have an answer to that from the hon. Minister.

Also I would like to call to the hon. Minister's attention, another matter which to me is rather serious, and that is the low salary scales within the force. I have here some figures which compare OPP salary scales with the Metro police force, and they are rather illuminating. They run on an average of about $1,000 a year below the Metro police scale. A constable, probationary, for example, in Metro earns $5,300, and it is $4,200 on the OPP. A constable: $5,700 to $6,500 in Metro; in the OPP it is $4,500 to $5,400; a corporal: $6,600 to $6,900 in Metro; and $5,600 to $5,900 in the OPP—running just about the $1,000 below. The staff sergeant: $7,500 to $7,900 in Metro; and $6,800 to $7,100 in the OPP—a little less difference. An inspector is $8,200 to $9,700 at the Metro level, and it is $7,200 to $7,500 in the OPP. A chief inspector runs from $10,800 to $12,400 in Metro, and from $9,500 to $10,000 in the OPP. Now unless there have been some adjustments to the salary scale in very recent days, these are the salaries that are being paid, starting at $4,200 with a probationer constable and going to a maximum of $10,000 for a chief inspector.

So, Mr. Chairman, I would like to call the attention of the House to this problem. We hear a great many stories about the bleeding process, where men go into the OPP and then they come into the Metro force and other places, and in many cases we are told that the salary scale is not adequate for the job, to hold them there. Whether or not there is a real problem here I do not know, because this kind of information is difficult to get, and perhaps the hon. Attorney General will give us some information on it.

It may be difficult to raise the standard as far as numbers are concerned with these salary scales or it may not, because there are always young men who are intrigued by this kind of life and the challenge of this kind of work and young recruits are more easily obtainable, perhaps at lower salaries than older men, but those young recruits, once trained, should be held by the force and the salary scale has something to do with that. So I would ask the hon. Minister if he might comment on these two matters which I have raised.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, dealing with the recent history of the force, personnel-wise, if I may use that expression, and with respect to the increases in votes in the development of the force, I would just like to give the House these figures: The amount voted in the estimates for the Ontario provincial police in 1961 was $12,800,000; today I am asking the House for almost double that amount in the amount of $23,907,000. Last year the vote was $20,300,000; the increase being asked today is $3,607,000; that is an increase in this particular estimate of 18 per cent.

Mr. Bryden: Is it adequate?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think that hon. members will agree that this is a fairly substantial increase in any estimate.

Mr. Singer: Do you increase it by a percentage in trying to reach an adequate amount?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No, a percentage is just one way of measuring things as far as I am concerned.

Mr. Bryden: But is it not a better way to make a determination of the requirement?

Information has been published in the press to the effect that outside determination of the requirements, and also the determination made by the commissioner of the provincial police, indicate that the increase you have made is not sufficient. I think it was suggested that it is about $2 million less than these experts in the field consider to be sufficient. I do not know if these reports are true, but that surely is the question to which the hon. Attorney General should be directing his attention.

Is the increase he proposes to make sufficient; is it in line with the advice he has received from outside studies? I do not want to inquire into his internal relationships with his own officials, but is it a fact that the Treasury board has simply cut down what was recommended as necessary?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I had not quite completed my answer, Mr. Chairman, on the personnel of the force. I wanted to draw the attention of the hon. members of the House to this: I had taken the year 1962 as a base, at which time the police personnel on the strength of the force was 2,051. In 1963, there were recruited and added to the force 500 personnel bringing the total to 2,551 in the one year; an addition of 500 police personnel. At the same time 65 civilians were added so that the force in 1963 was recruited up to the strength of 2,551 police persons and 466 civilian staff.

In 1964—last year—there was added to the force 250 police personnel, bringing its strength to 2,801, and 47 to the civilian staff, so that the force last year was recruited to a level of 2,801. Now, bear in mind it was 2,051 in 1962; it had increased to 2,801 last year, with 513 additional on the civilian staff.

Mr. Young: Can I ask the hon. Minister, does this mean that this is a net increase of 250?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: A new group taken on strength of 250.

Mr. Young: A new group taken on strength. During that same period, how many resignations would there be, how many people leaving?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That is the net gain.

Mr. Young: That is the net gain?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes.

Mr. Young: Have we any record of the number of people who separated themselves from the force?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I can say that substantially more than 250 were recruited, but that the net gain was 250. Perhaps the commissioner may be able to tell me the number recruited. The loss was about 4 per cent, I am told, which is quite a low figure.

I think the figures showing a net gain in the year 1963 of 500 police personnel, and 250 last year; 750 gained in two years on that force, or about a third of its strength in 1962. This indicates, perhaps, the nature of the answer to what the hon. member for Yorkview asked as to salary. I do not think you would have succeeded in that recruiting programme if the salaries were so very unsatisfactory. I must say I am not satisfied with them, but in addition to that I can tell the House that the salaries were revised upwards last year as part of our programme, and quite substantially so, and the matter is still under further consideration.

Mr. Young: Revised upward to these figures which I gave?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Right!

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I do not think the hon. Minister has answered the real question at all. He has indicated that there has been an increase in the force as between 1962 and 1964, he has not said anything about the more recent period; he may not have figures on that. What period of the year were you talking about, were you talking about the end of the year or the beginning of the year?

At any rate, the figures he gave show that there has been an increase and I think that is common ground, I do not think anybody questioned that. We were all well aware of the fact there has been an increase.

But the criticism that has been made and which the hon. Minister has still not answered is in two parts really: (a) the increase has not been sufficient in relation to the need; (b) the current plans of the government in relation to the strength of the police force are not sufficient to meet the need.

These are the matters that are causing concern and I think we should have a clearer statement from the hon. Minister than we have received to date as to how adequate the current plans are. As I indicated to him a minute ago, it has been stated in the press that the increase in funds he is asking for this year is approximately $2 million less than is required to bring the force up to the strength that the experts apparently consider necessary. I firmly believe that no one in this House and no one in this province would object to the expenditure of an additional $2 million for this purpose. This is a basic, a vital need, and $2 million, I regret to have to say it, is really small change in the Budget of the province of Ontario as it now exists. It is a very small percentage indeed.

I certainly do not think that $2 million should stand between us and what may be considered to be adequate police protection in the province. The answer the hon. Minister has given up till now simply does not touch on that question at all. He evades the whole problem.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I think anyone would admit that policing is one element in traffic control and in accident control, but I do not think it is the whole answer, I do not think it is the whole cause; I do not think it is the whole cure, to put policemen on the road. I think it is a very important element to have proper policing, properly trained traffic control policemen on our highways, but I do not think I would accept and swallow as the whole answer the thought that all the traffic deaths were due to the fact that there were not enough policemen on the highways.

Mr. Bryden: Who has suggested that?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: There seems to be a fairly strong implication.

Mr. Bryden: It was the hon. member for High Park who brought that in.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: As I have pointed out, the money that we are obtaining in this vote is an increase of 18 per cent in this estimate. I have pointed out there has been a very substantial increase in that estimate over the recent years and a very substantial increase in recruitment. There was a 250 net gain in the force in 1964 and 500 in 1963. Our estimate this year will enable the force to be brought up to the 3,000 mark, whereas in 1963 it stood at 2,051. I think the figures themselves give the answer to the House.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, the statement—

Mr. Chairman: Order! This member has the floor.

Mr. Bryden: That is all right. It does not matter, I will get my word in.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, the point was this, that in my remarks, the remarks at the beginning of this vote, I suggested that the department's own advisors, in the study that they undertook with the Northwestern University in 1961, indicated that there were certain grave deficiencies in the policing done by the OPP.

In addition to that, it has been made clear in the press, and the hon. Attorney General has not seen fit to deny that these stories are correct so we must presume that they are correct, it has been made abundantly clear that there was a request for $2 million more to do this job properly. If the outside experts so advise and if the requests have come from his own officials surely, whether or not there has been an 18 per cent increase one year and a 25 per cent increase the next year or a 1,000 per cent increase the year after, surely the question has to be, Mr. Chairman: Is the job being properly done?

Mr. L. M. Hodgson: Your argument is based on 1961.

Mr. Singer: If my hon. friend wants to go into the figures a little more thoroughly, it is worse today than it was in 1961 and it has not kept up—

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): It is ridiculous.

Mr. Singer: All right, it is ridiculous. In line with that, if it is all so ridiculous, Mr. Chairman, why did the commissioner of police come to his Minister and say, "Give me $2 million more than this $23,907,000," unless he felt that he needed those men? Why did all the opinions indicate that this was necessary?

Now it is all very well to say it is not just policing that is going to prevent accidents. Of course it is not, there are a lot of things that are going to do it; but policing is a very important role and I would suggest, before this vote is carried, the hon. Attorney General still has the power to ask this House for an extra $2 million to do the job properly. I am sure he will get it without a dissenting voice.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, just to underline the point that the hon. member for Downsview has made, the hon. Attorney General was given the opportunity to deny the stories that appeared in the press and I think it was incumbent upon him to do so if they were in fact untrue. This is a matter affecting the safety and welfare of all the people of the province. If there are stories abroad indicating that insufficient attention is being paid to the problem, insufficient money is being made available to do the job adequately, then I think it is most important that the hon. Attorney General should set the record straight. He persists, in response to our queries, on giving information that does not relate to the real question at all. The real question is not the size of the increase as between 1962 and 1963 or between 1963 and 1964, the question that has been raised, and which I think this House and the people of the province are entitled to have answered, is: Is the amount he is proposing adequate for the job? That is the real question.

The hon. Attorney General, after three attempts, has carefully refrained from answering that question. The only conclusion I can draw is that the statements in the press must be true, that insufficient money is being made available and that it apparently was cut out by the Treasury board from an idea of economy, which is false, especially when one considers that in relation to the total Budget the amount of money is not large. This must be true, otherwise I am sure the hon. Attorney General would have taken the first opportunity to deny the statements made.

I can appreciate the embarrassing position in which he probably finds himself in having to defend an indefensible policy, but that still does not answer the question. I agree with the hon. member for Downsview that this vote should be held until the government has a chance to reconsider the position in which it finds itself.

One can only conclude that inadequate funds are being made available for the provincial police. This is not exclusively a matter of traffic control by any means, although certainly traffic control, as the hon. member for High Park indicated, is an important facet of it. We can agree with the hon. Attorney General that proper police supervision is not the only answer to the problem of accidents. We would agree with all those things, but the basic fact still remains that he has not answered the question. The only conclusion one can draw is that he does not have an answer.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, let me disabuse the hon. member's mind that the Attorney General is embarrassed, and trying to defend an indefensible position. That is the first thing I should like him to know.

Mr. Bryden: Well, you certainly have not answered.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The second thing I should like him to know, as I have stated before in this House, is that I do not feel called upon to get up and deny everything that appears in the press, and I do not propose to start that policy. I will let my own actions and my policies as I state them, speak for themselves. I do not propose to answer reports in the press.

The third thing I would say is that the estimate I have asked for today from this House of $23,907,000, which is $3,607,000 more than last year, will allow for an orderly development of recruitment and training within our limitations in this province, and will allow for an orderly advancement of the force—adequate to take care of what I consider to be the situation we face in the province.

Mr. R. Gisborn (Wentworth East): Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to delay this question unduly and if I might just speak for a couple of minutes we might get this vote over with, I do not know.

I would just like to support the hon. members in their feeling that we should have an increase in the personnel of the provincial police in this province to effectively police the traffic behaviour on the highways. And I want to talk about a stretch of highway that I travel twice a day and have observed for some years, and that is the stretch from Hamilton to Toronto on the Queen Elizabeth highway.

Now I raised this question with the hon. Minister of Transport last year; I had noticed during that session that the signs that restricted truck traffic to 55 miles an hour were missing, and I questioned him about it, because I observed that trucks were travelling at a higher rate of speed. At that time it was 55 for trucks and 60 for passenger car traffic. I was told by the hon. Minister that they had changed that regulation and trucks could travel at the 60 mile an hour limit.

I was quite surprised at the illogical reasoning to this because this did tend to have some effect on the increasing truck traffic on that stretch. I do not think anyone will disagree that more trucks are travelling on that stretch, and I might include Highway 27 to 401 and 401 to the city limits, as being one of the most nerve-racking trips that a passenger car can take.

I am not blaming the hon. Attorney General for this situation, but it leads up to my question. The traffic at that point, where the limit was 60 miles an hour for passenger cars and 55 for trucks, was moving at between 65 and 70. This would seem to be the going speed, and I predicted at that time, that with the lack of any control, it would increase gradually, and today this has happened.

Passenger cars now have adopted a speed of between 65 and 75 and because there is no differential, the heavy trucks are keeping up with them. Now, on a short strip where there are many spots of merging traffic from three lanes to two lanes and an approaching access, this is too high a speed for trucks carrying from 20 to 50 tons of cargo. I predict that we are going to have a rash of serious accidents on that stretch if there is not more policing done.

I do not blame the police force who are assigned to that area, but maybe because of the shortage of police you can often drive from Hamilton to Toronto and not observe one police car. I am sure that experienced passenger car drivers can put up with this, but they have to keep their wits about them, and any kind of a timid driver, or an aged driver, as I have observed in the past few weeks, almost does not know where he is going.

I have noticed, and followed, two trucks passing one another for five miles at a stretch, both of them hitting over 70 miles an hour. Now certainly there is a need for more policing on these stretches of highway.

I think there should be a differential between the trucks and cars, and again this is not the business of the hon. Attorney General—it is in The Department of Transport's area—but it should be policed. This is the responsibility of the hon. Attorney General's department and I would urge him to make a survey of just what is going on on that stretch, because it is getting worse all the time.

I am sure that the truck drivers are rough, burly people, they are adventurous, they are good drivers, they know the laws, but they still push those trucks to the limit and when passenger cars creep up to driving as a habit between 65 and 75 mph, the trucks now, because there is no differential, are going to do the same thing. It is just not the type of thing to be taking place in that type of a stretch of highway and I would appeal for more policing to slow them down to the regulation speed.

Vote 212 agreed to.

Mr. Chairman: This completes the estimates of The Department of the Attorney General.

It being 6 o'clock, p.m., the House took recess.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

TUESDAY, MAY 18, 1965

The House resumed at 8 o'clock, p.m.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

Hon. T. R. Connell (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Chairman, if my arithmetic is correct, this is the seventh time I have had the privilege of going through the Public Works estimates. This has been a long two weeks. I have never had the privilege of being an expectant father, but I have sat up with a couple of mares for several nights this winter waiting for them to foal. It certainly is nothing compared with these past two weeks waiting to go on with my estimates.

However, I would like to compliment the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Wishart). I do not think this is usually done by another Minister, but in the 14 years that I have been around here, I think the last two weeks have been remarkable, as far as I am concerned. The fact that the hon. Attorney General, who has been in this House for what might be a session and a half—I am not sure yet—has to have the knowledge of his department and—I would not say the grilling—certainly with the questions that the Opposition have thrown at him, I think he has shown a remarkable knowledge of The Department of the Attorney General. I only wish the rest of us had the ability to restrain ourselves under extreme provocation that the hon. Attorney General has.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): You were doing fine until that last phrase.

Hon. Mr. Connell: This session has been getting rather lengthy. I sometimes wonder if the good working quarters that the Minister of Public Works has provided around here has had anything to do with making things so comfortable that it has added up to this long session, but I assure you that we could still change things around a bit here if that could be the cause.

I would like, before I start, to compliment my own staff for their loyalty and their hard work. I call myself the janitor, and we are the janitor department. But I have a faithful group of people in my department, and I would like to take this opportunity of expressing my thanks to them.

You have had my annual report on your desks for quite some time; I think you will see many of the things that have been done during this past year or so, and I would not care to repeat on any of that at this time. However, I think it only right that we, in Public Works go along with our building at all times. I do not think we realize just how much money the department or the government is spending on many of these important buildings. If you would bear me with for a few moments, I would like to mention, for the record, half a dozen or so. First of all, of course, is our own Queen's Park project, which is nicely under way, and our Treasury building extension, which is better than 60 per cent complete. I think it might be of interest to the hon. members, if you have not taken the opportunity to look, to go in the north wing and find a completely renovated area; it is remarkable. I had no idea that the space was available there myself. We are hoping the hon. Provincial Secretary will be able to utilize that section completely.

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary): Open house next week.

Hon. Mr. Connell: Under Agriculture we have, of course, the chemistry and microbiology building, and the poultry and virus research institutes, both of which are practically complete. Under Education, we have the London vocational centre, the Ottawa vocational centre and the Sault Ste. Marie vocational centre, two of which are open and the other is about complete. Of course, we also have the London college of education and second stage of the Milton school for the deaf.

Under Health, we have the Ontario psychiatric institute, which we have heard about for 20 years around here, now about 63 per cent complete, as of a month or so ago. We have the Toronto central lab, the Porcupine Ontario hospital, a 300-bed hospital, and the Palmerston, which is just about complete; and the first stage of the London Ontario hospital. Under Highways we have the regional and district office building.

The list is by no means complete, but these are some of the larger ones.

Much of the work that we are proposing to get on with will be called for tender this year. That would include the institutes of technology at Hamilton, Kirkland Lake and Windsor, vocational centres at Hamilton and Welland, a bilingual teachers' college at Sudbury, a college of education at Kingston, and an adult educational centre at Toronto.

Under Health, we have stage two of the London Ontario hospital, the clinical services building at North Bay, the regional lab at Palmerston, new hospital units at Penetanguishene, the alcohol and drug addiction research and treatment clinic in Toronto and, of course, some alterations to the station at Edgar, which we purchased last year.

Under The Department of Lands and Forests we have the district office building at Cochrane and Kenora, a chief ranger's office at Terrace Bay, and an office and laboratory building at Wheatley.

Under The Department of Reform Institutions we have a building to replace the Andrew Mercer reformatory for women; we have the Hagersville RCAF station, which we recently purchased for a boys' training school, and a new boys' training school in northern Ontario—actually, we think that will be in the McFarlan Lake area, and in southern Ontario, to establish and provide facilities for a reception and diagnostic centre.

Under The Department of Tourism and Information, we have a reception centre at Sault Ste. Marie, one at Homer and, of course, the new centennial project in Metropolitan Toronto.

Under The Department of Transport we will be constructing a new field centre at Port Arthur.

As I mentioned earlier, most of these buildings will, more than likely, be called for tender some time during this year, or early next year.

My own budget is up a bit this year. We are asking for $922,000 more in our ordinary expenditure, and about $8 million more in our capital expenditure. Strangely enough, this is the first year that we have spent up to our full budget; in fact, we are a bit over. This is the first time it has happened in a good many years.

I think that pretty well completes my remarks at this time. I have often heard that brevity is a sign of virtue; I do not know whether it is in my case, but I would think it would be a good time to bring virtue back into its proper state.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

On vote 1801:

Mr. J. P. Spence (Kent East): Mr. Chairman, I have listened with interest to the hon. Minister this evening, and I must say that he was very brief in outlining his estimates. However, I must say to the hon. Minister—he is a very fair man to discuss problems with, with regard to his department, and I can also say that he is a very friendly man—but it is with continual amazement that we have observed the antics of The Department of Public Works.

During the estimates of this department last year, my colleague to the left of me, the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. Newman) made reference to the fact that there were $85 million unexpended in the estimates of this department over the past five years, and criticized the lack of planning which this amount indicates. Has the hon. Minister attempted to rectify this situation?

I would say that according to the public accounts for 1964, there is no indication this has been so because we see a surplus this year of over $5.7 million. I also would say that The Department of Public Works is not a profit-making organization. Its success is not measured by the surplus which it shows at the end of each fiscal year. I would say that its success can only be measured in relation to its ability to meet the needs of the people of the province of Ontario. How well are these needs being met? In several areas the government has been negligent of the legitimate desire of the people they are meant to serve.

The late president of the United States, John F. Kennedy said: The next question to war and peace is: Will man live? The second problem of civilization is: How will man live?

While other Legislatures and governments may have it within their power to control the first issue, it is certainly within the grasp of our provincial government to aid a great deal. On the achievement of the second, Professor Galbraith wrote a noted book, "The Affluent Society." By the way, Professor Galbraith was born in the riding that I have the honour to represent. In his book he made reference to this expansion of investments in this public sector.

I might say about Professor Galbraith, that he also wrote another book, "The Scotch", and for the benefit of my constituents, I wish he had not.

The problem is how this growing investment is to be handled. I would say that this government has given up its responsibility in regard to the proper handling of funds in the construction of public works. This can be illustrated in many ways, Mr. Chairman. All these criticisms serve to underline the lack of effective planning which this department displays.

The blue book here provides the untrained reader with what seems like a great account of action, taken by a dynamic department of government. In fact, it hides a great deal more than it reveals. Let us break the blue book down into only three sections—projects completed, projects planned or underway, work being done on individual projects. In the section projects planned or underway, there is no way of knowing which projects are actually underway and which are merely in the planning stage.

In the section of planned projects requested, there are several unanswered questions. Where, for example, does the department indicate priorities which it places on various works? Why have several projects remained requested and listed for a number of years? Is the hon. Minister confused in deciding whether or not these projects are worthy of the taxpayers' support? Surely he could not be delaying because of the lack of funds, as his department shows a $5.7 million surplus.

This is a perfect illustration that the left hand does not know what the right hand is doing, while projects remain unattended to.

The hon. Minister boasts a surplus. Whether this is merely inefficiency or incompetence, or simply an example of political arithmetic, I would say that this is a cruel game to play when the needs of the people of Ontario are so great. There are several examples of such phenomena which I could give. After 326 projects shown as requested in the 1964-65 blue book, there were still 159 of these not acted upon in any way, as shown by the 1965-66 blue book. That is approximately 49 per cent of the requested projects, over one year ago, that have not yet been acted upon.

Let us consider the 51 per cent of projects on which some decision has been made over the past year. Of these 167 requested projects, only eight have been completed, and only 45 are in the planning or the construction stage, while the majority of the 114 projects have completely disappeared from the blue book.

The hon. Attorney General's department provides an excellent illustration. I refer you to the blue book of 1964-65, page 30. Here we find that this department requested 30 new projects. However, upon examination of the 1965-66 blue book, I find that, in fact, none of these projects have been completed, while seven have been completely dropped and the remaining 23 have not yet reached the planning stage. With illustrations such as this, it is no wonder we have delays in construction of new buildings.

Another illustration of delay is in the police college at Aylmer, Ontario. The Ontario police commissioner recommended that serious and immediate consideration be given to the erection of a new permanent building to replace the present inadequate temporary accommodation. I know that the hon. Attorney General is aware of this problem, as he has made reference to this section of the police commissioner's report. How long must the people of Ontario wait until some action is taken on this important matter?

Again, this year we find such new buildings listed in the blue book under projects requested. The new police college, so urgently required, has not reached the planning stage, Mr. Chairman. The hon. Minister shows surpluses. The hon. Attorney General commented recently that the replacement and extension of the police college is on the capital programme of The Department of Public Works. I cannot say, of course, that the police college is in the estimates for this year, but I think I can say that the government seems to be stalling on this structure. The hon. Minister says that they are moving; I would ask, Mr. Chairman, in what direction?

This is one example of the inefficiency and apathy of this department. If this blue book is to become a meaningful and useful document, many changes must be made. There must be a priority list, a construction timetable for all projects—projects requested, projects being planned or being constructed. For all projects in construction stage and projects completed, the blue book should also list the name of the successful bidders, the date of the tenders which are signed, tender price, date of completion and the final cost. Only then, Mr. Chairman, would a layman such as I be able to understand what is taking place. Only then will this blue book become a genuine source of information, instead of a publicity booklet for this government.

Another area of concern is the question of leasing. We see the government continuing to pour hundreds of thousands of dollars into rental of private buildings in order to provide office space needed for the various departments. In a few years, when the government buildings are ready, the department moves into them, and the government will have nothing to show for these huge leasing expenditures. If, on the other hand, the government had purchased these buildings they could have derived some profit from the sale when they no longer required the use of such excess space.

Take, for example, The Department of Economics and Development. It was driven from its home on University Avenue to its new site at 950 Yonge Street. When we investigated the ownership of this building, we found it to be in private hands. I would ask the hon. Minister to make public the leasing contract for this particular building.

I note with dismay that in the estimates of 1964-65, The Department of Public Works requested $2.5 million for leasing purposes. In the 1965 and 1966 estimates, this request jumped up to $3.2 million, an increase of 28 per cent. It is unfortunate that expenditures of this kind, where there are no future returns for investment, must continue to expand. Had the department been properly co-ordinated with the other departments, it would have been aware of the needs of the other departments and could have had new facilities ready as the need arose.

For example, regarding The Department of Economics and Development, it should have been possible for the department to make one move from University Avenue to the new Queen's Park extension. Instead, the lack of proper planning has led to a situation where two moves will be required, and the taxpayers of Ontario will be required to bear the expense of these two moves, plus the years of rental, because The Department of Economics and Development was slow to express its needs, or because The Department of Public Works was slow to act upon them. And still The Department of Public Works shows a $5.7 million surplus.

A recent report by the noted Canadian architects, John C. Parkin and John G. Spence—I want to say, Mr. Chairman, no relation whatsoever to me—

Mr. Singer: But a fine fellow, too.

Mr. Spence: A good fellow—complained about the lack of concern for beauty in the design of public buildings in the province of Ontario. They observe that for the most part, Queen's Park is simply a traffic impediment. The citizens in Toronto have been given no tangible awareness of their city as to the capital of the great province, nor reminded of the privileges of their position in the capital. For most people living in Ontario, Queen's Park is a place to visit either in gloom or discomfort. The citizens of Ontario ought to be given a coherent grouping of buildings whose quality would give pride and identity.

We congratulate the hon. Minister on finally beginning to give the people of Ontario this grouping of buildings, but we ask him where is the quality that the people of Ontario have the right to? These upended shoe boxes are typical of the dull nature of this government.

Several hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Spence: It is one thing to integrate the design of government buildings to those which surround them; it is another thing, too, to so closely imitate the grey drabness of University Avenue that the government buildings completely lose their character, and the people of Ontario have nothing with which to identify them.

An hon. member: There are some characters in them.

Mr. Spence: Surely we have the right to expect to be able to tell the difference between our government buildings and our hospitals? If the city of Toronto can hold a world-wide competition for design of its city hall, can the province do less?

Mr. G. A. Kerr (Halton): What would it cost?

Mr. Spence: What of the one original building that we have—this, our Parliament building or our Ontario Legislature, a building where much history has been written? As we approach the 100th birthday of our nation, and also the 75th anniversary of Queen's Park, I suggest to the hon. Minister that on our 100th birthday it will be time to think of giving this Legislature building a facelifting.

Several hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Spence: There is great beauty hidden by layers and layers of dirt, dust and decay. This building should be sandblasted and restored to its natural colour for the 100th birthday of our country in the year 1967.

Another matter which many hon. members notice is the paved walk which runs through the park in front of the Legislature. I know that the members who use this walk will agree with me that if such a walk, with its broken slabs, pit holes and dabs of new cement—an attempt to repair—came under The Department of Highways it would immediately be slated for upgrading.

I would suggest to the hon. Minister of Public Works that he take a stroll down this walk some night, after a late sitting, and I am sure that after such a walk in the dark there would be an order not just for an overhaul job, but for a completely new walk.

An hon. member: Or an action against the Crown.

Mr. Singer: He would not be covered by insurance anyway.

Mr. Spence: At present, it is a disgrace to walk on it, or over the beautiful flower beds that used to grace this walk. They have never been restored since they were removed for the subway construction. These flower beds added much to the appearance of the front of this historic building.

In criticizing the government for inadequate planning by The Department of Public Works, there is another point I would like to make. In this report of Mr. Parkin and Mr. Spence, they refer to the value of decentralizing public buildings in the province. They discuss what they call the human love of symbolism. This again stresses the point that the people want something specific with which they can closely identify their government.

Therefore within the limits allowed by efficiency, the location of government buildings should be more evenly spread across the province of Ontario. Is it really necessary for all government departments to be located within the Metropolitan Toronto area, or even within the Golden Horseshoe?

To quote again from the architects' report:

The provincial government can greatly assist the development of culture values in our principal cities by planned grouping of government buildings, in cultural centres, rather than permitting uncoordinated scattering of provincial buildings throughout communities.

I might say here, Mr. Chairman, that not all the government departments are going to be brought back to Queen's Park after the new complex is completed. I might suggest there is the Ontario hospital services commission, maybe Ontario Hydro, maybe the junior farmers' loan board, and maybe this new medical plan which is being considered by this government. It might be located outside this metropolitan area or the Golden Horseshoe, in a rural area where it would be of tremendous benefit.

Mr. W. D. McKeough (Kent West): Chatham.

Mr. Spence: That is right, Chatham. The Department of Public Works should not only plan for Metropolitan Toronto, but for the whole province of Ontario.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to give credit to the hon. Minister of Public Works. During the session of 1962 and 1963, many complaints were brought to the attention of the hon. Minister regarding the offices of the official Opposition. We had cramped quarters, not enough space for the official Opposition to carry out their responsibilities.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Your hon. leader (Mr. Thompson) said you were quite pleased about the changes that had been made.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Give him a chance.

Mr. Spence: I was just saying that many complaints in the past—

An hon. member: You can change your text.

Mr. Spence: That is right, I will change it. I was just going to give credit to the hon. Minister of Public Works.

Mr. G. Bukator (Niagara Falls): I just want to get it on the record that I am not at all satisfied with our new office space.

Mr. Spence: I want to say this, this was in the past—

An hon. member: Under the Hepburn government.

Mr. Spence: No, under this government. The hon. member for Sudbury stated that top agriculturists allot more space for a steer than this government allotted for 24 members of the Loyal Opposition, before these offices were improved. That is what I am trying to bring to your attention.

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture): Well, this beef business is big business.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Kind of bull.

Mr. Sopha: Bulls need more room.

Mr. Spence: Mr. House Leader, I was always afraid before the changes were made in our offices that the humane society would call and investigate this crowded condition, and this government would be brought into court. At the beginning of the present session, however, I must say we have new offices, new desks, new telephones for every two members, new lighting, brightened up rooms, new caucus rooms and new chairs. Our leader has a bright new office, which is a great improvement. I wish to commend the hon. Minister of Public Works for the improvements made in the northwest lobby, too—new rugs, new chairs, attractive lamps. I can advise the Minister that we now have a place where we can take constituents who come from our ridings—

An hon. member: It has been entirely overdone, no doubt about that.

Mr. Spence:—and also visiting delegations and other groups. It is a credit, and we certainly do appreciate it. It was long overdue.

Mr. Singer: Do not overdo it.

An hon. member: I do not remember it that good.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: It was not meant for entertainment. We have not seen any improvement in the Opposition.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): We get the entertainment here.

Mr. Spence: You must have been afraid of the humane society or you would not have done it.

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Grey South): Once given you cannot take it away.

Mr. Spence: That is right. We do appreciate this, Mr. Chairman, it is a great improvement.

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): Makes working a pleasure.

Mr. Spence: That is right. I do not know that I have too much to say. I have a few questions as the estimates go along. I know my colleagues have questions to ask, so with these few remarks I will conclude.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I am going to startle the Minister by saying that I will match and outdo his brevity. I think there are a few things that should be said more personally about this hon. Minister than the department. I know of no more affable and straightforward and non-political Minister in the government—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. MacDonald: Notwithstanding the interjection to my right I stick with what I said.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. MacDonald: I am talking about sitting down and dealing with the estimates here. What he does when he gathers the Tory clan at his barbecue and gets rid of his surplus fowl, because of the collapse in the fowl marketing procedures in The Department of Agriculture, is another matter. If you wanted proof of the fact of his earthy qualities and his realistic approach to things, I have never known a Minister who could come in here and equate the gestation period of waiting to give his own estimates, and sitting waiting for a couple of mares to foal.

There is just one item that I would like to mention. It was touched on in the concluding remarks of the hon. member for Kent East, and that is to express our appreciation for the improvement in the facilities that have been made here at Queen's Park. I think with him that they were overdue. I will not say "I told you so" in terms of longer sessions, but I think inevitably we are going to have longer sessions, and therefore I think this kind of modern facility was required.

I know something of the incredible pressures and cross-currents that the hon. Minister had to contend with—he and his staff—in trying to meet the wishes, the desires and the needs of everybody. Now, at the risk of being a bit disconcerting for some on the other side, and particularly when I can safely say this now that the hon. Provincial Secretary has gone out, I have one note of criticism.

I think one mistake has been made in this. I think the proposition of this building becoming the centre of the government was a good proposition, and I think in the process of doing it the hon. Provincial Secretary's department should have been moved out of this building altogether, and instead—and I do not say this aggressively or critically, but I rather firmly believe prophetically—in the years to come we will recognize that what we should have done is taken the north wing of this building and created offices—one office with offices for one or two members, conceivably three or four, but certainly no more—along the lines that has been done in Ottawa.

When you sit 12, 14 or 16 people in tiers of desks with telephones and secretaries to whom they are going to dictate, one of two things happens. If it is a person who has been used to normal office facilities, he is going to find it difficult to accommodate himself to that. If it is a person who has not been used to normal office facilities, he will find it an improvement over what we have had here—and, I would add, a very definite improvement over what the government back benchers have had. As I have said before, and I repeat here, with all of the criticism that has been made, I concede it has been the government members who have had the worst facilities. They have all been crowded into a lounge. But the improved facilities are far from ideal.

I submit—I just sort of plant this little seed with the hon. Minister of Public Works, who is basically a farmer; when he is not looking after his mares who are about to foal he will watch the seed grow—that some time or another we get the kind of facilities that are worthy of a province the size of Ontario and the people who are responsible for the business of that province. The idea of an office with a couple of people, or, I repeat, perhaps three or four—that will make it handy for bridge—in one office, is what we should be; I think this is what we will be driven to.

However, I hesitated to say this. I thought it appropriately should be said maybe two or three years from now, but I was emboldened by the absence of the hon. Provincial Secretary who, I know, would blow a fuse and go into orbit if he were here. But he is not here, so I said it and he can read it in the record and blow his fuse at home.

Anything else we have to say in these estimates we will raise in the individual estimate.

Hon. Mr. Connell: Mr. Chairman, I would like to reply very briefly to some of the remarks that have been made. I will speak to the leader of the New Democratic Party first in saying that a decision was made about three years ago not to use the north wing for members. In fact, I think I announced it in the House possibly four years ago that we were going to use it for the members, but the decision was made not to do that. Whether it will prove wrong in the end or not those few years will have to tell.

As far as my hon. friend from Kent East is concerned, I have really seen another side of him tonight that I did not realize existed. I remember that old picture I saw about 30 years ago of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, and I could not help but make that comparison tonight. I really did not expect some of the things from him that came about. However, I do appreciate his position and his remarks.

Actually, he was complaining about the surplus which we had a year ago of $5 million. I mentioned in my opening remarks that we actually overspent our budget last year by more than the hon. Provincial Treasurer

(Mr. Allan) appreciated, I will put it that way.

I have not had an opportunity to look up the contract arrangements for the Economics and Development building, but I do know that it is on a 10-year basis, and I know the rent is a fair one, but I will give the figures later on.

The sidewalk in front of the buildings is actually the city of Toronto's. I would say about 95 per cent of that sidewalk belongs to the city of Toronto, and their parks people are looking after it. I believe my deputy has already spoken to them about fixing that portion a bit.

We have some plans for that area that we hope to work out with the city of Toronto. They have not gone as far ahead as I would like, but I hope that we can make some changes out there to fit in with the rest of our buildings.

The hon. member also mentioned about the architects. If you meet with 50 or 100 architects, you will get 50 or 100 opinions as to how things should be done. They mention also about the decentralization of departments. I do not see the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Letherby) here tonight; he has been suggesting decentralization for years—in fact, he once invited us up to Orillia a few years ago. I think this has a lot of merit; I think we have about reached our limit as far as Queen's Park is concerned. I do not know what the architects and the experts think, but I could not agree with you more. I think we are bringing all the people we need into this particular area of the town. I have mentioned on many occasions that there are departments that could quite conceivably exist outside of the city of Toronto, and be quite an advantage not only to the department that might be chosen to go, but also to that municipality.

Those are brief remarks. I could not keep track of all the hon. member mentioned there, particularly as far as priorities are concerned. Priorities do change. I think the hon. member mentioned the Ontario provincial police. There has been quite a change in thinking on some of the OPP headquarters. I think the reason that some buildings listed as priority have since disappeared is that we have possibly leased a space for the OPP in that area.

It is easy enough to make suggestions that it could improve the blue book, but we try to give you a fair outline of the work requested. I emphasize that—it is work requested. These requests come from all areas of the province. I often wonder where the requests come from, but it is simply a request; that is all it is. It does not necessarily say that because it is in that blue book it is going to be done this year or next, or the year after. It is simply trying to show the assembly here the type of requests and the amount of requests that are coming in for The Department of Public Works.

Mr. Sopha: I would like to plead with the hon. Minister, as some of my hon. colleagues have done in previous years, for the establishment of a crosswalk at the bottom of that sidewalk before damage is done to life and limb. With the opening of the subway, a great many more people are using that route of egress away from the buildings.

Hon. Mr. Connell: I realize this has been mentioned before, and I would not say the idea is wrong at all. But I think it is a city of Toronto responsibility. Their traffic experts would possibly object strenuously to a second stop right at that particular area, but certainly—possibly I said this last year—I will make a point of writing the city people, the authorities, and ask them to consider that.

Vote 1801 agreed to.

On vote 1802:

Mr. T. L. Wells (Scarborough North): Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a few words on this vote, understanding what the hon. Minister has already said about the sidewalk in front and informing us that this piece of property belongs to the city of Toronto. All of us who walk up and down that sidewalk notice that the government has erected a plaque telling us that this park—and I assume the one behind—where this building now stands, was originally dedicated on September 11, 1860, as Queen's Park, and it was in fact opened by the then Prince of Wales, who later became King Edward VII of England. This is a very important park, and I think that it is perhaps regrettable that that section in front of the buildings in particular has been allowed to degenerate.

I say that advisedly, and I say it because I realize it now belongs to the city of Toronto. But many of us can remember when there used to be beautiful flower beds there. At this time of year there would be tulips blooming on both sides of that sidewalk. For some reason, since the subway has been constructed, these are no longer there.

But what I would like to suggest to the hon. Minister and ask that he take under consideration, is the possibility of the government obtaining this park in front of the buildings and making it responsible to The Department of Public Works.

Now I would just like to outline why I think that this is something that should be done. I think, as I said, that this is an important park. It was dedicated by a former King of England, it holds great associations for a lot of people here, its name is the name by which the centre of government of Ontario has come to be known.

I think that a lot could be done out there, and a couple of ideas that I would like to suggest are; first, that the statue of Sir John A. Macdonald should be moved back. It is too close to the road now. Perhaps it was well placed before the widenings and the great amount of traffic that is now around here, but now you cannot get in front of the statue without getting out onto the road. I think that it should be set back with proper approaches. I think that on the sides of the sidewalk would be a good opportunity.

There has been talk about renaming University Avenue, the "Avenue of the Provinces." It would be a good opportunity for the excellent gardeners in The Department of Public Works to lay out a sort of miniature avenue of the provinces going right up to the front door of this building, and having a formal garden for each province in which their wild flowers, or their floral symbol, would be present. In other words, we would have trilliums representing Ontario; pitcher plants for Newfoundland; mayflowers for Nova Scotia; the blue violets for New Brunswick; ladies' slippers for Prince Edward Island; Quebec's flower, the blue iris, in another garden setting; the crocus for Manitoba; the prairie lily for Saskatchewan; the wild rose for Alberta and the dogwood for British Columbia, along with a plaque for each province.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Have them blooming all year round.

Mr. Wells: Have them all blooming at their appropriate time, but with the appropriate plants, if this is possible. This could be done, along with a programme to put in that park some of the natural trees that are found in the province of Ontario, with some appropriate plaques on the trees.

We have many thousands of students who come to see these buildings every year, and I think as part of their programme they could also be given—in the good months of the year

—a tour of the grounds, including this natural science exhibit, plus an explanation of the many fine statues that are out here which I think most of the people of this province do not even know exist, and yet they are found in this park—the statue of Sir John A. Macdonald, George Brown, John Sandfield Macdonald, Sir Oliver Mowat and so forth.

I think that a lot more could be done with this piece of land. It could be a complement to the fine job that has been done on the inside of these buildings. I would like to ask the hon. Minister to take this under consideration. Perhaps he has some plan to approach the city and attempt either to get them to do something with this land, or else to let us have the land and let The Department of Public Works—who I know could do a good job—take it over.

Mr. Bukator: On vote 1802, could the hon. Minister explain why the salaries of the maintenance staff of government buildings are $61,000 lower for 1965-66 than they were in 1964-65? Has the government found a more efficient way to maintain this building, or has it simply reduced the wages of the maintenance workers?

Hon. Mr. Connell: About the only thing I can think of is just straight efficiency, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Bukator: If that is the case—and you should not slough that off so easily—may I ask about when the staff here were parading, after asking for a bit more money for the cleaning of this building, what did you do about that particular case? Were they increased in pay at all, or were they just sloughed off again, as sometimes the government does?

Hon. Mr. Connell: Actually, they have been restored to their $2,400 original pay. I hope I am not taking any words out of the hon. Provincial Treasurer's mouth. This comes in under the civil service estimates. Taken on new, they will be working at $1.50 an hour, which is the standard rate, and I think that works out to about $2,145.

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): $2,145?

Mr. Bukator: Then just enlighten me a little bit further. I did not follow the newspaper accounts, or worry too much about the parade here. Apparently there was a decrease in the wages of a particular group and they made a bit of a demonstration. But it was increased back to its original amount? Is that the case?

Hon. Mr. Connell: Yes, I think so. Actually, this comes under the civil service.

Mr. Bukator: In that case, I will wait until the civil service estimates come up.

Hon. Mr. Connell: We do not set the rates in our department—the civil service sets the rates. I am not sure of the actual history of it, but I know they have been restored—the senior ones—to their original amount.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Mr. Chairman, redistribution of the seats will evidently require facilities for another nine or 10 members after the next election, and in discussing this with some of the people around the Chamber I heard that there were further renovations planned for this Chamber. Has the hon. Minister any announcement about that at all?

Hon. Mr. Connell: I have not anything too definite. We have two or three designs. We had, at one time, thought of going back to the old original idea of having this horseshoe type, but my people have come up with some plans now, so that they can work in an extra 10 feet, or whatever the amount is—

Mr. McKeough: They will all be Tory seats.

Hon. Mr. Connell: It works in quite well, and we will be continuing some changes here. I think we have to extend it a bit. I think we plan that rather than taking the visitors into this lower gallery, up these stairs here, we hope that we can work it out to bring them inside here and possibly restore the bar to the House that we had—

Mr. Nixon: Which bar is that?

Hon. Mr. Connell: It is not the bar that some might be referring to. They tell me there used to be a bar across where the two page boys are standing. We hope to go ahead with that work this summer, if possible.

Mr. Nixon: You have abandoned any thought that the seats might be arranged in a semi-circle—

Hon. Mr. Connell: The opinion of the experts is that this is not nearly as practical as adding to what we already have here, and having the centre all free.

Mr. Oliver: Will the hon. Minister say why we spend $1,200,000 on communications? What does that entail?

Hon. Mr. Connell: I will admit that it went up because I let hon. members do a little more calling than they used to. But our communications services have gone up rather drastically—I should not use the word “drastically,” I guess, but they have expanded very quickly. We have many more new buildings and hospitals in service; we are renting more direct lines which are—of course we rent them on a 24-hour basis, but I assure you that if we had not changed our service here about three or four years ago, it would have been considerably higher than this. I think we are getting an efficient telephone service, as nearly as I can make out, but it is comparable with the growth of the province that we have had to continually increase this part of our budget.

Mr. Oliver: From what my hon. friend has said, that leaves me the opportunity to say something about the telephone service, which I think should be said. I agree that what has been done by the government for a great number of the hon. members of the Legislature, is a very good and commendable thing. The unfortunate part, of course, as the hon. Minister knows, is that the extended service applies only to a portion of the membership of the House, and I believe that the hon. Minister and the government, having gone as far as they have gone in supplying what I think is a very worthwhile service, should go the whole way and in some manner, map out a programme that will bring the benefit of telephone service to the rest of the hon. members of the Legislature.

Speaking personally, and I do not want it to apply too personally because it does not matter too much to me—I am speaking for a number of our own hon. members on this side of the House and I am sure I am for a number of hon. members on my hon. friend's side of the House.

There is surely an area of discrimination that creeps into this situation when half or more of the hon. members of the Legislature can call—and not only call, but do much of the business relating to their constituencies—by telephone, free of charge, while the other portion of the membership have to pay for every call that they make. Today, for instance, I paid for three calls myself, and I am sure that other hon. members have done the same thing.

I appreciate what my hon. friend has done, but I admire his capabilities to this extent. I am sure he can work out some system that will involve benefit for not only a portion of the membership, but for the whole membership of the Legislature. I think he should go to work on it.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. Connell: Mr. Chairman, I will enlarge on my other statement, that actually most of the departments used to look after their own telephone bills. This has been referred to our department which is looking after all long-distance calls for the various departments. That explains, in a little greater detail, why that amount has gone up in the last two or three years.

As far as hon. members' telephone service is concerned, these direct lines were set up for government use—more or less for the civil service, and these lines were protected with all the ability with which we expect our civil servants to protect them. A year or two ago, whenever I made the offer to hon. members that they could use these private lines, where they were available, it was as a help to those hon. members who could make use of them. Actually, it has been a bit embarrassing to me that these lines are practically impossible to get on now. I am not saying that hon. members are to blame, but it is a strange coincidence that most of these lines are very, very busy.

We were fogged in in Port Arthur for three days last June, and unless you called about 11 o'clock at night, it was impossible to get that line from Port Arthur to Toronto. I think there is only one line from Port Arthur, and—

An hon. member: Yes, George talks a lot.

Hon. Mr. Connell: I should not put the onus on the hon. Minister of Mines (Mr. Wardrope) because that area serves about five or six members up there, I believe. But these direct lines were not put in there for the benefit of the private members, or the local member.

If we were to put in a direct line to look after each member, Mr. Chairman, I can assure you that this $1,200,000 would be very much higher.

I admit my experts advised me against doing that which I did, and I have been holding my head every time we talk about telephone services since. I do not think we will be expanding this; I do not think it would be good policy. I think there were certain things done here a month ago to try to make up for these inequities, and I hope hon. members continue to use this service with moderation—at least, not with moderation themselves, but I hope they continue to use a little discretion on who has this direct line. We are making it most difficult for those people for whom these lines were originally rented from the Bell Telephone Company. I do not think that we will be enlarging this to take in all the members.

If some hon. members are more fortunate than others that they can get on this direct line, that is just the way the cookie crumbles; the others, I think, will have to put up with what they have.

Mr. S. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister indicated that he responds to requests from other departments. Might he take a moment or two to explain to the House the processes of consultation relative to design and structure of the buildings that are developed? Perhaps I might give a special example to which he might relate his remarks. Let us say the Ontario hospital at London, which is presently being constructed, or the Ontario hospital here in Toronto, for which plans are now on the drawing board. Which personnel are brought into the design planning; how do you arrive at a final design? How much participation is there, let us say, by the superintendent of the hospital or the hospital staff involved?

I am curious, because I am frankly perplexed as to the design of some of the buildings in the province.

Hon. Mr. Connell: I do not know whether I could go into that too deeply, but there is close co-operation between the architect and the occupying department—whether it be The Department of Health, The Department of Lands and Forests, or our own department.

I do not say this critically of other departments, but if we were given a little more of a free hand, we could get buildings built much quicker than we do when we have to get everyone's approval. Again, I am not critical. Say someone in The Department of Health decides—I have mentioned this in other years—they want to change rooms from 12 feet by 12 feet to 12 feet by 14 feet, or something like that. They think that it is only two feet difference, but this—a five-minute change in somebody's mind on the design of a room or a hall or something like that—takes a great deal of time for the architect or the engineer to get down to the detailed drawing. I assure the hon. member that we ensure that there is close co-operation in making sure that the occupying department is satisfied completely—or at least as completely as we can go with our budget.

Mr. S. Lewis: The architects are in your department, are they not?

Hon. Mr. Connell: We commission quite a few architects from outside; we commission—I have not got the figures—about 65 per cent to 70 per cent of the work of The Department of Public Works to outside architects. We have a small staff of architects in our own branch.

Mr. S. Lewis: I see. And you commission the outside architects. Now suppose the outside architect draws up a plan in conjunction with, let us say, the London Ontario hospital—which design is an eminently pleasing one, and a utilitarian one, it is presently on the drawing boards—how do you arrive at it? Is it done in conjunction with the superintendent? Is it approved by the mental health branch of The Department of Health? Who does the architect meet with? What are the channels? I am curious to know how—

Hon. Mr. Connell: I cannot give you individuals, but certainly each department—in fact I believe The Department of Health took over one of our own men here three or four years ago, who works very closely as a Department of Health representative—works with our own architectural people, who in turn are dealing with the commission's architect. It is my understanding—I do not get into the details of this—but it is my understanding that they work very, very closely, because it takes a long while for these to get final approval on a specific design of a building.

Mr. S. Lewis: The final approval, you think, is long in forthcoming primarily because of the other departments, rather than The Department of Public Works! I do not want you to put your fellow Cabinet Ministers on the spot, but I would like to get your general feeling about it, because there has been delay in several major projects. Now is it because of this—

Hon. Mr. Connell: Now, I do not criticize these delays. I would rather have a job planned and planned well. I have stated this on many occasions. I would rather be a year late in building it, but have it planned and planned well, rather than rushing ahead just because we are pressured into it. I am all for good, second planning, and you cannot do it by rushing too hard.

Mr. Spence: Mr. Chairman, under this vote, I made mention of a facelifting job of this beautiful building, the Ontario Legislature, on the 100th birthday of our country. Would the hon. Minister care to make any comments along that line?

Hon. Mr. Connell: As far as I am concerned, the old building looks pretty good the way it is. I am not too critical of the ladies for dyeing their hair and such things, but it is nice to grow old gracefully, and that is just about my picture of this old building. I think we will let it grow old gracefully.

Mr. Spence: But you want it cleaned.

Mr. Oliver: Mr. Chairman, on that very point, may I ask my hon. friend, would the exterior of this building lend itself to what we call sandblasting cleaning? Or would it tear into holes, or what would happen?

Hon. Mr. Connell: I think it would stand sandblasting, but I think one of the most beautiful parts of this building is that it is completely covered with ivy. Maybe it is the farmer in me, I do not know, but I like to see the green growing over this building, and if we were to sandblast it, we would have to tear it all down holes, and it would take many, many years for that ivy to be replaced.

Mr. Oliver: You cannot do it while the ivy is there?

Hon. Mr. Connell: No.

Vote 1802 agreed to.

Vote 1803 agreed to.

On vote 1804:

Mr. Bukator: Would the hon. Minister explain what practices are followed by the government in securing rental space for government offices, and particularly, would the hon. Minister tell us how the government came to rent facilities at 950 Yonge Street? Was the space particularly cheap? Did the hon. Minister consider the location, or was location an important factor?

The cost of renting premises is raised by $700,000 I notice this year. Would the hon. Minister explain how much of this increase comes from government's need for additional space, and how much for increased rental space held previously?

Does the sum of $3,200,000 include leasehold improvement expenditures? If so, how much? There are two questions there, one of the rental on Yonge Street, how the hon. Minister came by that? The second is, why the increase of $700,000?

Hon. Mr. Connell: Well, 950 Yonge Street, Economics and Development are renting that for ten years. The area is 60,000 square feet and the annual rental is $228,897. I am not sure whether I followed all your questions or not. I think you originally started out asking how we go about our renting.

Actually, we have a quite active and most dependable section of our government in the property branch. As far as our policy of renting is concerned, they deal with many real estate people. They go out and try to get the best possible price, together with the best possible rent that they can. Then, of course, all these are approved in turn by Treasury board. Were you wanting any more information on 950 Yonge?

Mr. Bukator: That was quite good. You shop around you say, through many brokers and agents, and you find the best for the money. That is the practice, is it not? Then you take it to the Treasury for approval?

Hon. Mr. Connell: That is right.

Mr. Bukator: The second question is the increase in rentals of $700,000.

Hon. Mr. Connell: Two or three of the departments have been granted quite a bit of additional space. I suppose this $228,000 would be a third of this amount. I think The Department of Labour has quite a bit more space, but with an expansive government growing, we have rented a great deal of space this last year.

Mr. Bukator: The other question was, the sum of $3,200,000. Does that include leasehold improvement expenditures? There are times when you must do improvements. Is that part of the expenditure that is borne by you, or the tenant, or does it work both ways from time to time?

Hon. Mr. Connell: It works both ways. Usually we do quite a bit of the improving ourselves, and we try to value the rents accordingly.

Mr. Bukator: You know what you want.

Mr. Oliver: I wanted to ask a general question, perhaps we have passed it. Does my hon. friend in his department, build all the buildings for all the government departments? Do any departments build buildings themselves?

Hon. Mr. Connell: I think, basically, we build all the buildings. Lands and Forests do build a few in the wintertime with their day labour force, but they, in turn, bill them back to us. Basically we build all buildings, but we have had a few provincial police buildings—three or four this past year—that they have built specifically for the police, and we have leased them from whoever built them.

Mr. Oliver: The Highways buildings, the Highways garages, do you build all those?

Hon. Mr. Connell: Highways have built a few of their own, but I think basically, I would have to ask the hon. Minister of Highways that. But as far as I know, I think we build all The Department of Highways buildings.

Mr. Oliver: Well, how is it decided that in a particular instance the Highways department will build their own buildings and not The Department of Public Works?

Hon. Mr. Connell: The only buildings that they might build would be an individual sand shed, or maybe a one- or two-bay garage. They have built the odd one in the past, but I think that is pretty well ruled out to the best of my knowledge now.

Mr. Spence: Mr. Chairmain, does the hon. Minister call tenders for all projects in the province, is everything tendered that is built by your Department of Public Works?

Hon. Mr. Connell: As far as we possibly can. There is the odd project that we cannot. Our north wing was one example. My people felt that they just could not possibly get the specifications written up there to call for a tender. But I would say—I will not mention percentages—but I would say at least maybe 90 per cent of our buildings are called by tender and built by contract.

Mr. Spence: Ten per cent is built by your own department?

Hon. Mr. Connell: I have not got the figures, I am guessing at that, but I would say it would approach that.

Mr. L. A. Braithwaite (Etobicoke): Mr. Chairman, in connection with the building by the department, I wonder if the hon. Minister could tell us is there any particular procedure used in picking architects, or does the department have its own?

Hon. Mr. Connell: We have very few architects. I mentioned this earlier for the hon. member for Scarborough West. We have architects on our staff, but we do commission about 65 per cent or 70 per cent of outside architects for our work. For 70 per cent of our work we commission outside architects.

As for the method of choosing them, we try to pick out the best architect we can for any given job. In fact, this past year or two we have combined architects on a single job—a fairly large job. We have had a couple of architects or firms together which has worked out quite well apparently in any cases where we have done this. It is just as simple as that. I take my architect's recommendations on these things, and he knows the architects pretty well.

Vote 1804 agreed to.

On vote 1805:

Mr. Oliver: On 1805, with respect to item 2, might I ask the hon. Minister is this for a jail, or is it a grant for a number of jails, or what?

Hon. Mr. Connell: No, we have no jail in mind. I think this amount is put in there because we never know when we might get a request for this. This is a grant that is made towards jails.

Mr. Oliver: Has the hon. Minister ever had a request?

Hon. Mr. Connell: Yes, we have. We spent $1 million on the Don jail five or six years ago. We spent considerable on a jail at Lambton. I do not know any more. We have nothing in mind this year, but we never know when a request will come in, and this is more or less keeping that vote open.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, under item 4 I would like to ask the hon. Minister what legislation permits him to undertake the control of erosion of farm lands. It is a very worthy project but—

Hon. Mr. Connell: Yes, this area used to be larger as far as our department was concerned, but a few years ago most of it was switched over to The Department of Municipal Affairs—anything to do with drainage. But this has more to do with exceptional flood conditions, or something like that. I think the trouble we had with Hurricane Hazel ten years ago, was dealt with under this vote, although it was not nearly enough at that time, I suppose. But the estimate is for exceptional flood conditions, I would say. If we get requests, our people go out and examine the situation and a decision is made as to whether or not they qualify.

Mr. Nixon: It is more or less an emergency fund then?

Hon. Mr. Connell: Yes, I think that is a good word. We never know what is coming along. This vote could deal with something that might happen tonight.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, could the hon. Minister tell us to what extent the emergency fund—it must have been provided last year—was drawn on? Does he know of a specific project that was paid for from this vote last year?

Hon. Mr. Connell: $103,560 for last year; so actually that budget was overexpended. In 1963 we spent only $1,542. The year before that, $51,000. In 1961, $199,000, and then it dropped back to $54, so it is a rather—

Mr. Oliver: What did the hon. Minister spend $103,000 on last year? I do not remember any Hurricane Hazel last year.

Hon. Mr. Connell: We do not seem to have the details of that here right now. If the hon. member likes, I will get that information for him.

Mr. Oliver: And the hon. Minister is budgeting for $50,000 this year?

Hon. Mr. Connell: Yes.

Mr. Oliver: You do not expect as severe a calamity this year?

Hon. Mr. Connell: We are going back to 1963.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, I am a bit curious as to item 5. Does this also provide for extraordinary expenditure, municipal drainage including grants in aid thereof, $10,000—a small amount? This would not seem to go very far in providing any drainage as far as municipalities are concerned. What does it cover?

Hon. Mr. Connell: Apparently we spent very little last year and it is more or less one of those votes that we keep in there each year for requests that might come in.

Mr. Young: Well, what kind of requests would the municipality make to draw upon this $10,000?

Hon. Mr. Connell: This appropriation provides for grants which may be paid by the Minister of Public Works, where the direct benefit applies jointly to private and public property, such as the drainage of a field and part of an adjacent road, or to accelerate the run-off from low lying areas. These projects may involve some part or parts of municipal or county roads and would relieve the necessity of applying the annual Department of Highways limited grants for road maintenance and improvements. I think that pretty well—

Mr. Young: This would be a 50 per cent grant toward the cost, would it?

Hon. Mr. Connell: I think northern Ontario is the area—that is the last area on which I remember any money being spent. The Kirkland Lake area. These are very small projects where there are maybe only thirty or forty acres involved—this type of thing.

Mr. Young: And would they need matching grants from the municipality or matching expenditures from the municipality, or is this a thing which might be paid fully by the province?

Mr. McKeough: Mr. Chairman, we went into this on the accounts committee, and as I recall this was in the unorganized territory. I think there was some question that there were roads in the mining municipalities or at least mining sites, and there was just no one else to pay what would normally be paid by the local municipality. I think we were given the amount of money to administer. As the hon. Minister has said, this department used to administer all the aid to drainage. This has been pushed to Municipal Affairs and that amount of money has gone down every year. This is just the tail end of it.

Mr. Young: So there is no chance of getting the backyard drained?

Mr. McKeough: I think it is highly unlikely that any of it would end up in your county or in Kent.

Mr. Oliver: But the term would indicate that somebody else paid a portion, and I do not assume that that is so.

Hon. Mr. Connell: It is usually on a 50-50 basis.

Mr. Oliver: With whom?

Hon. Mr. Connell: If there is an organized municipality it would be on a 50-50 basis, but most of these grants—I think it must be at least—I have no record here of just how much was spent on that last year, but there are very small amounts spent on this each year. The vote is kept open here for fear there is a sizeable amount requested. Any of the larger projects are usually undertaken on that other aid to remedial works.

Mr. Bukator: Mr. Chairman. It says here, item 3, "dredging of Muskoka lakes, $20,000." What did you dredge the Muskoka lake for?

Hon. Mr. Connell: Yes, that vote has been in there for many, many years. I think this year in Bala Bay they propose—the water gets low, and they only do it on complaints. If complaints come in that the boats are hitting the sand bars, we go in and dredge them out.

Mr. Bukator: Is this government-owned property that you are dredging? For what purpose? For the private individual or do you have an establishment—

Hon. Mr. Connell: No, on the Muskoka lakes, for many years we have taken care of some of the locks around Port Carling. We have been doing this dredging on request.

Mr. Bukator: That is a kind of public thoroughfare by water which is maintained then?

Hon. Mr. Connell: That is true.

Mr. Bukator: Well, then, let me ask another question. Under item 2, grants towards cost of construction of new jail accommodation has been $25,000 a year for the past three years, but actual expenditures in 1963-64 were only $13,000. Now, I think this is a loaded question and you can take it for what it is worth. I just happened to have had this paper handed to me, but I would like to be respectable about it; I do not want to be nasty. We have an exceptionally good Minister in that department, so if you take the wording for what I try to describe it to you—

Mr. MacDonald: Do not apologize too much.

Mr. Bukator: I do not think I have to take any direction from the hon. member of the New Democratic Party. He is not doing too well on his own, you know. Let me read this to you; did the hon. Minister of Labour have anything to say? I would rather hear him. Maybe he has the answers.

Mr. G. H. Peck (Scarborough Centre): We would like to hear you.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Bukator: I did take you off the hook once tonight, did I not? Does the hon. Minister believe that? You mentioned Mercer a little while ago, and that is why I ask the question. Does the hon. Minister believe jail accommodation is adequate in the province? Would he care to comment on the jail accommodation provided in the city of Toronto? Now, the hon. Minister is going to build some, I understand; he mentioned the Mercer. Would he like to elaborate on that?

Hon. Mr. Connell: All I mentioned in my brief remarks was that we are working on the replacement for the Andrew Mercer reformatory. Beyond that, I have no comments as Minister of Public Works.

Mr. Bukator: The hon. Minister says he has no comment to make; is that project going to take place this year since you have it in your estimates this year? That is a fair question. Is it going to happen this year, are you going to reconstruct?

Hon. Mr. Connell: It might be called by this fall, but I doubt it. The architects have been working on it for about three months, but I would doubt that the plans would be ready by this fall.

Mr. Bukator: The architects have been working on those plans for about three months?

Hon. Mr. Connell: I would say three months, it is at least three months.

Mr. Bukator: That is a step in the right direction.

Mr. N. Davison (Hamilton East): Under this vote I have a question I would like to ask the hon. Minister. It actually concerns The Department of Lands and Forests, too.

In committee this session a lot of the delegations were complaining about certain properties that should have been bought by the government to be able to keep some of the northern areas that could be turned into parks at a later time. The problem seemed to be that they were so slow in buying them that other individuals were buying the property up and keeping it. The deputy Minister seemed to be complaining that when The Department of Public Works got hold of it and went to buy the procedure was so slow that the land was sold to somebody else before the government bought it.

Now, is there any way of speeding up this procedure or is this actually a problem in cases where The Department of Lands and Forests asks your department to buy the land for parks and by the time you get around to doing it the land has gone?

Hon. Mr. Connell: It has happened once or twice this way. Of course, if property is up for sale and we decide tonight we are going to buy it tomorrow, someone still might have bought it tonight. You are always up against that. It takes a great deal of time. If there is a specific area that has been suggested that we go out and buy, it does take time.

We are always subject to criticism, of course, but I do not think we should be criticized too severely for the speed we make in purchasing these properties. We have bought a great deal of property this last two or three years for the very purpose of which you are speaking, and will be continuing to buy property. If we miss out on the odd one, there are other places we can go. We do not lay awake at nights worrying about the ones we miss. We like to go out and get the property that we are asked to purchase.

Mr. Davison: Normally, after your department has been asked to purchase land, how long would it take for your department to go through the procedure of purchasing? Does it take two or three weeks or a month or how long?

Hon. Mr. Connell: It is a question you cannot answer in black or white. We have had areas where maybe we have been asked to buy 10,000 acres and if there are 150 owners, it is going to take time. But if we have to go out and buy a specific 30-acre lot and there is only one owner, why, that can be accomplished in a day or so. So it is pretty hard to just give a yes or no answer to that.

Mr. Davison: It was quite interesting, Mr. Chairman, that in this committee meeting all of the blame seemed to be pretty well put on The Department of Public Works. Any time they brought up a situation where there was a property they wanted, The Department of Lands and Forests just seemed to get out from under by saying, well, they had asked Public Works to buy it, and they left the impression they were losing an awful lot of land.

Mr. MacDonald: I guess you were not there that day.

Hon. Mr. Connell: It is not an unusual situation for us to be blamed for things.

Mr. L. M. Hodgson (Scarborough East): Mr. Chairman, I believe under this vote we may discuss the provincial building at the CNE.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. L. M. Hodgson: It is not very often we get confused here, but it happens occasionally.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. L. M. Hodgson: I am more used to throwing these remarks than receiving them.

Mr. Chairman, this is about the third occasion today that I have wanted to rise and make a few remarks. I think at five after six, as we were concluding the hon. Attorney General's estimates after two weeks, I thought it was the better part of good judgment to stay in my seat and say very little. I wanted to speak about the Toronto exhibition, and I believe this vote does involve the provincial building there. I understand it is owned by the city of Toronto and was a former gift from the province but is maintained by The Department of Public Works.

I started to work in this building in 1958 trying to instal displays. At that time it was a very difficult operation because the ceiling was about seven feet six inches high and the halls were about five feet wide, and by the time you got a display installed there was no room for anybody to stand back and look at it. Much of the work of the departments in designing their displays to provide the people of Ontario with information on the work that they had been doing throughout the past year was lost. About 1959 or 1960, a very great effort was undertaken by The Department of Public Works to redesign this building and bring the various departmental displays into a position where the public could see them and appreciate what the departments are doing.

I think it was a recognized accomplishment, a very successful move when you took out the centre aisle concept of that building and brought in a wide panoramic view of the displays. I know that the people of Ontario have appreciated this and many people have remarked to me about the new look at the Ontario government building. I, for one, having had a part to play in the installing of displays there and seeing the new surroundings, think it is a fantastic improvement. I just wanted to compliment the department and the hon. Minister on the work that has been done there and the opportunity that government departments now have to display the services they offer the people at the Canadian national exhibition. I just want to say thank you.

Mr. Braithwaite: Mr. Chairman, just a few moments ago the hon. Minister made reference to the fact that about three months ago his architects started on some new designs for Mercer. To go back three months would take us roughly back to about February. We were wondering if there is any relation or coincidence between the starting of the drawings for a new Mercer and possibly the visit of some of the hon. members of the Opposition to that place?

An hon. member: That is a loaded question.

Mr. R. A. Eagleson (Lakeshore): Mr. Chairman, my friend, the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party, has acknowledged my presence, which I presume is pretty favourable.

In any event, Mr. Chairman, through you to the hon. Minister, I wonder if it is possible for the government buildings to perhaps remain open on Saturdays and Sundays since I had the occasion during the past session to welcome and be a host for the Waukegan concert band of Waukegan, Illinois. During that time—

Mr. Singer: Tell us about it.

Mr. Eagleson: As a matter of fact, I think it is fair to say that out of 108 members in the House, 107 are not familiar with the Waukegan concert band. But in spite of that fact the Waukegan concert band from Waukegan, Illinois, is the most renowned concert band in the United States of America and recently had the advantage of being recognized—and I would point this out particularly to the hon. members of the Opposition—as being recognized in the Congress of the United States.

An hon. member: Where is Waukegan?

Mr. Eagleson: Waukegan is the largest city within the 12th district of Illinois.

Mr. Chairman: Order! I do not like to interrupt this very interesting speech, but actually this matter of the Parliament buildings should have been discussed under vote 1802.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Eagleson: In any event, I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, and through you to the hon. Minister, that this should come under miscellaneous. It is certainly miscellaneous and I would suggest, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Chairman: Order, order!

Mr. Eagleson: I would suggest, Mr. Chairman—

Vote 1805 agreed to.

On vote 1806:

Mr. R. Gisborn (Wentworth East): Vote 1806, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Chairman: Vote 1806.

Mr. Eagleson: I would most vehemently protest against the ruling of the chair and suggest that this would, in fact, come under miscellaneous.

Mr. Gisborn: Mr. Chairman, on vote 1806, through you, I would ask the hon. Minister of Public Works if he would inform the House as to the state of progress regarding the Hamilton vocational training school?

Hon. Mr. Connell: We are going to be ready to call for tenders on that vocational and technological school in, I would say, October or November. That is what they are hoping right now. The planning is well advanced. I go back to the fact that it is so difficult to get everyone together and be completely agreed as to what they want. Education are doing a tremendous job in deciding what programmes are wanted there, but it does take time to get this back from the request of the education people to the architect and get it approved by the various levels. The latest word I had on it is that it is right on schedule, and they hope to have tenders called this fall.

Mr. Gisborn: Mr. Chairman, I feel a bit disappointed, because, as you know, we have raised this question for three years now. I am sure that we expected it would be well on the way to construction this spring. The hon. Minister made some remarks to the hon. member for Scarborough West a few moments ago that he likes to plan well, even if it meant a delay of a year. If anything is planned well, this school is going to be, because the delay in getting started is a detriment to the needs for this type of school in the province.

I would continue with the question. Does the department also install the equipment and machinery that will be used in the training programme?

Hon. Mr. Connell: Yes, we purchase it.

Mr. Gisborn: How often would the hon. Minister have to change plans for equipment in regard to the need for the different classes of training?

Hon. Mr. Connell: Here again, I make no apology for the planning that has gone into the Hamilton school. It is a very large one; it is a $12 million project, which is a large one. It took us five years to plan for our Queen's Park complex. Maybe we are slow, I don't know, but it is planned, and planned well. This is a large project and I think the hon. member for Wentworth East should be well aware of it. There are long speeches made about education and the changes we should be keeping up with. I say I make no apology about the time it has taken, but I am going to tell you that we are going to have the best technological and vocational centre on the North American continent in our city of Hamilton.

Mr. Gisborn: I assume that the hon. Minister can lay a little blame on The Department of Education.

Hon. Mr. Connell: I am laying no blame on anyone.

Mr. Gisborn: It indicates that some of the delay lays in the hands of The Department of Education, as the hon. Minister has indicated. You will remember that I prognosticated that we would likely open this school in 1967. I said this last year, and I still think that this is the way it is planned—to open this school in Hamilton in 1967, the election year. But nevertheless, in regard to this vote, the purchase of property and expenses in connection therewith, in the public accounts, page S-16, just for a matter of curiosity there is an item of $1,759,947.69 for the purchase of property from the Essbro Properties Limited. Would the hon. Minister explain where that property is located, and for what it is intended?

Hon. Mr. Connell: I will have to check that out for certain. I think it is across from the main buildings here on Bay Street, but I would have to check that out to be sure. I will give the hon. member the answer on that.

Mr. Eagleson: Mr. Chairman, I have been advised that I was out of order insofar as the other buildings were concerned, and I would suggest to the hon. Minister and propose to him, through you, that the new buildings which are under vote 1806 remain open during the weekend. I would now tell you why, with the assistance of my friend from Yorkview. In any event, Mr. Chairman, I say, through you to the hon. Minister, that I feel it would be of great advantage to our government in the province that the Parliament buildings remain open on the weekend. During the past session, if I may refer to them once again, the Waukegan concert band, which is renowned as the greatest concert band in the United States of America, had the occasion to—

Mr. Chairman: Order.

Mr. Eagleson: —I am referring to new buildings, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Chairman: I think the hon. member has made his suggestion that the buildings remain open. I think that was in order.

Mr. Eagleson: If I may say to the House why I feel so strongly that the buildings should remain open on the weekend—

Mr. Chairman: Order.

Mr. Eagleson: The new building—

Mr. Chairman: When the new building is constructed, I believe that you will have the opportunity of—

Mr. Eagleson: Mr. Chairman, in any event, I strongly suggest through you, to the hon. Minister, that whether the Waukegan band be involved or not at this stage, that the new building, in any event, should remain open on the weekends, since I feel the Parliament buildings of the province of Ontario are well renowned and well appreciated by all the constituents of my riding, in particular, and all the citizens of Ontario in general, and should be open on the weekends for their purposes, because I feel, Mr. Chairman—that we, as representatives in this House, of the—

Mr. Chairman: Order. I would suggest that the hon. member is now becoming repetitious. He has repeated this suggestion several times, therefore I rule him out of order.

Mr. Eagleson: Mr. Chairman, if I may, on a point of order, I would strongly suggest—

Mr. Chairman: Please state the point of order.

Mr. Eagleson: —through you to this House, in summation, to the hon. Minister that it is in the interests of all of those within the province that the new building and the old buildings remain open on the weekends.

Mr. Chairman: Order.

Mr. Eagleson: Thank you.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Wentworth (Mr. Ewen).

Hon. Mr. Connell: Mr. Chairman, I would just like to say to the hon. member that any time the Waukegan band comes here, we will have the buildings open.

Mr. Eagleson: It pays to persevere.

Hon. Mr. Connell: I would just like to mention for the hon. member for Wentworth East, if he does not get out of here too fast, that the property to which he refers is 881 Bay Street, the Soules Building, which will actually almost become a part of the complex. It is the building that is in our block on the west side of Bay, but in that general complex area.

Mr. Gisborn: Could the hon. Minister tell me what size of area?

Hon. Mr. Connell: It is a building, a six- or seven-storey building. It is, I think, about 140,000 square feet.

Mr. D. W. Ewen (Wentworth): Mr. Chairman, it would be remiss of me, with the hon. member for Wentworth East mentioning this school of technology, which happens to be in my riding, not to say that there is no member in this House more concerned than I that this building gets on with the project. I would like to say that the wonderful people of Wentworth are quite concerned that it does get on; as a matter of fact, they are looking forward, particularly in that area, to boarding the students who attend this school.

I have been kept abreast of things by the hon. Minister of Public Works, and one of the big delays has been the money. The province just has not had it. The Treasury has now released this and given us the okay. If there is anybody more concerned in this House than myself, I would like to know about it, because I intend to be there. I have got a lot of pressure on me, and I am looking forward to the sod turning, I hope, this fall. I would just like to get this on the record.

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence (Russell): Mr. Chairman, very briefly, I would like to speak to vote 1806.

The Ontario Department of Public Works has under its administration what I believe to be 14 properties in Ottawa which it rents, and some 10 properties which the government of Ontario owns. There are approximately a dozen departmental agencies of our government using office space in the Ottawa area. Some of this, Mr. Chairman, is located in very substantial and some new buildings. But others, as hon. members from the Ottawa area will know, are, in many cases, located in holes in the wall.

The facts as to rentals are that the province of Ontario pays out in the neighbourhood of $76,000 annually in rentals in Ottawa. I would like to suggest, Mr. Chairman, through you to the hon. Minister of Public Works, that the time has come to apply in Ottawa the same policy of owned centralization of government premises which is coming into effect in the Toronto area.

I suggest, sir, that the time has come when

Ontario should erect in the heart of Ottawa a prestige-type building, an Ontario House, to accommodate as many of the activities of the Ontario government in the Ottawa Valley and in eastern Ontario as may be possible.

Mr. Chairman, there are several obvious reasons for my suggestion. First, it is good policy for the public to own its own buildings; increased efficiency and convenience can result from bringing together, under one roof, the many provincial activities that occur in my own area. I am sure this consideration applies to other parts of Ontario.

However, there are perhaps more important but less obvious, reasons why Ontario should erect a prestige building and, as it were, show the flag, in the heart of our national capital. Here are some of the reasons.

It would remind the people of Canada of the fact that Ontario is the anchor province of our nation. It would remind our own people of the province of Ontario of the vast range and scope of the services which the province of Ontario, and the government of Ontario, extends to them.

It would remind 250,000 people who live in the shadow of the Peace Tower of their provincial identity. It would be an outward and visible sign that the government of Ontario recognizes the growing importance of the city of Ottawa and the Ottawa Valley, and recognize that Ottawa is one of the fastest developing cities in the whole of Canada, is one of the greatest tourist attractions in the province of Ontario and is on the point of becoming a most important educational centre.

Ottawa is the hub of one of the most important recreational centres perhaps on the whole North American continent; at the same time, it is the gateway to perhaps the best and most promising winter sports areas on the whole continent.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, not only would one location in one building accommodate a variety of Ontario departmental activities in my area and assist departmental co-ordination, but from the point of view of service to the public I believe it would have great value. It could provide attractive space and adequate staff for a provincial information centre, where the public could ask questions and obtain immediate information on a variety of subjects, from welfare to health, scholarships, employment opportunities, tourism, fish and game regulations, and matters involving industrial plant location.

As it happens, the province of Ontario owns, at this moment, an excellent piece of land only four short city blocks from the Dominion Parliament buildings themselves. This particular parcel will soon have as its neighbours along Elgin Street, where it is located, a whole complex of monumental Dominion of Canada government buildings. A substantial start has already been made in the redevelopment, as some of you may have seen recently, of the easterly side of Elgin Street, running from the war memorial south, and extensive work has begun on the new $20 million performing arts centre to the north of the piece of land I am mentioning.

I mention this particular site, Mr. Chairman, as one which the hon. Minister of Public Works and the government of Ontario might consider as an ideal site for what I have described as an Ontario House, of the type I have suggested—a beautiful, useful building and one befitting the province of Ontario.

Mr. Chairman: Vote 1806?

Mr. Gisborn: Mr. Chairman, to the hon. Minister. The hon. member for Wentworth raised a strange question. If you remember, the vocational training school for Hamilton was decided upon before the hon. member was in the House, but is he correct in saying that he has been on top of the project for the past couple of years, and that the lack of money is the reason why you have not started before now? Is the hon. member for Wentworth correct, or is it the reasons given by the hon. Minister a few moments ago?

Hon. Mr. Connell: I was not too aware of what the hon. member for Wentworth said, but as far as the approval is concerned, I do not know for how long we have had approval. Certainly it has been basically the planning that has been holding it up.

Vote 1806 agreed to.

On vote 1807:

Mr. Bukator: On 1807. I have run across—

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Minister of Highways): Another loaded one?

Mr. Bukator: I have been very good to the hon. Minister of Highways; why does he not behave himself? You know, there are a lot of departments that could have been questioned very thoroughly.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bukator: What a great group of high paid help we have around here. They giggle and laugh because they get the big wages—or is it because they have chauffeur-driven cars? Or because you have the large expense accounts? You ought to be proud of yourselves. You are a fine group of men representing this province of six million people. I do believe, that a Minister should show a little dignity; I find it lacking in that particular department.

Mr. MacDonald: What was your question?

Mr. Bukator: I did not get to it yet, I am coming to it. I do believe that a man should get just a little bit of respect from this particular group, Mr. Chairman. I have not bothered this House too much and I think these questions are pertinent to this particular department.

The appropriation for the construction of dams—we are getting into dams again—docks and locks, $975,000 for each of the past three years. Will the hon. Minister explain how this figure is arrived at and what the relationship bears to actual need? That $975,000 is a figure that you have had for three consecutive years and I would like to know why it is in the estimates. What do you intend to do with that money?

Hon. Mr. Connell: We usually build about eight to ten dams each year; actually it is one of the projects that we can estimate fairly closely. I just cannot tell you why we are spending almost the same amount. It is just planned that way, that is the best answer that I can give the hon. member.

I do not know whether he is interested in the dams that we are building this year; but I think we are building the Froot Lake dam in Algoma-Manitoulin and the George Lake dam—

Mr. Bukator: While you are naming them off, would you care to give the figure of what you are spending on them? You must have that before you.

Hon. Mr. Connell: Well, I do not have the figure here—well I guess I can give it to you a little closer than that. The Froot Lake dam is $110,000; the George Lake dam—we are not absolutely certain that that one is going but if it does it will be roughly about $70,000; the Lake of two Rivers in Nipissing is about $70,000; the Osler Lake dam, Parry Sound, is about $35,000; Freeland Lake dam is $35,000; the Tiny Marsh dam is $30,000; the South Baymouth, dock that is, is about $75,000. The Baptiste Lake dam is $170,000; the Camp Lake dam, $5,000; the Delta dam, $30,000.

Now I do not know whether that adds up to $975,000 or not, but it is fairly close.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, could I ask; are these dams built in areas where no conservation authorities exist, are they supplementary to conservation work or what is the purpose?

Hon. Mr. Connell: They are practically all in northern Ontario or in the Nipissing-Parry Sound area. They are built upon the request of Lands and Forests. We are guided entirely by The Department of Lands and Forests and their needs. Most of them are built in out-of-the-way places where it is hard to get contractors to go in at a decent price. We have our own groups of men who go in and build these dams. I do not know whether that answers you or not, but that is it basically.

Mr. Young: I suppose it is a matter of maintaining water levels and that sort of thing?

Hon. Mr. Connell: That is right.

Mr. Young: Who maintains them after they are built, and operates them?

Hon. Mr. Connell: The Department of Lands and Forests. We turn them over to that department and their men are in control of the water levels.

Mr. S. Farquhar (Algoma-Manitoulin): Mr. Chairman, I would like to explore just for a moment the—

Mr. Chairman: The member for Rainy River.

Mr. W. G. Noden (Rainy River): Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a comment on vote 1807 in connection with the construction of dams. Today we hear so much about water conservation, and yet in the north people say; "We have more water than we need, divert it to the south."

I would like to give you my experience in connection with my observation on the purpose of dams. In my area—and that is north-western Ontario—in the immediate vicinity of the Rainy River district, a number of years ago there were some seven dams built. Now these dams were built because of a need that arose at the time because most of the dams that did exist were built by logging companies which had logging operations. In time these dams deteriorated and the water during a freshet would wash them out. Therefore the levels in the watershed that it had held back would drop down, the fish life would disappear or its nature would change. Under this vote these dams were rebuilt to continue water conservation.

As far as the vote is concerned, they did not secure the member one solitary vote, because the people did not realize the importance of them until a situation arose in connection with our industry on Rainy Lake and Lake-of-the-Woods watershed. About three years ago the water levels dropped, through lack of precipitation, to a low level. It meant that the Rainy Lake watershed and the Lake-of-the-Woods watershed dropped and the pulp and paper industry would have closed down from, say, a six-day operation to a one- or two-day operation. As a result these dams were opened up allowing the water that they held back to fill up the watersheds of the Rainy Lake and Lake-of-the-Woods area and kept the industry going on a six- and seven-day basis, providing employment for all the people who were interested in the industry throughout the whole area.

This was the importance of rebuilding these logging dams. I would recommend to the hon. Minister that this programme be continued.

I have found that if I made a recommendation to reconstruct some of the remaining logging dams, certain officials were indifferent; "Well, we have enough dams." In my opinion, we have not enough dams. I think we should rebuild all the old logging dams and keep up the water levels of our area throughout northwestern and northern Ontario at a reasonable level.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, just as a matter of interest, I think the hon. member for Rainy River has put this thing in clear focus and given us a clear indication. As a matter of interest, I am wondering if the hon. Minister can inform us—he may not have the information—but I wonder if he can inform us as to how many of these dams are in existence in northern Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Connell: We use the figure of 1,000.

Mr. Young: About 1,000?

Hon. Mr. Connell: Yes.

Mr. Farquhar: I would like to explore the hon. Minister's responsibility in connection with dams on a different kind of project that has been bothering our area.

I have been bouncing back and forth between myself and The Department of Lands and Forests for something like a year and a half. I am not asking or suggesting that a dam be built in this case, I am asking the hon. Minister if he would take some responsibility in connection with a dam being torn out which, of course, would involve the purchasing of existing water rights that have been established in courts. But these particular dams are flooding very valuable farm property.

I am wondering if, first of all, as I have mentioned, I have not been getting any place with The Department of Lands and Forests and it is a very important project.

Two of them are actually in the same area. This hon. Minister I recognize is an open-handed gentleman and a practical man and what is more important, he seems to carry a few contingency funds around in his estimates which is very interesting indeed, so maybe I could have a comment in connection with this type of a project.

Hon. Mr. Connell: The hon. member says he has been in several times, I really do not know which one he is referring to.

Mr. Farquhar: No, I have not been in your office, I have been dealing with The Department of Lands and Forests. But, as I say, Lands and Forests have suggested to me that your department would be interested.

Hon. Mr. Connell: But which dam? I do not know which—

Mr. Farquhar: I could name two of them; one is called the Suddaby dam project and another was called Craigie dam; and they are both in Algoma.

Hon. Mr. Connell: I have heard a little bit about the Craigie dam, but the other one is completely foreign to me. I realize that there has been a bit of discussion there in regard to the Craigie dam, but as far as the water rights or the land is concerned this is, I think, absolutely clear as far as The Department of Lands and Forests and ourselves are concerned.

We are within our rights in building that dam there. I am sure that it has been cleared. The owner has made certain claims otherwise.

I have visited that dam myself and think that it is doing a very efficient job. This is not the one that you are talking about clearing out, is it?

Mr. Farquhar: No, Mr. Chairman. There is a problem in connection with it; it is a matter of settlement with the previous—

Hon. Mr. Connell: This has been gone into very thoroughly throughout the seven years I have been Minister. I have heard about the Craigie dam and their claims. Certainly I am no lawyer, but any legal opinions we have had on it are that my department and The Department of Lands and Forests are within their rights and the Craigie people do not have any legitimate claims.

Mr. Farquhar: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I was not at the moment concerned with that particular dam at all. I realize and know something about the negotiations that have been going on and I appreciate what the hon. Minister has been doing on that particular project, but what I am trying to get to the attention of the hon. Minister is a dam in another area that was built years and years ago. It is not fulfilling any function at the moment, but water rights have been established by the owner. The dam is just there and it has resulted in the flooding of several farms and laying much land to waste, but some department or other has to proceed now to purchase those rights and to get rid of that dam; this is the only way it will be resolved.

As I have mentioned, if you feel like taking some responsibility in connection with it, or can, I will not burden this House with the project. I will be around to see you, if you would like to discuss it with me, and take it on as a project.

Hon. Mr. Connell: I would be pleased to see you in the office at any time. As far as I know, we only build on the recommendation of The Department of Lands and Forests in any particular area. If we are going to build a dam or tear it out, or purchase property, I would think that we would be checking The Department of Lands and Forests, but if you would care to drop around to the office some day and give me the details, I would be glad to look into it further.

Vote 1807 agreed to.

Mr. Chairman: This concludes the estimates of The Department of Public Works.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF CIVIL SERVICE

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer): Mr. Chairman, I am happy to present the estimates of The Department of Civil Service again. This is an opportunity to report on behalf of the civil service commission and The Department of Civil Service in regard to the administration of personnel programmes in the civil service.

Votes 301 to 308, inclusive, request the necessary moneys to administer The Department of Civil Service in accordance with the requirements of The Public Service Act, and the regulations made under that Act. The total budget requested is for $1,209,000, which represents an increase of $151,000 over the budget voted last year for this department. This represents an increase in votes 301, 302, 305, 306 and 308 while votes 303, 304 and 307 are decreased.

Last year, I described in some detail the work of the civil service commission and The Department of Civil Service. I reported new policies concerning collective negotiations, recruitment, pay research and training. This year's estimates reflect the stability which has been established in civil service administration by this government. Civil service staff, including the transfer of casuals, has increased to 41,415 in December of 1964 over 39,970 for the same period in 1963. While this represents an increase of 3.6 per cent, when the transfer of casuals or unclassified staff to civil service are included, a more accurate picture is gained when the actual percentage increase to payroll is considered. With the exclusion of the number of casuals transferred to civil service, which were, in the main, already on staff in 1963, we find the percentage increase is only .1 per cent. The number of casual employees was down from 1962 to 1963 from 14,400 to 11,700, and only increased in 1964 by 500 to 12,200. This figure would compare with 14,400 in 1962. Last year, 1,395 were transferred from unclassified staff to regular staff, 628 coming from The Department of Highways alone.

These figures demonstrate two things. One is that the government is continuing its promise to bring under the civil service most of the continuous casuals working for the departments who are eligible for such appointment; and two, through such controls as those exercised by the Treasury board, the size of the civil service has been stabilized. The intake of qualified persons is controlled by the civil service commission. Better qualified staff are able to do more effective work and consequently the civil service is able to carry on increasing responsibilities and duties without correspondingly increasing the size of the work force. This is an important accomplishment of which all hon. members, I am sure, will approve.

These days, economies are as essential to government administration as they are in business and industry. I am pleased to report such evidence of effective civil service administration by the Deputy Ministers to the hon. members of this Legislature. Payroll costs, of course, have increased because of the increases in salaries. The civil service payroll for 1964 was $190.7 million, as compared to $177 million for the previous year.

Again, this increased cost includes the salaries of the casual employees transferred to civil service status. In the past year, the civil service commission was involved in such matters as pay research with appropriate salary recommendations based upon the bargaining process; extensive recruitment activity; new training and development programmes; and continued maintenance of the classification plan. During the year, the administrative services branch processed an average of 2,000 employee transactions per week. That is quite a number—2,000 employee transactions per week. These involve such changes as promotions, transfers, reclassifications, merit increases and salary revisions. This gives a good indication of the high level of activity involved in the management of a civil service kept up to date and enjoying excellent working conditions and terms of employment.

Public recognition of this is indicated by over 16,000 applications for employment which were received by the recruitment branch. Over 9,000 interviews were conducted by recruitment officers and 6,000 tests were given to qualified applicants.

This is evidence of the increasing pressures on the civil service department to provide service to the public on behalf of all the departments. Last year, the department moved to new offices in the Britannica building at 151 Bloor Street West on the ninth and tenth floors. Previously the staff of the department were separated in the main Parliament building by three floor levels and located in two other buildings on Bay Street. Bringing the entire staff together has increased the efficiency of the department and improved its service to the public. The Britannica building is near the subway station at Bloor and Avenue Road. For those applicants calling at the main Parliament building, the commission has continued to operate a recruitment office on the second floor.

In reviewing the requirements for moneys to carry on the work of The Department of Civil Service, let me review each vote with you in comparison to last year.

Mr. Chairman, vote 301, which covers the requirements of main office, has been increased over last year largely because of the transfer of five positions in the former examinations branch. These positions were under vote 303 last year and add $30,600 to the cost of the main office. The transfer establishes a new personnel research branch headed by a director of personnel research, Dr. Saleh, who is assisted by two personnel research officers. I will explain the purpose of this branch later. Normal salary increases, travelling expenses and new equipment account for the balance of the increase.

The staff of main office has increased by two civil service commission officers—one added to the programmes and standards branch, and the other to the personnel research branch of main office. The total complement for main office is 18, an increase of two. The complement for the entire civil service department for the fiscal year 1965-1966, if these estimates are approved, will be 158. This represents an increase of eight over last year. There is no change in the number of personnel required for position administration, recruitment, or training and development branches.

Three staff will be required by the administrative services branch, which is covered by vote 305. These are a computer programmer, and two tabulating and key punch equipment operators. The programmer will be hired to prepare for integration of the data processing services in the civil service department, with the computer to be operated by the Treasury department. The use of a computer will greatly facilitate the handling of the high volume of personnel transactions and, at the same time, provide extra capacity to assist in such personnel management matters as staff selection, training and development, and classification. There will be increased capacity to carry coded information on the training and experience of each employee of the government, which will be of great benefit in personnel administration to the commission and the 20 operating departments.

The largest part of the increase requested over last year is an increase in salary requirements of $142,500. This is caused by the general increases in salary levels and new staff. There was a salary adjustment announced in December, 1964, which affected professional and administrative classes retroactive to April 1, 1964. This, together with the increase of the complement from 150 to 158, accounts for the increase. Maintenance costs are increased by $12,500 to a gross of $105,000, largely as a result of three items—direct costs caused by the increase of staff—purchase of furniture and equipment, and so on, $4,000; data processing rentals and forms, $3,000; and increased use of paper for the printing of servicewide directives and materials, $5,500. Regular forms and printing continue to be obtained in the usual way through the Queen's Printer. These include, for example, Tops Magazine, the "Employee Handbook" and "A Guide to written civil service examinations" which will be printed shortly.

The personnel research branch in the main office requires a word of explanation. Before September 1 last year, personnel research activities were associated largely with the examinations programme. General research, of course, was carried out in connection with each operating branch by the director and his staff. On September 1, 1964, the personnel research branch was established as a separate unit in main office. The main objectives are to promote the scientific approach to personnel management within the limits of human knowledge in the social sciences; in particular, to develop research activities in the areas of test validation, aptitude surveys and in the evaluation of training programmes and their results. Personnel policies must be constantly studied and revised to ensure effectiveness.

The purpose of test validation is to explore the value and the validity of tests for the selecting of employees for certain types of positions. The test is considered valid if applicants who obtain high scores on the test prove to be more successful in the specific job than those who get lower scores. If this is not true, then the test is of no value and should not, and will not, be used. Any particular weakness discovered will be corrected and an amended test substituted. At the present time, general aptitude tests, social intelligence tests and Wonderlic personnel tests are some examples. These have proven to be quite successful. They are essential to identify the best qualified among the hundreds of applicants who present themselves for certain of the positions advertised.

A pamphlet of about 20 pages entitled "A guide to written civil service examinations" was prepared and approved for publication. This has been referred to the Queen's Printer for printing, with the approval of the Treasury board. It will be sold at cost to persons interested in taking civil service tests, so that they may be familiar with the types of questions asked. This policy is also followed by other civil service agencies. This will help to reduce some of the anxiety generally produced in a testing situation which could interfere with results of some applicants.

At the request of The Department of Education, an attitude survey was conducted in which almost 50 per cent of the department's employees participated. The purpose of the survey was to obtain opinions of employees about the effectiveness of departmental operations. They were asked to express their opinions and feelings about such factors as salary, communications, organization, supervision and training needs. The results were reported only to departmental officials directly concerned, along with recommendations for consideration which might improve some of the problems disclosed on the attitude survey. This is a healthy approach taken to improve management practices by a senior department of government. It indicates an anxiety to make the most effective use of its manpower, and the abilities of its officers in furthering the responsibilities it carries in the field of education.

A pre-retirement study was introduced in an effort to explore the view and reactions of employees towards some aspects of their retirement. A great deal of valuable information was discovered, which indicates that some of the opinions now widely held are without real foundation. For example, many employees approaching retirement age are interested in any opportunities to continue in useful and gainful employment. This is sometimes true even when they could retire on maximum pension.

In the evaluation of training programmes, the personnel research branch examines the results of such programmes as the senior officers conference, the supervisors training course, and others to see whether or not they are effective. Research will assist the training and development branch in developing new training programmes to meet needs which are discovered in the process of conducting other studies. This is indeed a dynamic field which requires constant reappraisal in order to produce maximum results.

Research will be continued into some new areas next year. One will be to evaluate the quality of employees recruited by the civil service commission in the past two years. This is over the same period in which the commission has been granted jurisdiction through the amendment of The Public Service Act. In addition, there will be a study of the public image of civil service administration to discover public attitudes towards government officials, general criticisms, and how best these can be identified and corrected. Research is much needed in the area of personnel administration in government; this is also true in other areas of employment. The natural sciences have progressed through planned research, but unfortunately in the field of human relations there has been insufficient research carried out. Such studies must be by qualified persons who are permitted and encouraged to take an objective view of such problems. This branch will carry out research for departments on invitation and report results of such studies on a confidential basis. Results are not even disclosed to the civil service commission itself unless the Deputy Minister of the department authorizes such disclosure. One of the most important projects to be undertaken by this branch is the study on the effectiveness of recruitment practices in the service, and to analyze the present and future needs for trained manpower in the services. It is expected that many retraining needs will be identified as a result of this study.

Vote 302 requests $216,500 to carry on the work of the position administration branch—an increase of $12,000 over last year. The complement is not increased—it still remains at 32 officers and staff. The increase of $12,000 is entirely in the area of salaries, caused by promotions of more experienced staff taking greater responsibility, and to meet the earlier costs of salary adjustments in the past year. In 1964 the organization changes and the new classifications which were required by the reclassification programme were consolidated and absorbed by the branch. Most of the principles, techniques and procedures recommended by the consultants now form the basis for the continuing administration of position evaluation and classification. The classification grievance procedure tests the accuracy and fairness of allocations.

It will be recalled that in implementing the reclassification study, jobs affecting some 16,000 employees were examined, and 14,000 of the civil servants concerned benefited through salary adjustments. Eight hundred civil servants were reconfirmed at their former rates of pay without adjustment, and 1,000 employees were red-circled because the maximum for the job they were in was rated lower than the salary the person concerned was receiving.

The departments deserve credit in relocating red-circled rated employees to other work wherever the opportunity presented itself. In some cases, this was corrected by reassigning or reorganizing new duties to strengthen jobs which were previously lower rated. As a result of these activities, 700 of the 1,000 employees are no longer red-circled. The fact that this personnel management problem has been largely corrected is as a result of responsible and deliberate action by Deputy Ministers and personnel officers. This is an indication of the healthy attitude taken towards staff management by officers of the department.

preparation of new or revised classifications for positions while maintaining fair relationships with others. The reclassification programme did not cover technical, professional or administrative classes, but a study of these positions was carried out by the position administration branch jointly with the departments concerned. In fact, the departments prepared about 50 per cent of the position specifications of such classes. This programme has resulted in the restructuring of a number of class series, such as forestry technicians, conservation officers, agricultural officers and others. At the present time, a thorough study is being conducted in regard to the engineers' assistants series. This will be revised to reflect changing conditions and programmes, and to recognize new technical knowledges and skills required of such staff. More highly qualified staff doing better work deserve such recognition. In 1964, 207 classes were established, while 29 class specifications were modified. Two hundred and thirty-four classes no longer in use were deleted.

It is a tribute to the objectivity and thoroughness of the work of the staff of this branch that a number of other civil service agencies have sent representatives to study the work of Ontario in position administration. The effectiveness of the work of the classification officers is indicated by the fact that 21 hearings were held by the classification rating committee—an arbitration board—with 17 of them being that the classification was correct and four in favour of the grievor, recommending a higher or a new classification. At the present time there are 10 classification officers under the supervision of a chief classification officer. They are responsible for setting the standards and determining the classifications of the staff of 20 operating departments in over 1,200 jobs.

The report of the federal Glasco commission was taken into consideration in the matter of classification administration. This supports the intention to delegate much of the basic classification work to operating departments when the staff is available to take over this responsibility. This will require an amendment of the The Public Service Act before such delegation may take place, which will be recommended. The civil service commission is presently solely responsible for classification administration under the Act.

The fact that there were 21 formal grievances against classification does not indicate the large number of problems which are resolved at the lowest level of supervision without formal grievances. This a good indication of effective operation of personnel management in classification and pay administration.

An increase of over $4,000 is requested for vote 303 over the cost of the branch last year for publications and advertising. Other costs are decreased by $20,500 in view of the transfer of five staff to vote 301, mentioned earlier.

In effect, therefore, the costs of the recruitment and the examinations branch are maintained at last year's level, except for the increase mentioned and certain increase costs in salary adjustments which will be covered by an item for salaries of $177,000.

The new premises in the Britannica building are of great assistance to this branch, providing better accommodation for interviewing candidates and conducting examination tests. This gives a better impression to the applicant interested in a civil service career, and those taking tests have a better opportunity to do their best work in a proper setting.

In some areas there is a general shortage of well-qualified job applicants, which requires the greatly increased effort to locate qualified personnel. This is true of such continuing competitions as those conducted for typists and stenographers, and for certain professional personnel. Over 16,000 applications for employment were received in the branch, with over 9,000 interviews conducted. Partial solution to obtaining typists and stenographers has been achieved through the generous co-operation of The Department of Economics and Development through its facilities at Ontario House in London, England. A number of qualified personnel have been obtained through this source.

There was some scepticism when officers of the branch visited high schools and universities in 1963 and early 1964, but this has been replaced by a sincere welcome and assistance by placement and guidance officials in these schools and universities. The Ontario government is in an improved position because of a growing respect for civil service as a career. More students are continuing to higher academic standing and technical institutes and high schools, with many continuing on to university and taking post-graduate degrees. Government must continue to get its share of such qualified graduates. The recruitment services of the government have found growing acceptance in spite of some uninformed criticism of the value and benefits of a career in the public service.

Entry salaries are kept at a competitive level for high school and university graduates, and the province is getting its share of the best qualified persons. It is only in the areas of scarcity which we, and other employers, find difficulty in recruiting sufficient staff that the province still cannot meet its recruitment needs. These include those fields of professional training where the output of the training institutes is not equal to the demand of the employment market, such as computer analysts and programmers, social workers, psychologists, doctors, sanitary engineers, nutritionists and a number of other professions related to health services.

The departments continue to recruit outside staff in the field, using the procedures established by The Department of Civil Service, which involve competitive selection of qualified candidates.

An increase in the number of civil servants transferring from one department to another, receiving promotional increases, is indicated by the fact that the civil service assisted in the competitive selection of 54 such civil servants last year. Many of these were senior civil servants.

The staff of the recruitment branch is made up of 16 recruitment officers, four examinations officers and eight supporting clerical staff. In 1964, the recruitment officers of the civil service commission filled 2,089 jobs by direct recruitment. The personnel research branch will continue to work with the recruitment and examinations branch to improve testing procedures.

To carry on the activities of the training and development branch, $97,000 is requested, a net reduction of $4,500 over last year, for vote 304. The decrease is achieved by reducing travel by $500, maintenance by $1,000 and the training needs study, which has been largely completed, by $25,000, while the staff salaries, which are dealt with below, are increased by $7,000. The administrative trainee programme will require $15,000. The latter programme will be continued this year with three incumbents attached to The Department of Civil Service at $5,000 each, with three other trainees for a total of six attached to departments. These administrative trainees will be chosen from top graduates in such courses as political science, economics and business administration.

After a period of training of a year they will be placed with the department chosen by the trainee in a job for which he is qualified. In this way, we expect to reinforce our supply of middle management staff.

The staff of this branch continues with eight persons, one position presently being vacant for a staff development officer. Salary costs for more experienced training officers have increased by $7,000, in recognition of the great strides made in conducting effective training programmes.

The officers of the branch carry on most of the training programmes, with the exception of university and senior government course leaders, who participate in the senior officers conference and senior officers seminar and certain executive training programmes. This has kept the training costs down, at the same time carrying on effective courses and conferences. A new programme for training of typists and stenographers has been commenced, with over 300 civil servants applying on a voluntary basis. This is typical of some of the special programmes which will be conducted in the future to meet new needs for more highly qualified staff.

The branch continues to co-operate closely with the universities in constituting training programmes, in particular Carleton, Toronto, York and Western. The facilities at the Ontario agricultural college have been offered again to The Department of Civil Service to conduct its senior officers training conference this year. It is presently underway. This provides an ideal setting for the officers chosen by each department, and for those sent by other jurisdictions such as the government of Canada, the provinces of Manitoba, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and others in a three-week intensive course of study.

The results of this programme have been obvious, in that the course has been given strong encouragement by operating departmental officials. An extensive library of books in personnel administration and public administration is now available to those who wish to engage in self-study in these important fields.

In comparison to last year, an increase of $48,000 requested for vote 305, administration services, is required to hire the three additional staff mentioned earlier to meet the needs of data processing, particularly in regard to programming for the use of a computer. Twenty-two thousand dollars is required to meet the needs of salary adjustments and promotions; $4,000 increase for data processing rentals; and $4,500 increase to meet increased printing costs. Maintenance and supplies is up another $2,000.

The administrative services branch expects to alter some of its procedures to establish less day-to-day checking and control of operating departments, but to concentrate more on internal audit procedures in the future. Post-audit by this branch, while giving more initial authority to the departments, should establish more efficient government administration in personnel matters. This branch is responsible for over 2,000 personnel transactions each week, to ensure the accuracy and completeness of every such transaction, and to keep up-to-date records of the total staff of the civil service. It is expected that the administrative services branch will not be further increased by staff after this fiscal year, but rather concentrate on lending its services. One of the accomplishments of the branch last year was to re-design a new position code system which gives more information on the classification of the position, its location and branch, and the classification of the incumbent in the position. In a service the size of the Ontario service, it is important that position code numbers and employee code numbers be used to establish proper information about the job and the person doing that job.

A total of $1,255,070 was paid out in attendance credit gratuities during the calendar year 1964 to 1,355 separating employees. An average payment of $926 was involved. Almost a quarter of the employees who separated during this period were eligible for the payment of this gratuity. This is a valuable fringe benefit for the Ontario civil servants.

Under the setting for perquisite charges, rentals were set on 15 new units of accommodation, and rentals revised on another 24 units. At the present time, a complete study is being conducted on the rental charges for housing in the Ontario provincial police. It is discovered that a number of the houses occupied by police officers may receive a greater perquisite discount under the formula earlier agreed to. This is being conducted with the knowledge and assistance of the Ontario provincial police association. The number of occupied self-contained units in the Ontario civil service now amount to 1,111. Payroll deductions for all types of perquisites for the year 1964 totalled $1,210,760, an increase of $81,711 over last year.

New permits through the occupancy of living accommodations were designed and issued by The Department of Civil Service. The signatories to the agreements are the Deputy Minister or his nominee in the department, and the occupant of the accommodation. The revised charges and the completion of these permits to occupy these units have produced agreements of tenancy between the department and the occupants which clearly indicate the terms and conditions of the tenancies. This is of particular advantage to the occupant, who now has a clear indication of the responsibilities of himself and the department in regard to the maintenance of government property. His rights as a tenant are also protected.

The number of visits to health units by civil servants was reported by the health service of The Department of Health at 58,068 for the past year. This is an important service to continue employees on the job who would otherwise be off duty through minor illnesses or injuries. Any serious illness results in the person being referred to his family physician. I am pleased to report that, for the calendar year December 1964, the per capita absence due to illness was reduced from 8.28 days to 7.92 days over the previous fiscal year.

Vote 306, pay research, has the greatest percentage increase—$31,500 over the total vote of $58,500 for the past year to a total of $90,000. The reason for this increase is to meet the growing demands for accurate pay research data, basing civil service wage rates on the salaries paid by other employers.

The pay research bureau carries the heavy responsibility of studying and reporting upon salaries paid for the 1,200 classes of civil service positions.

With the cyclical review programme, the work is spread evenly over the year, which is of great assistance to the pay research bureau and the civil service association in conducting its studies of the outside market.

Three new staff will be added to the branch at a cost of $18,000 to meet the growing demands placed upon it through collective negotiation procedures and other studies on conditions and terms of employment. It is extremely important to keep the conditions of work in the Ontario civil service attractive and up to date; accordingly, this branch assumes a very important role.

In the fringe benefits studies reported by the fringe benefits advisory committee in September of last year, basic and important information was provided to the arbitration board which considered a reference on fringe benefits. The study committee was under the chairmanship of Mr. J. S. Forsythe, and had the very valuable assistance of Mr. I. H. Ashford and Dr. A. N. McLeod. Mr. Forsythe was formerly director of pension plans, The Department of National Revenue, now retired, while Mr. Ashford is supervisor, employee benefits, for Imperial Oil Limited. Dr. McLeod is chief economist of the Toronto-Dominion bank. Mrs. Etchen, who is the director of pay research, served as secretary to this important committee, which inquired into the nature and costs of fringe benefits presently provided for employees in the Ontario public service and recommended a standard programme of fringe benefits comparable to those provided by responsible employers in Ontario.

The arbitration board, chaired by His Honour Judge J. C. Anderson of Belleville, with Mr. D. G. Cunningham, QC, of Kingston representing the official side, and Professor Saul Frankel of McGill University, Montreal, Quebec, representing the staff side, considered the first arbitration reference concerning a matter of fringe benefits.

On Monday, March 1, I reported to this Legislature the results of that arbitration award. I will not comment further, except to stress to the hon. members of the House that this award continues in effect until July 31, 1968. This will provide an important period of stability for the Ontario public service in the very broad matter of fringe benefits, and permit the concentration on salary matters by the pay research branch.

Vote 307 provides the necessary moneys to carry on the Ontario joint council, the civil service arbitration board and the two grievance boards. From the basis of experience we have been able to decrease the vote to $33,500, a decrease of $7,000 over the past year.

This will still provide all the necessary moneys to carry on the work of these important councils and boards. I have mentioned that the civil service arbitration board, chaired by Judge Anderson; it is also appropriate to pay tribute to the fine work of Professor Ralph Presgrave, chairman of the public service grievance board and Professor Jack Sargeant, chairman of the classification rating committee. Serving with them are Mr. F. E. Wood and Mrs. Elizabeth Smith on the grievance board, alternate civil service members being Mr. T. R. Hilliard, Deputy Minister of Energy and Resources Management, and Mr. D. A. Crosbie, senior solicitor, The Department of Highways. Mrs. Smith also serves on the classification rating committee, and is the only person with both appointments. Mr. J. A. Bridges, personnel director of the Toronto Hydro-electric system, has served as acting chairman in a number of classification rating committee hearings. The activities of these boards is evidence of the sincere interest of the government in establishing conditions of employment which are consistent with general practice in modern employee relations.

The employee relations branch is more involved in grievance procedure, staffing problems, turnover problems and other matters similar to the problems considered by the industrial relations branch in industry, staff morale is an important concern to any efficiently operated enterprise, and this is primarily the concern of the operating head of each department. The employee relations branch, on invitation, will consider any of the problems referred to it, and assist the personnel director of the department concerned. The supervisor of employee relations attends at grievance hearings to cover problems of personnel administration and to recommend remedial action to the officers of The Department of Civil Service and the civil service commission. Pay negotiations and other matters are of direct concern to this branch, with the supervisor working closely with the director of staff relations on the Treasury board secretariat, who serves as an official side officer of the Ontario joint council.

The entire work of the civil service commission has proven that effective personnel management practices can maintain effective administrative services at reasonable cost to the taxpayer, keeping the number of overall staff at a reasonable level, while increasing the quality and salary recognition of such staffs serves the interests and needs of good government.

Mr. Chairman, I would commend to you the estimates for The Department of Civil Service to continue the up-to-date modern personnel administration which we think is second to none in Canada. Ontario is in the vanguard of developments in collective negotiations, permitting such matters as outside employment, political activity, granting arbitration rights in working conditions and terms of employment, as well as classification determinations.

This demonstrates that The Department of Civil Service has nothing to fear from outside arbitration of matters within its jurisdiction. This test demonstrates more effectively than anything I can say that the work of the department is carried out efficiently and well. Their estimates, therefore, commend themselves to the hon. members of this House for approval.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour) moves that the committee of supply rise and report certain resolutions and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report it has come to certain resolutions and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will proceed with the debate on the final report of the select committee on The Municipal Act; then we will proceed with estimates of The Department of Civil Service and the Treasury department.

I would add that the debate on the medicare bill will be early next week for the information of those who wish and intend to participate.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 11.00 o'clock, p.m.

COMMUTER SERVICES

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to provide for the establishment and operation of commuter services.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is a very simple piece of legislation but there lies behind it an announcement that I would like to make in which all hon. members of the House will be interested, because I think, in this area we will find that we are all as one—at least from previous public utterances of the Opposition.

You will recall that, in December, 1962, I had the pleasure to announce to this House the government decision to establish a special committee to carry out a study and to report on an overall transportation policy for Metropolitan Toronto and surrounding municipalities. For some time prior to the announcement of that decision, the government had been giving consideration to the problems of increasing transportation arising from the unprecedented post-war growth of this whole area, problems that were developing despite massive capital investment in transportation facilities throughout the entire area.

Major agencies such as The Department of Highways, the council of Metropolitan Toronto and the Toronto transit commission were engaged in long-term planning projects. The two national railways had decided to decentralize their freight marshaling yards which were located in the downtown area of Toronto. What we wanted to determine was the effect that these various plans would have on the future transportation state of the whole region; if they would provide the best overall transportation system; whether a proper balance of different types of transportation was being considered and whether there was a less costly means of peak-hour transportation and whether available railway facilities could be used for commuter movements.

The Metropolitan Toronto and region transportation study committee completed its organization in February of 1963. Its first undertaking, even before it had laid out detailed plans for carrying out the assignment, was the appointment of the firm of De Leuw Cather & Company, consulting engineers, in March of that year, to investigate the possibility of using railway lines located in the region, for commuter service.

In September, 1963, the study committee published a prospectus which contained the consolidation of existing information and concepts on transportation. That document outlined the initial objectives and the character of the study. It defined its field of study as the region lying within the boundaries of Oshawa on the east, Hamilton and Guelph on the west, and Barrie on the north, a region that takes in 3,500 square miles and involves over 70 municipalities.

In October, the consultants reported that varying degrees of capacity would be available on the rail lines to handle commuter trains. This was followed by a survey of trip movements to determine patterns of travel throughout the region, and in April of last year, the study again appointed consultants to extend their investigation into railway commuting. This involved a feasibility study to determine requirements for establishing a commuter service along the lakeshore corridor, as it is called, that lies between Hamilton and Oshawa. Their report was received in January of this year.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have outlined these activities of the transportation study to show that it has been quickly and exhaustively exploring this field of transportation, while carrying out a great deal of other work on the broader aspects of the assignment.

Today I am pleased to announce that another important stage in the commuter study has been concluded, with a decision by the government to establish an experimental rail commuter operation along 52 miles of the lake front, lying between Burlington on the west and Dunbarton on the east.

I might say that this is looked upon as something of a pioneering project, because it is the first time that any government in Canada has undertaken this kind of an operation, designed to provide frequent and fast mass-transportation. Although the service is being introduced as an experimental pilot project, to assess fully its acceptance and capabilities, the government looks to it with high hope for success, so that it might be adopted more extensively in the region and possibly in other parts of the province.

It was only after the railways undertook to shift their marshalling yards to the outskirts of the metropolitan area, that the door was opened to the possibilities of adopting such services. The construction of these facilities—I am referring now to the marshalling facilities, which was marked with the formal opening of the CNR yard on Monday of this week—will result in the diversion of a considerable volume of freight traffic from a number of lines, particularly those within the metropolitan area. This will provide, for the first time, a measure of available capacity to handle the type of operation we have in mind.

In other words, when the freight trains move out of the downtown area into the marshalling yards to the north, they relieve the pressure on the tracks, giving us an opportunity to introduce the fast type of passenger operation that is envisaged in this plan. I might say that the announcement of the government's decision, coming only two days after the opening of the marshalling yard, also demonstrates the effectiveness and dispatch of the transportation study in handling this particular phase of its assignment.

Since the first of the year negotiations have been conducted with the Canadian National Railways for shared use of its lakeshore line and other facilities. Agreement has now been reached and shortly the railway will enter into a contract to operate the proposed service at cost on behalf of a government agency or department, as set out in the bill.

I would like to say that the satisfactory conclusion of our negotiations could not possibly have been brought about without the unstinted co-operation of the railway and its representatives. These men made a significant contribution throughout the entire study of this matter and their work, in co-operation with the committee, is greatly appreciated. In the House today is Mr. Donald Gordon who is chairman and president of the Canadian National Railways Company—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. Robarts: —and Mr. Douglas V. Gonder, who is vice-president of the Great Lakes region of the Canadian National Railways—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. Robarts: —and Mr. John Spicer, who is the Toronto area manager of the Canadian National Railways. It is to these men and their staffs that we are indebted.

The province will finance the estimated capital cost requirement of $7.5 million to provide rolling stock, right-of-way operating improvements and station facilities to handle high frequency traffic. It is estimated that the gross operating cost will be about $3.5 million per year, and these are on the estimates because this is an experimental project; but we estimate that the revenue will be generated at something in the neighbourhood of $1.5 million.

The inauguration of the service will depend up on delivery dates of equipment, but it is expected that it will be late in 1966, or early in 1967. The capacity being developed—the peak period capacity will be 6,000 passengers per hour, but its general design will permit a maximum capacity of 12,000 riders an hour by increasing the size of the trains—the surveys estimate that there could be 15,000 potential passengers per day during the work week, the Monday to Friday period.

Before making its decision, Mr. Speaker, the government was presented with a number of proposals of the type of service that could be implemented. These proposals offered alternatives with restricted operation and correspondingly sizable savings on capital expenditure and operating costs.

The alternatives were: 1. an operation which did not have a special off-peak service; 2. a service between Oakville and Dunbarton only; 3. a service that would operate between Oakville and Guildwood only; 4. a service between Port Credit and Dunbarton; 5. a service on the eastern sector only, between Union Station and Dunbarton; and 6. a service restricted to the western sector only, between Union Station and Oakville.

Since the rail lines, we believed, could provide a valuable addition to regional transportation, it was felt that the project deserved a bold and imaginative approach and that a trial service based on any of these alternatives would be less than adequate. We wanted it to operate under the best conditions within our power, so that it could have the fullest opportunity to prove its function and potential.

Forecasts estimate that the region's population will more than double to 6,000,000 persons within the next 35 years and the population of the lakeshore corridor that this particular line will serve, will reach 1,000,000 people by 1980. It is also estimated that this growth and the economic expansion that will, of course, accompany it, will require an expenditure of more than $2.5 billion on transportation of one kind or another in this region during the next 20 years and more than $4 billion by the end of this century. The continued growth of this region, and the province generally, must have adequate facilities in all acceptable forms of transportation if we are to provide freedom of movement and development.

If the choice of travel is confined to the automobile, the flexibility of movement could become increasingly restricted, even with very heavy expenditures on freeways and on general road facilities in the province. It would appear that there is considerable merit in looking to rail commuter service as an alternative mode of transportation. For example, it would require the equivalent of four freeway lanes to handle the anticipated patronage on this one railway line, if these people were driving cars during peak periods. Similarly, it would require the equivalent of ten freeway lanes to provide the maximum capacity that there will be in this one railway line.

These commuter rail services, if they are accepted by the public, could go a long way to relieve congestion. A great deal of our freeway capacity outside peak periods is surplus to normal needs, and although freeway construction cannot be eliminated, the need for expensive surplus capacity can very well be reduced. There is, of course, a very distinct possibility that the expenditure of funds in establishing these acceptable rail commuter services where they are possible, will result in considerable savings on highways and highway construction, and this in turn can bring about a more extensive use of transportation funds saved here, to be used in other parts of the province.

In any event, we are seeking answers to these questions in undertaking this project and I am aware, as I said in my opening remarks, that all hon. members in this House are keenly interested in this important transportation development, and I am sure that we will all look forward to seeing what the final results are. Based on our studies, we are optimistic that they will be good.

If I may beg the indulgence of the House, there are other questions involved in this to which I am sure hon. members would like the answers. The hon. Minister of Highways (Mr. MacNaughton) has acted as chairman of the Metropolitan Toronto and region transportation study. In other words, he has chaired the broad study of all these transportation needs in the area, and I would ask, Mr. Speaker, if he could be permitted to give you some more detailed information that I have not covered in this statement of mine.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Minister of Highways): Mr. Speaker, for the information of the House, may I say that in conducting its rail commuter study, the Metropolitan Toronto and region transportation study committee first carried out an investigation of all railway lines in the region. This covered approximately 250 miles of track on 15 lines, radiating from the Toronto area. It determined the amount of available capacity that could possibly be used for short-haul commuter traffic. As a result, it was estimated that about 45,000 persons could be carried into or out of the city daily, during peak periods.

Only about 90 miles of the total track was capable of handling more than one or two trains daily without resorting to major capital investments in additional track and other facilities. Experts found that the limited commuter services operated by the railways in the region were not able to provide sufficient information to assess fully the role that such service could play in an overall transportation system. Therefore, a feasibility study was carried out to determine the public acceptability, engineering and equipment requirements and the cost involved in establishing a pilot project so that reliable operating data could be obtained.

The transportation study's experts selected the CNR line primarily for three reasons:

1. It passed through the most populated area of the region.

2. The lakeshore corridor contained widely differing community and transportation characteristics to provide a variety of data that could be related to other parts of the region, and the line itself offered considerable savings in capital investment because it did not require expensive changes to adapt track, signal and other facilities.

3. The corridor, as has been mentioned, has a population of 568,000 people. It is estimated from a survey carried out under the transportation study's direction last year, that approximately 90,000 of that number are daily commuters, with about three-quarters of them presently using cars. An estimated 38,000 or about 40 per cent of the commuters are employed in the commercial area of Toronto.

The survey also provided an estimate that there were approximately 15,000 potential riders a day between Monday and Friday with weekend and holiday traffic, of course, on a much smaller scale. This was considered sufficient patronage to allow an accurate assessment and warrant the government's sizable investment in the project.

Specifications are now being prepared and manufacturers will shortly be asked to submit tenders for 48 new, modern, specially designed coaches, each with a seating capacity for 125 passengers, and ten diesel locomotives. The equipment will be of the most advanced design to handle this type of service. Under present plans, the service would operate from 6.45 a.m. to midnight from Monday to Friday, with trains scheduled every 20 minutes during morning and evening peak travelling periods. In off-peak periods and throughout Saturday the service would operate on an hourly schedule and a 90-minute schedule would be in effect for Sundays and holidays.

Travel time from Burlington to Union Station, according to present estimates, would be 57 minutes. From Oakville, 40 minutes, and from Union Station to Dumbarton, also 40 minutes. These times would include stops at all stations between the two points. Although there will be a considerable reduction in the number of freight trains using the line, the remaining volume of traffic and limited facilities for passenger handling at Union Station will prevent a higher frequency and more extensive service. Indeed, an increased volume of railway traffic between Burlington and Hamilton, and Dumbarton and Oshawa, is expected as a result of the changes in the marshalling yard location. This rules out any possibility of rail commuter operations on these sections, unless more than 20 miles of new lines are built and equipped with advance signalling facilities. This would be a very expensive proposition and one that could not be considered justified at this time.

The survey disclosed that there were very few regular train commuters expected from Hamilton and the majority of present commuters patronize long-distance express trains. These express trains will continue to be available to serve them, or, if they wish, Hamilton passengers could use the parking facilities at Burlington and board trains there. Because the survey also indicated a somewhat lower level of patronage could be expected from the Burlington and Bronte areas, service to these two stations will consist of our peak period trains daily throughout the work week. This would be the same as the present CNR commuter service which will be discontinued, but travel time would be from 10 to 20 minutes faster.

Consideration is being given to a probable need to rearrange station locations in order to cut travel time on the western sector. A number of stations are located very close to each other, within a distance of about two miles, and a rearrangement of stations without affecting service to the areas involved could speed up train times by ten minutes at least.

According to our survey, the prime consideration which potential riders desired was a fast, frequent and dependable service. For this reason, and taking into consideration the volumes of passenger potential expected from various areas, it is planned to have 14 stations in operation along the line.

Sunnyside station would be eliminated as a commuter stop because the survey indicated that patronage prospects are almost nil due to the high degree of Toronto transit commission facilities available in the area. Other stations under consideration for elimination are Dixie Road, Lakeview and Lorne Park. Passengers from the Dixie Road and Lakeview areas could take trains from nearby Long Branch station and Lorne Park passengers could use either Port Credit or Clarkson stations.

On the other hand, it will be necessary to add several stations to the eastern sector where stations do not now exist. In addition to the present stations at Danforth and Scarborough it is contemplated that new stations would be located at Eglinton, Guildwood, Port Union and Dumbarton itself. Feeder bus services will be provided in areas where stations are to be eliminated, with the exception of Sunnyside, to minimize passenger inconvenience. Buses would also operate to other stations where they are required.

In addition, all stations with the exception of Union Station would be provided with adequate parking facilities, and special areas now popularly called "kiss and ride" areas where wives could conveniently drop off and pick up their husbands with the family car. It is intended that this service shall have every possible feature to make it attractive to commuters who are in a position to use it.

The operation of a commuter service such as I have described is an expensive proposition. Consequently, to offset the considerably higher cost of the greater convenience that will be provided, it may be necessary to make some upward adjustment in fares over rates now charged by the railway. However, Mr. Speaker, I can assure the House and assure the public that the new fare structure, if implemented and as it may be implemented, will remain competitive with the cost of other modes of transportation and it will not be out of line with comparable rates of similar services in other cities on this continent. The transportation study estimates that it will require two to three years of operation in order to fully assess the service capabilities and public acceptance under various conditions. This field study will be devoted to an intensive analysis of the relationships of patronage to service characteristics, and development of operating techniques that could be applied to the regions.

Specifically, some of the matters that are to be studied include comparisons of different modes of transportation where there are the advantages of speed, a matter of choice and frequency of service, integration of rail commuter operations with other forms of transportation, means of improving patronage under different operating conditions, types of service operation required to meet differing community characteristics; and perhaps the most important of all from a public point of view, the degree to which fares and costs can be adjusted in relation to levels of patronage and system costs. These are the main conditions and some of the important considerations that had to be studied in the establishment of such a project.

No doubt, Mr. Speaker, all hon. members can appreciate that there is a myriad of detail still to be worked out before operations can be undertaken. It is my intention to make the House aware of further important developments on the subject as they occur from time to time.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I would like to tell the House that we have a visitor from Wales with us, Mr. W. J. Reese, who is the chief public health inspector for Wales. He is in Ontario visiting some friends of mine in my own constituency and I would think the hon. members of the House would want to extend a welcome to Mr. Reese. I hope he is in the House at the moment.

Through you, Mr. Speaker, I would tell Mr. Reese that we have Wales in mind constantly in this Legislature. Indeed we have one of our ridings named after St. David, and annually the hon. member for St. David (Mr. Price), who is not here in the House as yet and could not be here, speaks annually in honour of the Welsh people. I would think this would be another occasion when we might honour the people of Wales and tell Mr. Reese the significant part that they have played in the life and growth of this province.

Mr. N. L. Olde (Middlesex South): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I have a very important announcement to make regarding the great riding of Middlesex South, which I have the honour to represent. On Friday, June 4, 1965 at 3:30 p.m., the new bridge crossing the Thames River on Highway No. 2 in the village of Delaware will be named the Harry M. Allen bridge.

I am particularly proud to make this announcement to the hon. members of the Legislature because the late Harry M. Allen represented the riding of Middlesex South in this Legislature from 1945 to 1963. Many of my hon. colleagues will recall the great contribution he made to the public life of this province. The hon. Minister of Highways will officially unveil the commemoration plaque and all hon. members of this House are invited to attend.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The second order, resuming the adjourned debate on the fourth and final report of the select committee on The Municipal Act and related Acts.

ON THE MUNICIPAL ACT AND RELATED ACTS

Mr. H. E. Beckett (York East): Mr. Speaker, before I speak again on this matter, I wish to advise the hon. members of the House our good friend, the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox (Mr. Whitney) was to speak, but unfortunately he is in the hospital, so I will attempt to speak for him. I know he is a great supporter of local government.

There has been some comment, Mr. Speaker, on the qualifications and the experience that the members of the select committee have on The Municipal Act and related Acts. I thought for the benefit of those critics and for the benefit of the hon. members of the House, I might read the experience that the members of the committee have had.

The hon. member for High Park (Mr. Cowling) was an alderman for the city of Toronto for two years and on the board of control for one year.

The hon. member for Simcoe Centre (Mr. Evans) was a councillor for six years, reeve for five years and mayor for the town of Bradford for one year. He was a member of the public utilities commission for 14 years, warden of the county of Simcoe and on the district high school board for one year.

The hon. member for Algoma-Manitoulin (Mr. Farquhar) was a member of the public school board for three years and chairman for two years; and member of the high school board for two years and chairman for one year; a councillor for five years and mayor for two years of the town of Little Current; and a member of the high school board for one year, at Blind River in the Elliot Lake district.

The hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Gomme), now Minister without Portfolio, was councillor for one year, reeve for one year and mayor for three years of the town of Almonte.

The hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Gordon) was alderman for two years and a member of the public utilities commission for four years for the city of Brantford.

The hon. member for Middlesex South (Mr. Olde) was councillor for two years, deputy reeve two years, reeve two years, for the township of Caradoc and warden of the county of Middlesex.

The hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Renter) was alderman for three years, and mayor for two years, of the town of Preston.

The hon. member for Downsview (Mr. Singer) was councillor for three years, reeve for two years, of the township of North York, and a member of the Toronto metropolitan council for two years, and during the whole of that time, was a member of the executive committee.

The hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox was a councillor for two years, deputy reeve one year and reeve for six years of the township of Ameliasburgh and warden for Prince Edward county.

The hon. member for Yorkview (Mr. Young) was a councillor for seven years and a member of the planning board for two years for North York township.

As for myself, I had the privilege of serving as councillor for one year and deputy reeve for six years, of Scarborough township council.

And, as you all know, each member who serves as a reeve or deputy reeve, also serves an equal number of years on their respective county councils. So I think, Mr. Speaker, that answers the critics and some newspaper comments that the members of the committee lack municipal experience.

Mr. Speaker, I want to talk further on the fourth and final report of the committee. We feel that specific functions of municipal government have now become centred in newly created bodies and functionaries. The municipal council today has been shorn of its pristine glory and in many respects, now serves but as a collecting and distributing agency between the general body of citizens and the bodies or functionaries managing and administering various municipal enterprises and undertakings.

The result is that today we are blessed or cursed, as the point of view may be, with a great number of bodies which govern and administer our municipal affairs. In the average city today in Ontario, we will in all possibility, find a council, one or more utility commissions, a police commission, parks board, town planning board, board of health, board of education, vocational school board, library board, and perhaps other boards or commissions, the members of which are elected by the people or appointed by their elected representatives. And to this must be added, Mr. Speaker, a number of other bodies of a public or quasi-public nature, which in reality serve the municipality in their particular fields, just as the council and other bodies mentioned may do, although they are not necessarily the creatures of the general municipal statutes.

Under this category, fall such bodies as boards of trade, chambers of commerce, industrial commissions, harbour commissions, highway commissions, hospital boards and innumerable others. While in the smaller urban and rural communities the situation is not quite the same, yet even there the tendency has been towards the creation of bodies, separate from the municipal council, to look after some work or project of a special nature.

If to all these elected or appointed bodies are added the great host of public and municipal officials, who in an executive capacity, administer local affairs, it will be readily conceded that we have enough, if not a surfeit, of municipal government. We all should at this time decide whether or not modern tendencies have not made too many inroads upon a system of municipal government, which has stood the test of time. We should consider whether or not the development by municipalities of activities which are the creatures of recent years—and have become so by necessity or desire—require to be placed under some greater measure of control, so that the financial burdens resulting therefrom may not become too onerous.

It becomes the duty of all of us to take time to take some part in the matter of the administration of municipal affairs, because the management of a municipality is most important to everybody. If hon. members were to make a survey of the changes which have been brought about in the conduct of municipal affairs and which have occasioned a very large increase in municipal expenditures, it is probable that they would say that the following five factors have played the largest part in such changes: public utilities development; educational development; highways development; social welfare development and decentralization of municipal government.

Hon. members will find that out of the innumerable items which have contributed to municipal progress and the great increase in taxation and debenture debt, it has been established that the greatest percentage of them all fall into one or other of the five foregoing categories and no substantial or satisfactory progress towards permanently determining our future system of municipal government can be made without due regard to them.

The problem of preserving local autonomy, and at the same time raising revenue locally to finance local needs, permeates the whole fabric of municipal government. We should preserve local self-government in order to protect, nurture and further develop to maturity our inherent belief in political freedom and personal liberty.

Here I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member who is now in the hospital, was a great supporter of that doctrine, local autonomy. All through our meetings, he kept saying that we must maintain our local system of government. In order to accomplish this, it is imperative that local governments have complete jurisdiction and control over matters of purely local nature, including the means of raising revenue to finance these undertakings.

Mr. Speaker, the extension of the municipal franchise to persons not rated as property owners or tenants, recognizes the rapid increase of services furnished to people, as distinguished from services furnished to property. No local government can function without the necessary funds to carry out the legal obligations and fulfill the numerous social responsibilities, if it is to govern in the best interests of the community as a whole. The present method of municipal finance is outmoded and discriminatory. There are two distinct types of service rendered by local governments.

First, there is the servicing of real property by providing such services as water, sewers, sidewalks, roads and fire protection.

Second, there are the services provided to persons, such as education, administration of justice, parks and recreation.

Services provided to real property should be financed by the owners of property and services provided to people, should be financed by the people who reap the benefits. An effective system of local government is essential, if the need for local services to local citizens and communities is to be made efficiently and at reasonable cost and in accordance with local wishes. Many of the difficulties in carrying out such functions as slum clearance, urban renewal, town planning, pollution control and area development, arise as much from the complexities and fragmentation of local government as from any other source.

As hon. members all know, there is a great distribution of responsibilities in local government between the councils and the local boards, commissions and special-purpose bodies. There are—in addition to the non-elected boards such as planning boards, parking authorities, community centre boards—the elected school boards and public utilities commissions, and there are intermunicipal bodies such as suburban road commissions, health units, conservation authorities and homes for the aged.

When I presented the fourth and final report of the committee on March 30 last, I dealt with the matter of regional government. One of the recommendations was that the members of regional councils be elected directly by the people on the basis of wards which should be as nearly as possible, equal in population. I would like to give the House two examples to show why this policy should be adopted. The London Government Act of 1963, in England, makes provision with respect to local government and the functions of local authorities in the metropolitan area. The Act establishes new administrative areas to be known as London boroughs. There are 32 boroughs, having 98 councillors, the number of councillors varying from two to four. As of April 1 of this year, no part of Greater London shall form part of any administrative county district or parish.

Now, Greater London has an area of 393,809 acres, or 616 square miles, with a population of nearly 8 million people, whereas Metropolitan Toronto has an area of about 240 square miles and a population of about 1,600,000.

The greatest distance in Greater London from north to south is 30 miles and the greatest distance from east to west is 36 miles. The primary unit of local government is the borough. The new boroughs to which highly important personal services had been transferred are large and have great resources, and by working with each other will be able to fulfil their responsibilities.

The populations of the London boroughs range from 146,000 to 341,000, and there are only five boroughs with populations less than 200,000.

Their ratable values range from £9,200,000 to £108 million.

There was established at the same time the London boroughs committee consisting of two representatives of each of the 32 boroughs and the city of London. The principal aim of the London boroughs committee is to protect and advance the powers, interests, rights and privileges of the constituents' councils and to intervene when those powers, interests, rights and privileges are affected by legislation or proposed legislation.

This committee has established advisory bodies of officers appointed by the associations and these bodies meet frequently to consider matters affecting them.

London's two-tier system of government expresses the Londoner's dual relationship, loyalty and allegiance to London as a whole and to a local community. But the Londoner is entitled to ask that the administration of a service shall be as near as possible to the person to whom the service is extended.

It is recommended that in principle there shall be the same system for education in the whole of Greater London and that the Greater London council shall be the educational authority for the whole area—quite different from our system—and that the Greater London council should be responsible for planning, programming and financing and that teachers should be appointed to the service of the council. On the other hand, the boroughs should be given specific responsibilities to be defined in the Act, which may briefly be described as management and maintenance.

Broadly speaking, the borough councils are charged with responsibility for those services which bring them into close personal contact with their citizens and which involves, inevitably, large volumes of correspondence and decisions.

The Greater London council is charged with a policy of administration which looks to the needs of the wider area as a whole. The council is responsible for ambulances, fire service, sewage disposal, civil defence, and a research and information department for the collection of information relating to any matter affecting Greater London.

It is the sole traffic authority and has control of planning and metropolitan highways and the important service of housing and London Building Act.

Members of the Greater London council are elected by the people.

A further example of direct election is the government of Metropolitan Winnipeg. The Manitoba government in October, 1962, appointed a commission headed by Mr. Lorne Cumming, QC, then deputy Minister of Municipal Affairs for Ontario, and they were asked to inquire into all facts and circumstances relating to the following:

A. The finance relationships of the metropolitan corporation and the area municipalities.

B. The form and structure of the metropolitan government, with a view to the adjustment of any factors that would make for more effective relationship with the area municipalities.

C. The structure and methods of the intergovernmental relationship of metropolitan government and the area municipalities, with a view to such technical alterations as would make for more effective local government in the area.

D. The boundaries of the metropolitan corporation and all the area municipalities and their suitability in the light of the services required.

E. Generally, all matters pertinent to the metropolitan government in Greater Winnipeg, not being inconsistent with matters hereinabove mentioned, which the commission may deem appropriate and to which the Lieutenant-Governor in Council may refer from time to time.

Mr. Speaker, this commission, after reviewing and considering the implications of the provisions of this portion of the Act, concluded that they were intended to implement the following basic principles:

A. The corporation should be governed by a relatively small council directly elected by the people.

B. The fundamental principle of representation by population is to be followed in view of the taxing power of the council, notwithstanding the fact that taxes for metropolitan purposes are not levied directly but indirectly through levies upon the constituent municipalities.

C. The members of the council are not to be in any sense the appointed or instructed delegates of the local council but are to be elected by and responsible to the electors residing in a specified portion of the entire area, with regard to local boundaries established for local purposes.

D. The system is designed to prevent, so far as possible, an unequal division of political powers between the central city on one hand and the suburbs on the other and to reduce the possibility of either group being able to dominate the proceedings and control the decisions of the council.

Representatives of the area municipalities argued that the metropolitan council should include, as ex-officio members at least, the elected heads of the city and the larger suburbs. They reviewed the recommendations of the metropolitan subcommittee which were presented to the government of Manitoba some ten years previously and if it had been adopted there would have been a very large metropolitan council with some of the members having multiple votes. They also studied the recommendations of the Greater Winnipeg investigating commission which, if adopted, would have meant a metropolitan council of six members elected directly by the metropolitan district and eight ex-officio members, being the mayors or elected heads of the eight cities or municipalities which would be established by a series of territorial changes.

The commission, after lengthy and anxious consideration of all the evidence and exhibits, and in light of actual experience and having regard particularly to the encouraging progress made under the present system to date after a relatively short period, has finally come to the conclusion that the principles adopted by the government in setting up the present type of council are sound and the present organization should be continued, subject of course to such further reviews and evaluations from time to time in the manner contemplated in the Act and as later recommended in their report.

Now, Mr. Speaker, by The Metropolitan Winnipeg Act in 1960 the government of the corporation is by a council of ten members directly elected by the people in the ten metropolitan electoral divisions—the chairman to be elected by the elected members for a four-year term.

There are 19 municipalities in Metropolitan Winnipeg and each division, as nearly as possible for election purposes, is to contain the same number of electors and to include portions of at least two area municipalities.

The divisions are so constituted that in five divisions the majority of electors are residents of Winnipeg, and in the other five divisions the majority of electors are not resident of Winnipeg. Each division contains a portion of the city together with portions of one or more of the area municipalities.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that democracy in its best form emanates from the direct election of representatives at all levels of government. I say that this method is adopted in the elections at federal, provincial and local municipal levels. And if a regional government is to adhere to this pattern, the regional councils should be elected directly by the people, as nearly as practical on the principle of representation by population. And this could be accomplished by the use of a ward system. Ward boundaries could follow as nearly as possible the boundaries of constituent municipalities, although it will sometimes be necessary to combine or divide local municipalities to achieve equality of representation.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour) moves that the report be discharged.

Motion agreed to.

Clerk of the House: The seventeenth order, House in committee of supply; Mr. W. G. Noden in the chair.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF CIVIL SERVICE

On vote 301:

Mr. H. S. Racine (Ottawa East): Mr. Chairman, when the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) addressed this House last year in dealing with the estimates of The Department of the Civil Service, he said that in Ontario over the years the basis for a fine civil service had been established. I believe it to be my duty to say that my relations with the civil service of this province since my election to this Legislature have been excellent. I have been able to solve many problems for my constituents through the good offices of many of our fine civil servants.

I do not intend to offer any criticisms of the work done by the civil servants. I would, however, like to criticize the leadership of the government in the administration of the department.

In his opening remarks in last year's estimates debate, the hon. Provincial Treasurer talked at great length on the provision in The Public Service Act providing for a joint council for collective negotiation procedures between employee association representatives and management representatives. This debate, Mr. Chairman, took place on March 5, 1964. Six weeks later, a submission regarding employer-employee relations in the Ontario public service was presented to the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Roberts) by the Civil Service Association of Ontario, Incorporated. I believe it may be found useful to inform this House of the contents of this submission. I shall read first the introduction of this brief.

The civil service association of Ontario, with regret, finds it necessary to focus attention on the unsatisfactory conditions prevailing in the relationship between the Ontario government and the association in the field of negotiations concerning employment conditions in the Ontario public service. The distress of the many members and the low salary brackets, aggravated by exceeding slowness in the adjustment of their pay rates, the universal concern of all employees with the apparent apathy of government and its agents to employee matters, and the continual retreat of official side personnel behind "sovereign rights," have all combined to force the association into a position not of its own making or liking.

Hence this submission, by order of the board of directors, to fully inform the Honourable Prime Minister of the true situation of employer-employee relations in the Ontario public service.

Mr. Chairman, I think it will be advantageous to read this submission and I shall start with the first part, entitled "History":

Until 1944, the relationship between the government of Ontario as an employer and the Civil Service Association of Ontario, Incorporated, representing the employees of government, had no formality.

As a result of strong representation at that time, the government provided for a joint advisory council and departmental councils. The basis for these councils was the Whitley council system which had existed in England since 1919. In practice, there was little comparison between the Ontario system of councils and the British system of councils. The Ontario system had no firm negotiating procedures and no provision for final or binding decisions, the joint advisory council having only powers of recommendation.

In practice also, the association representatives found that the official representatives were reluctant even to discuss matters on the grounds that they had no right to do so unless the matters were referred to them by the government. Repeated attempts by the association to improve the procedures met with little success until 1959 when the dissatisfaction of public servants reached a point of public protests.

Following this, the government made some amendments to the regulations governing the council system along with some changes in the personnel representing the government. Again, in practice, the amendments served very little useful purpose, and the net result of the amendments was improvement in the election procedures to the departmental councils with the joint advisory council receiving no authority to negotiate or to decide matters of concern to public servants.

In 1962, again following repeated protests of public servants, the association proposed an agreement be entered into between the government and the association, to provide formal relationship between the government and the association, designed to eliminate arbitrary and unilateral decisions concerning matters of employment, while protecting sovereign rights. This proposal, along with certain proposals for a regulation which The Public Service Act of that time provided for, subsequently resulted in the amendment to The Public Service Act, to provide for effective negotiations through a joint council, which was given the power of binding decisions. The right of arbitration where agreement could not be reached was also provided.

The joint council, after some preliminary sessions, commenced its operations in August, 1963. The new negotiation and arbitration procedures were announced by the government and the association with some pride and great hopes. The interest awakened in the new legislation, extended far beyond the borders of Ontario. To the public servant generally, negotiation and arbitration meant the right to participate in decisions concerning rates of pay and working conditions. This was done at last, that the many discrepancies, particularly in pay rates, would be corrected through orderly and timely negotiations by responsible persons, with authority to make decisions.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what has been the experience?

In a nutshell, it became obvious very early, that the negotiation procedure restrictions applied only to the association and to the items presented by the association. The employer reserved unto itself, the same old rights of unilateral decision. Class specifications were revised without reference to joint council or the association. Pay rates were published without prior negotiation. Changes to working conditions were made without negotiation. Experience was contrary to expectations.

(a) Joint council: The first big disappointment to the association was the arbitrary exclusion from joint council provisions of the Ontario provincial police. While the Act provides for exclusion by regulations, the association had held the opinion that the government would not use that device to arbitrarily remove groups from the bargaining provision, particularly since any across-service item negotiated must apply to such groups. The fact remains that the association was allowed no say in the matter even though a significant number of police officers are members of the association.

In an effort to clarify the extent of negotiation and establish the rights of the association as a full partner in the negotiating body, the association submitted as an item of joint council agenda the following:

"Ontario regulations and amendments thereto under The Public Service Act:

"The association submits that bargaining in good faith requires the parties to bargaining to refrain from any unilateral act which would tend to bind the employees of the bargaining unit and which would prejudice negotiations. The issuance of regulations or amendments to regulations covering the employment conditions in the Ontario public service, without reference to the Ontario joint council, can seriously embarrass the members of council and adversely affect the public image of the Ontario joint council.

"The association submits that, in establishing the Ontario joint council with authority to make decisions concerning matters related to the employment conditions of public servants, the Ontario government delegated its powers of decision in personnel matters to the Ontario joint council, subject only to the authority of the Legislature.

"W. J. Foster, representing the members of the civil service association of Ontario, now moves that henceforth no regulations or amendments to regulations governing the general employment conditions of Ontario public servants shall be issued without prior negotiation in the Ontario joint council."

Official side of council refused to accept them on the grounds that "we cannot tell the government what to do or what not to do." Such an attitude completely negates the principles of negotiation and arouses suspicion against the employer.

Negotiation of all items placed on the agenda was not of the type expected and the approach of official side members did little to inspire confidence in the joint council as a negotiating body.

Example: Hospital-medical-surgical insurance. In preparation for negotiations, the association representatives were armed with a mass of facts and figures and offered to table same as a basis for negotiation. The item was presented in August, 1963, and received preliminary discussion in September. In October, it was agreed to meet informally "to clear the way for the official side to prepare a counter proposal"—Minutes of October 7, 1963.

In November, official side stated that the government would arrange without delay a study of fringe benefits. Staff side offered to negotiate on 70 per cent. Official side was not prepared to agree or offer counter-proposals. Staff side asked for arbitration. Two weeks later, official side offered an expedited review "so that council may place its decision in respect of the said matter before the government prior to the first day of April, 1964."—Minute of November 19, 1963.

At the meeting of April 13, official side were blandly stating that they would have no report until May. Staff side declared this unacceptable and again declared for arbitration, subject to confirmation by the board of directors meeting of April 17. A further meeting of council on April 20, indicated quite clearly that the original agreement on the April 1 date had been merely a device, a date for report in June was now being offered. Obviously the matter should have gone to arbitration in November, saving a delay of five months and obviating questions as to staff side credulity and official side sincerity.

Staff side negotiators have valiantly attempted to bring some realism to negotiation and have stated emphatically that the official side are not acting as negotiators. The Hon. James N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer) was made aware of this and arranged a meeting attended by representatives of both sides, the chairman of the civil service commission and a labour lawyer, retained by the government. Apart from assurances that better negotiating procedures would be devised, nothing has transpired.

(b) General: There have been occasions when the association was generally aware that changes in working conditions were being considered and became officially aware that changes had been made when the Ontario Gazette was received through the mail.

Example: New regulation prohibiting second or subsequent leave of absence for maternity. The original procedures for leave of absence were adequate and apparently acceptable to all until an employee filed a grievance when denied a second maternity leave. The grievance board found in favour of the employee. The details are available in the grievance file. It is sufficient to say here that losing a grievance in any other jurisdiction would not give management the right to change the rules of the game unless and until the change had been bargained for.

Example: The decision to have two or more standards for teachers in The Department of Education. No negotiation was offered. No consultation was offered. The association read about it in the daily newspapers.

The examples quoted are just that. They are cited as examples of bad faith or official disregard of all the time and effort spent in devising a form of negotiation which was to be a shining guide for all other public service jurisdictions. The changes in working conditions may be desirable and completely justified—if so, then the official side has missed a glorious opportunity to improve communications and enlist the support of the association—if not, then the official side has misused its big stick of statutory authority to defeat the means by which employees may have some measure of representation and protection.

(c) Salaries. There has been no negotiation on salaries. On occasion we have been invited to discuss salaries for certain classifications, but only in one instance did our protests against rates to be recommended by the commission, result in any improvement to the rates. In other instances the rates disputed were subsequently announced without negotiation and in defiance of our protests.

In 1961, a well publicized job evaluation programme was commenced with high level assurance that Phase 1 would be completed in one year. It is a matter of record that Phase 1 is still not completed. The long delays, the lack of reasonable explanation for the delays and the confusion in the processing of the findings have resulted in frustration and bitterness at all levels of the service. Rates revised with the effective date of September 1, 1962, are now overdue for further revision, while other rates have remained static since October 1, 1959. Trades classes were revised July 1, 1960 and should have been again revised not later than July 1, 1962. Still other classes have had more than one revision in the last two years. In-service differentials are chaotic and relationships distorted. In some cases employees recently promoted are now receiving less pay than they would receive had they not been promoted. The planned, orderly two-year programme which was publicized far and wide has become a disorderly jumble with no apparent end.

Mr. Chairman, there was a further letter dated February 18, 1965, and this shows a continuation of the conditions that I have mentioned in the first letter.

The hon. Minister, I am sure, may have some comments to make in this matter. He might tell us that these difficulties have all been ironed out. I am sure, however, that there are still many grievances in the civil service of this province. It is to be hoped the joint council will, in the future, assume the role for which it was formed, and that the association will be recognized as a full partner in the negotiating body.

In advertising for staff, the commission always uses the motto: Ontario, Land of Opportunity. I would like to quote an editorial published in the Globe and Mail, dated April 8, 1965, and I quote:

Under the heading, "Ontario, Province of Opportunity," the following advertisement announcing challenging new positions for research officers in The Department of Education has appeared in the Globe and Mail:

"Research positions are available in the recently formed youth branch of The Department of Education. The branch will study such topics as the effects of automation, the changing nature of job situations, the problems of youth who find it difficult to accept current social standards with reference to educational, cultural, recreational and employment opportunities.

"The individual research officer will represent one of the following disciplines: Economics, sociology, education or psychology. The total effort will be directed, in co-operation with youth agencies, toward the development of practical programmes and policies to help young people meet the challenges and opportunities of contemporary society."

So far, so good. The department is to be congratulated again for its imaginative approach to solving the problems of the youth of the "province of opportunity."

But read on:

"Openings are for graduates at the Ph.D. Master's degree and honour degree level in one of the above-mentioned disciplines. Starting salaries will be commensurate with the level of the degree; that is $5,250, $6,300, $7,200. Additional requirements include acceptable experience in the applied fields of education, economics or social work; a strong measure of self-direction; the ability to communicate effectively in writing and speech."

Now, after a slight pause for century identification, a reader might ask how The Department of Education could possibly expect in these times to hire personnel with such high qualifications at such low salaries—and particularly from a field where there is already a great shortage of trained people. The answer, of course, is that the jobs will be filled by people who are not quite competent, or who are so dedicated to research that salary is unimportant. In either case, the work or the worker suffers. Neither answer should be satisfactory to the "province of opportunity."

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that many other examples have been quoted in this House by other speakers in the study of estimates of many departments. Some of the problems in The Department of Health, The Department of Public Welfare and many others would not exist if the salary scale had been set to conform with salaries for identical positions in private business or the federal government.

The hon. Minister mentioned that the increase of the staff of the civil service was from 39,970 to 41,415 in the past year. This represents a percentage increase of 3.6 per cent, when the transfer of casuals or unclassified staff are included. If these are removed, the percentage increase is .1 per cent. Does this mean that the civil service had been overstaffed before?

The hon. Minister has also advised the House that the government is continuing its promise to bring under civil service administration most of the continuing casuals working for the government and that, through such controls as those exercised by the Treasury board, the number of civil servants has been stabilized.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that this is the wish of most hon. members, particularly in the Opposition, that with as little delay as possible all positions be brought under the jurisdiction of the civil service commission.

In his remarks last night, the hon. Minister said that it is essential in government administration, as in business and industry, that economies be performed. I think we all agree with that statement, but not at the cost of inefficient administration.

I would like at this time to make a few comments on the figures mentioned in the estimates for 1965-66. I notice an increase of $151,000 to a total of $1,209,000 for this fiscal year. It is hard to explain this amount without visible signs of increased efficiency.

The greatest increase in cost relates to work to keep employees happy: Pay research salaries, an increase of $90,000; employee relations, an increase of $67,500; joint council, an increase of $33,500. That is a total of $191,000.

I think it would be useful for the hon. Minister to explain the apparently unwarranted increase in purely administrative costs. The main office costs have been increased from $155,000 and recruiting to $224,500.

The training budget is totally inadequate, having been reduced by $4,500. The government says industry must take notice of the need for up-grading in the face of developing management science. Why should it not be done by government itself?

Canadian National Telecommunications estimates that it spends $650,000 a year to train 6,000 employees. Professional organizations estimate that they must spend from five per cent to 10 per cent of their gross revenue on training or they will fall behind. This is done by chartered accounting firms and many others. With approximately 50,000 employees, how can the government get away with spending the sum of $97,000?

In the question of salaries, rough estimates show an average of $4,500. This figure is probably too high. Does this suit the wealthiest province with the most challenging problems in Canada?

I would now like to make a few general remarks on the estimates.

First, it is evident that the morale of the civil service is very low. The letters from the civil service association of Ontario only confirm an impression that is easily gained around the Legislature.

Mr. Chairman, I have just been given two letters from the civil service association, which I will not read, but they still have the same grievances. These two letters are dated May 5 and May 18, 1965. Here are some of the reasons for the situation of low morale in the civil service: (a) Lack of bargaining in good faith; (b) lack of challenge to individuals; (c) lack of training opportunities; (d) lack of motivation; (e) lack of pay standards; (f) lack of recruiting standards; (g) patronage and paternalism in non-civil service agencies; (h) lack of modern methods in clerical and administrative routines—only $570,000 for the data processing branch; any large company spends five times that amount; (i) knowledge that there is an inordinate amount of administrative fat—a programme that largely should be capable of administration by one-half the staff with careful training; (j) paternalism in benefits and retention policies; and (k) lack of feeling of worth to the work.

Now, the second item is a most obvious lack of guidance from the Cabinet. The hon. Provincial Treasurer has enough to do to look after financial policy. He should not also have to administer the personnel functions. The result of doing this is a bureaucratic autonomy in the department which feels it can go its own way without having to account for a detailed scrutiny of its actions.

My third point is that the government is not meeting the so-called challenge of automation. It obviously is afraid to streamline; afraid to meet the problem of employee dislocation and training. So much for its pious teaching to others!

I would like to make a few suggestions in order to correct the present situation:

1. I would transfer the responsibility for the civil service to the hon. Prime Minister himself.

2. There should be an integration of agencies and departments in order to reduce redundancy in departmental functions.

3. Investigation of the feasibility of greater use of mechanical means to improve efficiency of administration. I would like to ask the hon. Minister, for instance, about the operation of elevators in the new building. Would they be run by people or by computers?

4. The training philosophy should be modernized: (a) Senior officials should be moved around, as suggested by the Glassco commission; (b) an integrated development programme for promising career employees should be developed; and (c) challenge and competitiveness in the service should be publicized.

5. Standards for admission and promotion should be improved. It is not enough to boast that two-thirds of employees taken in in the three summer months in Toronto had Grade 12 or better. How can the government obtain the respect of the community and lend an example to students when its standards are so much lower than is normal in business?

6. Good faith and proper bargaining methods should be developed.

I can assure you, Mr. Chairman, that considerable research and study has gone into the preparation and study of this debate on the estimates of this department. I know that the hon. members of my party are anxious to make the civil service of this province the best in this country. We should study the Glassco commission report, which is now being implemented by the government of Canada; and I notice with pleasure that the hon. Provincial Treasurer intends to use that report of classification administration.

Many of the recommendations of that report may be easily used in improving the administration of the civil service of this province.

The retraining of many of our civil servants would greatly increase the efficiency of several departments. It would also improve the morale of many civil servants who would feel that they are now doing a job instead of staying around with not too much to do. They would also feel a lot happier if, because of their retraining, they have a chance of increasing their income.

If the hon. Provincial Treasurer, or his successor as the Minister responsible for The Department of Civil Service, sees to the implementation of these proposed reforms, I am sure we will have in a few years a much more competent and happier civil service.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Chairman, after listening to the hon. Minister last night, I was almost convinced that the civil servants of Ontario were the happiest group of people we could find any place around the whole wide world, and that they were the best treated people anywhere, at least on this continent if not elsewhere.

I do agree with the hon. Provincial Treasurer that much progress has been made over the last few years, a progress in such things as the treatment of casuals and overtime arrangements, in classification, in other fields. However, when I look at the situation and as I look over my files, I am not quite convinced that things are quite as rosy as he painted them to us and to this House last night.

I would also say to my hon. friend who has just completed his speech that he should—I think he said a great deal of research had gone into this and certainly a great deal of work had gone into his speech—but I think he should fire his researcher because the document he read into the record is a document which I almost threw into the wastepaper basket last night. I think it was one that he mentioned to me and did not tell me what it was and said that he was having it looked over; I did not realize at that time what the document was. But it is a document which is dated April 23, 1964, and it was the basis of my Budget speech last year so I am fairly familiar with it. I read large sections of it into the record at that time, so that I would say to him, he had better talk to his research people and tell them to get his documents up to date in this respect. But I suppose that may be par for the course, I do not know.

An hon. member: I think it is pretty well up to date.

Mr. Young: Well, the reason I did not throw it into the wastepaper basket, I will say to my hon. friend, is that I decided I had better keep it because there is a lot of it which is pretty pertinent today. I thought for background purposes it might be a valuable bit of information. I just say that so the hon. Provincial Treasurer will not have to tell you later on, because I saw him writing furiously when you started to read this and I presume he was perfectly aware of this, as he must have been.

I do want to say this, Mr. Chairman, that in speaking of the civil service this afternoon, I think we should establish the fact first of all that Ontario, I think by and large, has a pretty dedicated group of civil servants. Otherwise they would not be working for such pay as they are working. They are, by and large, good people and in many cases I think the quality could be improved if we had better salaries and better conditions. But I think, too, that we should establish this fact, that civil servants are just as important to any civilization as the employees of private corporations or individuals.

Now, we have been inclined over the years to think of civil servants as "those bureaucrats," and say, "Oh, well, if they are civil servants they don't work as hard as people in private industry, and they don't produce as much" but my experience with civil service in the municipal field and the province, for quite a number of years now, is that the people who work in the public service are as efficient as, if not more efficient than, the people who work in the private sector of the economy. And I want to register that today because I will have some criticism here. I want it thoroughly understood, that as far as I am concerned, this is an essential part of our civilization and these people deserve better, both in public attitude and in public remuneration, than they are now getting.

It is not long—just a week or two ago—since a group of men appeared in front of the Parliament buildings. I got from them a leaflet which I have here and which I am not going to read into the record in total. They were men from Oak Ridge hospital at Penetanguishene. These men had come to protest their salary situation in the institution there. They point this out in their leaflet that "At Oak Ridge at the present time the patients are made up mainly of capital cases from the courts, penitentiaries, reformatories and county jails and of other unmanageable patients from other Ontario hospitals. We also care for federal prisoners waiting to be deported."

Now, these men have not only the job of guarding these almost incorrigible patients sent to them from other institutions—because they are incorrigible—but they also are expected as far as possible to do a therapeutic job wherever there is a chance of redemption, to work with these people and restore them if it is humanly possible, in co-operation with the specialists there, to their place in society.

And yet these men have a starting salary of, I think it is, $3,020 per year. That is a great deal lower than the starting salary even in the institutions over which the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions (Mr. Grossman)—who has just come in—has supervision. In comparison to the salaries which are paid there, these salaries are bad, even though the other salaries are very, very inadequate.

I bring this to the attention of the hon. Provincial Treasurer because there is no question that there is a great deal of dissatisfaction there, dissatisfaction to the extent that these men saw fit to come from Penetanguishene to march and to protest to the government about their situation.

It is not long since I had the privilege of visiting a group of people in the Whitby hospital. There are attendants there who have a very serious grievance and I heard via the Hamilton Spectator today that these people and others are also contemplating action as taken by the Penetang people recently. In the Whitby hospital the minimum salary there is $3,000 for attendants. Some domestic staff start at $2,600. Out of the $3,000 an employee must pay six per cent to his pension plan. There are some changes now being made in the total fringe benefits and I am not going to elaborate on this. But there is a maximum of $3,900 after seven years service and I understand that the complete maximum in that institution is $4,400, about $85 a week.

I met people there with 25 and 30 years service who are now in the supervisory capacity, who are helping to supervise five, six, seven, eight people, at the same time looking after their quota of patients which may run up to 70 or more. And these people are on an $85 maximum. These people have certain qualifications that have to be met. They take a two-year instruction course, that is, an in-service instruction course which includes psychiatry, psychology, bedside nursing, anatomy, first aid and a further examination after five years of service.

There is no risk pay whatsoever, no shift differential, no remuneration for working weekends, and they say that they practise psychology and psychiatry at the moment they go on duty until their tour of duty is finished for the day. I presume it is a limited type of psychology and psychiatry, but it is the treatment which patients receive at the hands of the attendants whom they see hour after hour and day after day. The doctors depend upon these people for observations, regarding the type of treatment and medication for the patients allotted to their care. They are responsible for the administration of medication to the patients, Mr. Chairman.

A daily report of the progress of the patient has to be made, his actions and his reactions, so they must know something of what they are doing. A full bi-monthly report on the patients, their responses, habits, activities, reactions, eating habits and sleeping habits. The doctor really depends on their observations and notes as to whether a patient is ready to be discharged, probated or boarded out. And so the story goes.

In industry, a man with training for a job as foreman or the responsibilities that the supervisors have here would certainly get a good salary. But here again you have a salary which is $4,400 per year, less than $85 per week. I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that this is a disgraceful situation in an institution such as Whitby. I have other communications from other institutions of this kind in other parts of the province where the similar salary scales are now being paid. The day is here when something must be done about this situation.

I have some pay slips here, a pay slip for a man who has been eight years in the government service in Whitby. He is paid every two weeks and he gets take-home pay, after his deductions, of $108.95. One hundred and nine dollars for two weeks, upon which he is expected to raise his family. Now this is a disgraceful situation, I repeat, Mr. Chairman, and one which should not be tolerated.

I have also a copy of the letter which has been sent to the hon. Minister of Health, a letter from an immigrant. He thanks Dr. Dymond for the job he got in the Ontario hospital in Whitby some time ago and he felt grateful for that, but:

I beg of you not to feel that I am any the less grateful for my work, my job, because of what I feel I must say. It is simply this. As a frugal, hardworking new Canadian—my wife and I immigrated to Canada from Holland five years ago—I find to my horror that I am unable to live on my salary without undergoing the humility of asking my church for financial help. In fact, I have found it urgently necessary three times this winter alone to seek out my pastor and beg him to come to my rescue. Each time, thank heaven, he has given the aid.

The point is this, sir, after starting at a salary of $2,760 yearly four years ago, I have worked hard to gain increases in pay. Three and a half years ago, September 1961, I obtained my diploma for Grade two attendant. My gross salary is now approximately $3,200 a year. I have four children, age 13, ten, eight and two.

In September 1963, I bought my own home after a succession of moves, because landlords objected to the children. Today the payments on my home are approximately equal to my former rent.

The salary of $3,200 per annum sounds quite generous for my work, but in reality

I assure you it is not. Although my wife and I budget our funds to a fraction of a cent, and deny ourselves and our children even a vestige of the smallest of luxuries, we simply cannot get by. In the last three years there has not been one single article of new clothing in our home. All of our garments are purchased in second-hand stores.

I know, sir, that this sounds just like another hard luck story, but it is more than that. I know I speak not only for myself. There are others like me, in similar circumstances, with exactly the same problem, and the problem is this. Surely it could be expected that an employer would pay his workers enough to live on, and I would think this truism should surely apply when the employer happens to be the government itself.

Finally, what I have to say, sir, is something I hesitate to write. I am afraid it may look strange, exaggerated on paper. Nevertheless, I will put it down, because it is honest and true. One of my fondest wishes is that I shall soon become a Canadian citizen. I tell you truthfully, however, when I say that even though the expense for my citizenship is very minute, I simply, even though I work for the province of Ontario, cannot afford it. Wishing to have a vote, but cannot afford it, faithfully.

This is a letter which is typical of some of the situations in which many of our people find themselves, and having talked to this person and others, I realize that this is not an exaggeration. They are having a tough time. You might say they should budget a little more carefully and closely, but I ask the hon. Minister how many of us could possibly get along with that kind of a family, on that kind of money.

I noticed that the hon. Minister of Health was quoted in the local paper, the Oshawa paper, as saying that, "many hospital employees might well find difficulty in competing in the general labour market, although they are well fitted to do the work they presently do. It is interesting to note that rarely do we have many vacancies on the staff."

This may be true. I do not know what qualifications there are for those people who are now applying, but certainly the good doctor should realize that the quality of people demanded in these kind of institutions should be equal, at least, to the quality of men we demand running our machines in our factories.

The men in General Motors who run a punch press, or do any of those intricate bits of push-button operations, these men demand certain skills. But the men who have to deal with human beings, who are in day-to-day contact with patients who are mentally ill, these people it seems to me demand greater skills than the industrial worker, because they are dealing with much more intricate machinery. And their job, in co-operation with the specialist, is to restore to sanity and to health the people who are committed to their care. I think it ill-behooves an hon. Minister of the Crown to downgrade these people by saying that they would have a tough time to find employment in industry. If so, then the quality of the employees of which the hon. Minister speaks must indeed be lower than it ought to be in this province.

This morning's newspaper brought us another illustration of the same kind of thing. When Dr. Shulman, that thorn in the flesh of certain of the establishment, was conducting an inquest into the death of a mental patient at 999 Queen Street West, he found the hospital attendants painted a confused picture of how information on a patient was passed from one shift to another. "This lack of communication"—and I am reading now from the Toronto Telegram of May 19:

This lack of communication was blamed partially on what Metro chief coroner Dr. Morton Shulman called the ridiculous salaries paid to attendants. He said an official of the Ontario civil service commission might be called when the inquest reconvened on May 25 to explain the salaries.

James Armstrong, assistant chief male attendant, said part of the poor communications was due to lack of staff. The staff we get won't stay because of the poor money, he said.

Commented Dr. Shulman: "I'm not surprised you don't get many people looking for work there when the starting salary is $57 a week."

And added to this is the Toronto Star's story this morning which says:

James Armstrong, assistant chief male attendant, said the hospital had been understaffed for months because they just do not pay enough to attract anyone. Attendants start at $3,000 a year and work up to $3,900.

Why, that is only $57 a week to start, said Dr. Shulman, I am surprised you can get anyone to work for that.

Chief male attendant John Boyd said the civil service association had tried to get the civil service commission to raise the wages, but they would not do it.

I would like to have someone here who can speak for the commission and explain just why these salaries are so low, Dr. Shulman said.

Evidently, according to the other paper, he may call one of the members to make that explanation.

Now all this, Mr. Chairman, is simply an outgrowth of the government's refusal to face up to the fact of twentieth-century employer-employee relations. The hon. member for Ottawa East this afternoon gave something of the background of negotiations, and the appointment of the joint council—the negotiations that took place over a year ago in this field. Since that time, there has been a struggle between the government and the civil service to get action on achieving their first contract, a contract which dates back to 1962.

During this period of struggle, the government time after time has acted in bad faith by taking action unilaterally. Something was under discussion, various matters were under negotiation at the joint council level, at committee levels, and yet the government would issue directives and send out its pronouncements in various regards.

The Toronto Star, January 9, 1965, said this:

The last chapter in the association's eight-year fight for a welfare package for the government's 40,000 association employees resulted in a charge that the government wrote a letter undercutting the association. The government's letter, put in the employees' pay envelopes, contained omissions, distortions, inaccuracies, the association says.

This is one part of the editorial. It goes on to talk about this, and I have several instances here of that kind of thing going on.

I think all of us have been acquainted with the situation of the cleaning women in this building, and I am not going to go into that in detail here. I talked some time ago of the transfer tax auditors and their problem, and about the cleaning women and these other people. During negotiations the government arbitrarily makes decisions, sets salaries, revises salaries again, and sets them again, without finalization of negotiations with the civil service association.

On February 18, 1965, the civil service association of Ontario again protested to the hon. Prime Minister about the arbitrary and unilateral actions of government on rates of pay and working conditions of public servants. Following strong protests arising from an emergency meeting of the association, held in Toronto in May 1964, the government appointed a chief negotiator and so on. In spite of this the Ontario government continues to negate the principles of negotiation by refusing to negotiate on any changes they wish to make, while requiring the association to follow all the procedures for any changes the association thinks desirable.

A letter to the hon. Prime Minister, a copy of which I have here, reads:

Unfortunately, the official side of joint council is not used by government or the appointees of government and we are still faced with the fact that changes and working conditions affecting public servants are made arbitrarily and without attempt at negotiation.

The position at the moment is that the association is forced to negotiate through joint council in the first instance through the appropriate authorities, while the management levels of government and government itself are able to completely disregard the joint council and implement changes in working conditions, remuneration, leaves and hours of work without any regard for negotiations.

We believe [they say] that the present Act can be sufficient if there is a clear understanding that the Crown considers itself bound, if not legally at least morally, to negotiate any change in rates of pay and general working conditions.

Accordingly we request a statement from you—this is to the hon. Prime Minister:

—to the effect that government and its appointed officers will not arbitrarily change rates of pay or working conditions, but that where the government or its appointed officers consider the changes may be desirable a proper submission will be made to the association for negotiation and, if necessary, for arbitration.

And we have this report No. 106 from the association:

At the regular meeting of the Ontario joint council on March 18, 1965, the association representatives advised council that there were a number of salary matters to be negotiated and it was agreed that a steering committee should be held to deal with these matters. The steering committee met and considered the matters and subsequently a special meeting of the Ontario joint council was called on March 26, 1965, with teachers' salaries as the first item on the agenda.

The Department of Civil Service had offered a one-step increase to teachers, and so on.

The association's position was that a two-step increment should be implemented for teachers. The official side stated that they were not in a position to argue factually for or against these recommendations due to a lack of prior investigation. It was requested by the official side that briefs be prepared on this matter by both sides and placed before the next meeting of the Ontario joint council, and subsequently a tabling motion with respect to teachers' salaries was made.

And then, a memorandum was issued to all Deputy Ministers; amendments to classifications and salary schedules not negotiated to agreement and a new salary scale is included and sent out before these negotiations were completed.

It does say that salary adjustments for teachers were under negotiation for some time with the civil service association, but no agreement was reached.

And because the government did not get exactly what it wanted, it took unilateral action, issued this directive and sent it out. I presume that those negotiations will now go on until some satisfactory conclusion is reached, even though the government has taken the action. This is not bargaining in good faith, this is anything but that.

Then report No. 59: The hon. Minister mentions certain things that had been achieved and I said that I gave him credit for these achievements—overtime, standby time, equal treatment for casuals. Agreement was reached in March, 1964. But those agreements, I understand, are not yet in effect in Lands and Forests and some other departments of government even though Highways and some others have brought them into effect. So there has been a year's delay in putting these agreements into effect.

During these negotiations—and certainly I would be the last one to say that two parties to negotiations should not be as tough as they feel they ought to be, but when you get a contract which dates back to 1962, and we are now in 1965, this becomes just a bit ludicrous. But a contract has been hammered out in the meantime since the document which the hon. member for Ottawa East read. A contract was hammered out with certain things which could not be agreed upon. Those matters which were not yet agreed upon were referred to an arbitration board. And there was tough negotiation prior to that. The arbitration board met, conducted its hearings and then brought in its report.

One of the matters with which the two sides dealt and agreed upon was a life insurance package. This was agreed upon and this was not referred to the arbitration board, but when the arbitration award comes in, strangely enough, the very first thing that is mentioned in the arbitration award, and forming part and parcel of a package—$1.60 per employee per month or $19.20 per year—is a group life insurance plan. How that ever could get into this is a question we still do not know. Whether this insurance-minded government had so negotiated and so presented its case, and so insisted that this kind of thing should appear, I do not know. But the arbitration board, which did not even have this under its terms of reference, brought in a recommendation regarding group life insurance.

Then the second matter was the matter of medical-surgical coverage, and in this again the insurance bent is very pronounced. The award: 75 per cent of the cost of a medical insurance plan to the employees, paid by the government; 25 per cent then would come from the employees. But they base their award on the federal government plan which is a co-insurance feature, something like $50 deductible per family and 20 per cent of all medical bills after that paid by the insured person. Now, these were the terms of the award, it is tied right in with the federal plan. It is designed to show the employee that if he accepts this, then $61.45 of the plan will be paid by the provincial government.

Then it says this:

Any change in premiums made necessary by increased or decreased costs, resulting from experience, shall accrue to the government and employees in the proportion of 75 per cent and 25 per cent respectively.

And, of course, it also says that:

—the staff and official side of the joint council will determine the type of insured plan which will be most satisfactory to the employee within the cost framework as set out above, without delay.

But the strange thing with this tremendous stress upon the insurance, the co-insurance, the life insurance, is that it was eight days—this was tabled in the House on March 1—eight days before this that a syndicate of life insurance companies, headed by London Life, invited representatives of government and the association down to London to hear a proposal. The proposal that they made at that time was that they could provide a plan like the federal plan, which is outlined in this arbitration award for X number of dollars.

They urged upon them that this plan could be accepted. This was six days before the arbitration award was signed and eight days before it was tabled in this House. Now, ordinarily an arbitration award is a private document until it becomes the property of the people concerned, and I presume this was and I am making no charges here. I presume that the London Life and the insurance syndicate, knowing what happened were just good business people and so they were being fore-handed and were offering this package to the civil servants and to the government prior to the tabling of this report. But the question that is bound to emerge in our mind is how it was, that eight days before this was tabled, that kind of offer was made to the civil servants of this province.

Mr. J. H. White (London South): You fellows think everybody is crooked except yourselves.

Mr. Young: I asked how it could happen, that is all.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Young: I am bringing the facts before the hon. Minister; you can have your say later on.

Since that time there has been a desperate struggle between the association and the government representatives in respect to this medical-surgical plan. The government, insisting on its side, that this kind of a plan run by the private insurance companies should go out to tender, and should be the plan that is carried and, on the other hand, the association has had PSI for a great many years. As a matter of fact, I understand that the employees of this government—or of this province—many years ago were pioneers in this field. I think it was the associated medical service that grew out of the action of what is now the civil service association of this province, so they have had a long history in that kind of cost insurance.

They had a contract with PSI, a contract which has been worked out over the years and which has worked very successfully; it pays up to the standard payment of PSI. The employees have been paying for it, having it deducted from their pay. It was then forwarded to PSI.

The staff wanted to keep that plan; they were satisfied with it and they wanted these costs which were awarded here to be prorated against a PSI plan, or at least they wanted a plan that covered them as well as PSI covered them, to go out to tender and let all bid.

After almost three months, and after a great deal of scrapping and a heart-rending struggle, that has been finally agreed to and the matter has gone out to tender, but with a combined life insurance and medical-surgical tender. What will come out of that? We do not yet know, but that is the situation at the present time, and these are the negotiations, I understand, unless the hon. Minister has something more recent than I am aware of.

But more than that. While these negotiations are going on, we find something else. After the hon. Minister had made his statement to the House, his statement went out to all the civil servants in the association. That statement was a reasonable and rational one—the statement he made here—but it would seem that when the civil servant read it, he thought this was the decision. I almost understood from the hon. Minister last night that these decisions were pretty well final for a long time to come, but there are others yet to be made. But because this was sent out, there was a great deal of consternation in the association. The civil servants asked if this meant that their PSI ends; did it mean that the things being asked for in their negotiations they were not going to get? And so the associations sent out, to counteract the action of government, their activity report No. 104, in which they said this:

A number of circular releases have been made by the civil service commission or departments of government. In addition, there have been references to the award in the press. Unfortunately, these releases, because they are not fully authentic, have caused considerable confusion among our members. At the time of release of this activity report, there had been no agreement on a medical-surgical plan, and any release from any source, indicating what type of plan will be instituted, is absolutely unreliable.

The association policy is, and always has been, that any such medical-surgical plan must be a PSI blue plan or a plan having the same general benefits. The association has again informed government representatives of this policy and are still awaiting their reply.

The initial plan proposed by government has been rejected by the association. When a plan has been agreed upon, the association will issue its own reliable release. Until then, members are asked to govern themselves accordingly in their assessment of releases from other sources.

The attitude of the association is a very simple one. If information had been sent out to their membership, it should have been a joint release, since there was a joint council dealing with this matter. A unilateral release of this kind, which only confused the membership, should not have been sent out.

The hon. Minister has his own point of view on this, but I present this as what I consider to be a logical one.

Now there is one further matter which is before the hon. Minister; that is the matter of negotiations of institutional service groups. I have already mentioned these, and in dealing with institutional service groups, the association brought to the hon. Minister certain facts. This group is now due for renegotiation of salaries—April 1, 1965, I understand. This is reading from the civil service activity report, No. 107:

Although the cycle review dates were established after much consideration to obviate the necessity of retroactive adjustments, April 1, 1965, arrived without any submissions from the commission on the institutional classes. The association accordingly presented its salary demands. After some delay, we received a letter stating in part:

"I am unable to negotiate on your submission which, in the opinion of the commission, does not comply with the basic policy agreed upon for research, whereby comparisons are made between jobs with light duties and responsibilities."

The association goes ahead to do a very significant thing. In the arbitration award the government had quoted certain companies—30, I think it was, when it appeared—in regard to fringe benefits. Quoting those companies, it showed that, basing its case upon those companies, certain fringe benefits should accrue, and only those fringe benefits should accrue to the employees in the civil service. The association took those 30 companies, and, dealing with the rates of pay, again quoting:

For institutional classes our approach is very simple and very reasonable. The proposed rates are based upon the clear reasoning that you cannot logically pay an employee concerned with the care and rehabilitation of the unfortunates admitted to institutions a rate of pay less than is paid to labourers. To establish the average rate of pay for labourers, we used the list of firms chosen by government in their research on fringe benefits and which formed a basis of the government presentation to the arbitration board. We could have chosen a different area of research and arrived at a higher average rate for labourers. Our present demands are very reasonable and do not go as far as they should, perhaps. We can understand that the commission would be somewhat shocked on receiving our salary demands, because by and large it is asking for a $1,000 increase across the board. It is quite obvious that the commission is still engaged with the old theory of one or two set increases. Since the commission refuses to negotiate demands, it will now be placed before the Ontario joint council.

And so they work out their case based on the government's own submission before the arbitration board and they point out that they are asking for average labourer rates in these companies which were quoted by the government. They ask that these rates be paid to the employees in the institutions.

At least this would seem to be a reasonable demand, Mr. Chairman and Mr. Minister, and if this government is going to stop there and base its rates of pay for people who are dealing with the sick and the mentally ill, upon labour rates which are prevailing in private corporations, then I think they are stopping far short of what the need is; far short of the need which could be clearly established, to first of all get, and then to hold, the calibre of people that are needed in these institutions.

The hon. Provincial Treasurer made a great deal last night of morale in the institution. I quote to him again from the Civil Service, the last edition which I mentioned in the House some time ago; they point out:

The record will show that a considerable number of gratifying increases have been given to a large number of employees. The record will show that gains have been made in such areas as overtime pay, layoff and recall procedures—

I mentioned that, and also mentioned some of the delay of putting these into effect:

—and other working conditions of importance to all employees. On record it will be expected that the employees of the Ontario government would feel rather good, and be inclined to give credit to the association for its many successes. Unfortunately, any good feeling which is initiated by any improvement in rates of pay or working conditions, is soon destroyed by the many long unexplained and, therefore, unjustified delays in implementing the things achieved.

In place of a good feeling, there is frustration; in place of gratitude there is bitterness. It is a fact that many increases announced months ago—some effective as far back as September 1, 1962—have not yet appeared on the employee's pay cheque.

I understand many of those have appeared since this was written, but there is still delay in getting many of these matters settled and cleared away.

So we ask the hon. Provincial Treasurer to give very serious consideration to a speed-up in the procedures. I also call to his attention the fact which I mentioned in another connection some time ago, that the Civil Service report states that in 1963, 3,325 people resigned from the service. Better pay in other jobs headed the reason for the resignations. But the most disturbing feature in all this is that the age group from 21 to 31 years accounted for 27.7 per cent of all separations.

This would seem to indicate that too many young people are not satisfied with the opportunities in the service, and are leaving for better paying jobs. The government cannot afford to bring young people into the civil service, young people who come with some sense of idealism. Many people come feeling that they can do a real job for the public, through the civil service, and yet find themselves frustrated by lack of adequate pay. They see ahead of them a future which is not as rosy as they had thought, and gradually begin to look for other jobs.

I know that turnover is normal in any industry, or in any civil service, but the figures we have brought this afternoon, the information that I have laid before the hon. Provincial Treasurer, must cause him concern, and perhaps has caused him concern in the past.

Let that concern be translated into action, so that this province is not in the position of being a pinch-penny employer; so that it pays its people adequate salaries and adequate wages; so this province can hold up its head among other employers and can say, "Not only do we pay the kind of wage scale and the kind of salary scale we ought to be paying, but our negotiations are in good faith."

Three years, almost four, is too long for a contract to be hammered out. Stop taking unilateral action right along the line.

I know this government established its symbol some years ago when they put up the billboard of the hippopotamus, and perhaps that symbol is still pertinent when it comes to this matter of negotiation and treatment of the civil servants, it is a slow, lumbering animal. We hope that it is not going to stay. We hope that this series of negotiations is now close to an end, that is the 1962 series. We hope that this new series dealing with the institutions can be quickly disposed of, and we hope that in the future this province will emerge as an employer which deals fairly, and quickly, with its civil service.

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer): Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I might ask the hon. member a question before proceeding to answer some of the statements that have been made.

I was disturbed by the impression that the hon. member seemed to desire to indicate that Judge Anderson and his board of arbitration were influenced by the government in the decision that they were going to give. Was that your contention?

Mr. Young: That is not what I said. I asked you a question.

Hon. Mr. Allan: But you indicated that, did you not?

Mr. Young: I asked you the question.

Hon. Mr. Allan: No, no, you did not ask me.

Mr. Young: I pointed out the sequence of facts; that eight days prior to your tabling of this, invitations were issued to a meeting in London; that figures were given on a contract similar to the one which is mentioned in the arbitration award; and I asked the hon. Provincial Treasurer how this could be.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Well, Mr. Chairman, I can very well answer that. I know nothing about any meeting in London. I knew nothing about the offer that was made by the insurance companies, if such was made. If it was, it was made on a basis of speculation by the companies—

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Were there not two Treasury officials of the government who went down?

Hon. Mr. Allan: I do not know whether there was or not. Certainly there was nothing official. There were no arrangements with any insurance companies. How could you make arrangements with insurance companies when you did not know what the award was?

Mr. MacDonald: That is what we are asking.

Hon. Mr. Allan: There was no arrangement. I say that, and I expect it to be believed.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, two officials of your department invited the civil service association to go along with them.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I do not know whether anyone went down or not. I have nothing to do with what certain insurance companies may try to sell. But I have something to do with the buying, and I know perfectly well that there was no arrangement.

Now, Mr. Chairman, about the other thing, just as a basis of understanding. Can anyone say that the award of an arbitration board is a unilateral decision? Can I ask you that question?

Mr. Young: You are supposed to be answering.

Hon. Mr. Allan: No! I want to get a basis of understanding before I begin to answer them, and I understood the hon. member for Yorkview to say that the award was a unilateral decision.

Mr. Young: The award?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Of the arbitration board, referring to—

Mr. Young: No, I was not speaking of the arbitration award. I said that you had, time after time, made unilateral decisions. You sent out the memorandum regarding the teachers.

Hon. Mr. Allan: No, you referred to them together.

Mr. Young: No, I did not say the arbitration award. The arbitration award was an award of the arbitration board.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Well, what is an arbitration award? Is that not an award? Is that not an answer to the negotiations?

Mr. Young: The arbitration award is the award of a board—

Hon. Mr. Allan: Can you not see that—

Mr. Young: The arbitration award is the award of a board set up to do that job, and then after that, the two sides decide what they are going to do with it.

Hon. Mr. Allan: And both sides are expected to accept the award, and live up to it.

Mr. Young: They did not decide to—

Hon. Mr. Allan: No, but is not that a reasonable statement?

Mr. Young: Both sides?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Yes.

Mr. Young: Have to accept it?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Certainly!

Mr. Young: Oh, no. No arbitration award like this is ever fully accepted. It does not have to be.

Hon. Mr. Allan: What? An arbitration award that accepted this is the basis of our negotiations.

Mr. Young: But in this case the arbitration board did not lay down the kind of plan; they said the two had to get together to work it out. It left an open end there.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): You are trying to wiggle out.

Mr. Young: An open end whereby the insurance companies were able to pressure—

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, the award was based on an amount of money.

Mr. MacDonald: Right!

Mr. Young: That is right. Mr. Chairman, could I say this to the hon. Minister? The arbitration award first of all dealt with a matter—

Hon. Mr. Allan: No, anyone.

Mr. MacDonald: How can it be binding when it only indicated an amount which could be spent—in varying ways which would have to be negotiated?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Oh, it is not in a package! It is in a package, but they can get that—

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, could I simply point out that the arbitration award could not be binding, because it first of all referred to a matter already settled, the life insurance business—

Hon. Mr. Allan: I will refer to that.

Mr. Young: —was knocked out and they awarded $19 and some odd cents—20 cents in that case—so that was out, it was wrong. The second was tied into a federal plan and they said that the two had to get together. This could not be binding.

Hon. Mr. Allan: It certainly was binding. The basis of our whole association proceedings is that if agreement is not reached you go to the board of arbitration and the award of the board of arbitration is binding.

Mr. Young: Well, they better deal with the matters that are referred to them then.

Mr. MacDonald: They dealt with life insurance that was not referred to them.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Why did the representative of the staff sign the award?

Mr. MacDonald: They certainly are not happy with it at the present time.

Mr. Young: Could I ask the hon. Minister if it is not true that the reference to life insurance was knocked out afterwards, because they said—

Hon. Mr. Allan: Go to arbitration, then you better accept the award, had we not?

Mr. MacDonald: What about the question the hon. member for Yorkview asks you now?

Hon. Mr. Allan: What was that?

Mr. Young: The question was: Is it not true that the reference to life insurance was knocked out of the award afterwards because this was not referred to the board?

Hon. Mr. Allan: No. The board of arbitration said they presented their side of the case. The board of arbitration endeavoured to develop a package that would receive the unanimous support of all the members of the board.

Mr. Young: But the life insurance in fact had already been settled.

Hon. Mr. Allan: But they agreed to the package and certainly you cannot say that the government had anything to do with the award. The judge and his two members of the board, the representative of the government and the representative of the civil service association, agreed they would change that life insurance. They did and they brought in an award and the award determined a certain amount of money, five dollars—

Mr. Young: It was $19.20 a year, life insurance.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I have not the figures, but they agreed.

Then it came to a question of deciding what sort of medical insurance they should have. It was the opinion of the government representative that the award was not high enough to provide the coverage that the civil servants had had before. They said, we will call for alternate plans. If you can get a contract that will supply the same service as you had before; fine, that suits us, we will be entirely in agreement. But we ask for alternate things: One for the whole package; one for the proposal that had been developed, with supplementary coverage which would have given the civil servants the same coverage that most of them had before.

The representatives of the association would not accept that. Now we are so stubborn, as you indicate, we sat with them first of all in the discussions. They walked out of the joint council and there were no joint council meetings. You are saying that we have delayed this thing. They walked out of the joint council and there were no joint council meetings for three or four weeks.

Finally, in an endeavour to try—and let me say at the very beginning that we do not want to fight with civil servants or the civil service association.

Mr. Bryden: You could fool most people on that.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I tell you that, and I say so sincerely. I will tell you that I have the greatest respect for the civil servants that serve this government; and they are not, as a group, as dissatisfied as you indicate. Any frustration that I have seen has been at the level of the persons who prepared the material that you two hon. members have been reading this afternoon.

Mr. Bryden: Do you have respect for their association?

Mr. MacDonald: These are the people who have been elected by the association.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I have the greatest respect for their association and I am particularly anxious to see the association successful in what they are trying to undertake.

Mr. Bryden: Well, why do you keep running behind their backs?

Hon. Mr. Allan: I am not running behind their backs.

Mr. Bryden: Well, your representatives are. It is right here in this circular signed by Mr. McNab.

Hon. Mr. Allan: We do no such thing. You make allegations that are incorrect. Why do you not make sure that the things you say are correct?

Mr. Bryden: Well, this is correct. Are you accusing me of lying?

Hon. Mr. Allan: No, I can stand here—

Mr. Bryden: Here is the evidence of it right here.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I do not care what evidence you have.

Mr. Bryden: You mean you do not care about that.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I stand here today and I say that we, and I speak of the government, are doing everything possible to try to make this thing work.

Mr. Bryden: It is running behind the back of the association.

Hon. Mr. Allan: We are not running behind the back—

Mr. Bryden: Well, here is the evidence, right here.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I do not care what you have.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): What do you want us to do?

Mr. Bryden: Are you doing your red herring job again?

Hon. Mr. Allan: To get back to the matter of negotiations and this insurance plan. I think that someone was inexperienced, and perhaps if they had been more experienced they would have realized that negotiations have to be done at the negotiation level.

Now, it is all very easy to say let us let the thing go to arbitration, but mind you, you cannot negotiate at arbitration. I have no doubt that in all probability a health plan could have been worked out that would have suited everyone if there had been an effort to develop it at the negotiation level; but no, we say we go to arbitration. Well, then, when you go to arbitration you accept the award of the arbitration board.

But I am particularly concerned because I realize that the civil service association have been losing some members, and I am sorry about this. I want to see the civil service association accepted. I want to see them serve their people. We want to sit down and negotiate with them in good faith.

We go into negotiations the other day on these institutional branches. They were as far apart as the poles. What happens? We go to arbitration.

You mentioned the teachers. You see, it is so easy to be misinformed. The teachers have gone to arbitration and without prejudice, to try to keep the teachers a little bit happy—because this going to arbitration delays everything—without prejudice, we gave them a one-step increase.

Now, is that unilateral bureaucracy? Is that an indication that we do not want to try to get along and work with the civil service? We do. We want the civil service association to be successful in what they are undertaking now and we are just sorry that some of the advice they have been getting, and I say this without any disrespect to the hon. members, but I am not happy to see matters that are being discussed and negotiated at the management and staff level become a political football of any party.

Mr. Bryden: The reason they do is because you people are not doing your jobs, that is why.

Mr. MacDonald: Any employer who takes three years to negotiate a contract—

Hon. Mr. Allan: How can anyone say, Mr. Chairman, that it takes three years? Negotiations did not begin until a year ago. In fact, I am not sure that they have begun.

How can you say that it takes three years? You get half-truths. The matter of the clerk was mentioned here today and it was time for the cyclical review at this time. The cyclical review—two years from the time of the last one—will be next January.

At the time of the last one pay increases were paid retroactively that amounted to $600 to some of those people. The date of the decision was a year ago last December, and two years from that time will be next December.

How can you say that is three years? I would not be so certain that I am correct in this if it was not that I had a great ambition that this plan was going to be a wonderful thing for the civil servants. You speak about a unilateral decision—

Mr. MacDonald: That is what they say.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I know they do say that.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, do not blame us.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I am not blaming you and I do not think you would believe it if you understood. Here is the position as it exists today. They do not have to accept the salary that we propose. How many governments in this country have placed themselves in a position where they will accept an award of an arbitration board covering salaries? Will the federal government do that? Name me another government in Canada that put itself in that position. We want to be fair—

Mr. MacDonald: Some of them are miles ahead of you.

Hon. Mr. Allan: They are not—

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I will tell you this to show you that I am very fond of some of the people in Saskatchewan. We have some excellent persons on our staff who came from Saskatchewan and they are happy with us.

Mr. MacDonald: They could not live with the Liberals there.

Hon. Mr. Allan: We have quite a number who have come from Saskatchewan.

Mr. Bryden: We will admit that you are easier to get along with than the Liberals.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Practically every one that we have had has been an excellent person.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I might deal with some of the statements that were made, but I did want to establish the fact that we as a government are doing our utmost to make this plan work.

Mr. MacDonald: You will have to convince the civil servants. We are not the people to convince.

Hon. Mr. Allan: As a matter of fact, we do not have much trouble convincing the civil servants, but we do have a little trouble convincing some of the officers of the civil service association—

Mr. MacDonald: That is an old tactic—

Hon. Mr. Allan: No, I would be very happy to have you know everything we are doing and I know perfectly well that the hon. member for York South would say that we are doing a good job and it is because we are trying to do a good job.

The hon. member for Yorkview mentioned the letter that we sent out. Now one of the things to which I would certainly object and not support, is anything that would stir up enmity in the minds of those people we are going to deal with.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, it did.

Mr. Bryden: You have done it.

Hon. Mr. Allan: It did because the civil service association took exception to it. The people who got the letters were not concerned.

Mr. Bryden: You try to drive a wedge between the people and their representatives; this is the oldest employer's manoeuvre.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Let me say this; what would you think about it if we had sent out the type of circulars that have been read in the House this afternoon? If we, as a government, sent out things that were as irresponsible as those?

Mr. Bryden: You should be responsible in regard to the association and not go behind their backs.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Ottawa East must be a friend of civil servants. The very fact that he is here indicates that he is, and I may say that I do not differ with him in that respect at all. I try to be a friend of the civil service just as you are.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): The Tory he beat was not a friend of the civil service.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I do not know whether he was or not.

Mr. Sopha: It follows, from your argument—

Hon. Mr. Allan: I agree with the hon. member when he says that negotiation should be carried out in good faith and it pains me and I feel very badly that we are settling practically nothing at the negotiation level. To me that is very unhealthy—

Mr. R. Gisborn (Wentworth East): There is only one reason; there is not enough money there.

Hon. Mr. Allan: No, that is not so. We should have settled this fringe benefits affair and everyone would have been just as well off if we had negotiated the thing and come up with a package that the civil servants would have liked; we could have done that at the negotiating level; it would have been no—

Mr. Bryden: You mean if they just take what you want, everything will be fine—

Hon. Mr. Allan: No; that is an unreasonable statement.

Mr. Bryden: It is not an unreasonable statement.

Mr. MacDonald: Why do they not accept your statement then?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Because they would not negotiate; we could not move. Before the award we could have negotiated, but how could we negotiate it after the award had been made?

I think I should say this: that mention was made of some delays as soon as this practice was brought into effect, and I would be quite frank to say that there was inexperience on both sides and we were not getting along as well as we should have been getting along. As you know, we were endeavouring to develop this plan on the Whitley system, which has worked so well in Britain; so we went to Britain and we spent three days with the British people there. The one thing we learned and the message we brought back—and I conveyed this message to the head of the civil service association—was that there was absolute confidence and good faith between management and staff—

Mr. Young: Did the head of the civil service association go with you to examine this plan in Britain—

Hon. Mr. Allan: No, he did not go, but we would have been very glad to take him. We went to work with him, not against him. We went over and we came back and we tried to convey what we had learned to them, and I thought we had. We obtained staff that were experienced in this area and we began. Unfortunately, I do not think that we could be pleased with the experience of the negotiations, due to the fact that we did not settle anything at the negotiation stage, and I think this is a sad state of affairs, and I have spoken with—

Mr. MacDonald: Whose fault is it?

Hon. Mr. Allan: I am not going to say; I am not going to stand up here today and say anything that will make the members of the civil service association or the officers any less friendly with me than they are now, because we have always had the friendliest possible relations.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, everybody is a friend of yours, but—

Hon. Mr. Allan: I am not going to get up and say "This is your fault." That is not the way things are settled. I want to get this thing settled so that it works; that is my ambition.

Mr. Young: How can it work if you are paying $1,000 less than a labourer earns?

Hon. Mr. Allan: You have your opinion; unfortunately, neither you nor I will determine what these institutional classes get, and I think when we say, "You have the opportunity of going to a board of arbitration, you present your case, we present ours, an award is made, that is it," now, what is unilateral about that?

Mr. Young: In that case an award will hold.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Well, we will certainly accept—

Mr. Young: Why could you not negotiate?

Hon. Mr. Allan: We are doing exactly what we agreed to do, what the association wanted us to do. But I do not like this way of doing it. With respect to salaries—our salaries cannot be far out of line. Mind you, we have an excellent civil service, the quality of the civil service is continually improving. There is no evidence that I see in any areas where I am, where there is discontent—

Mr. Young: What about Doctor Shulman's statements?

Mr. White: Oh, let the hon. Minister answer the question.

Mr. MacDonald: You do not like Shulman over there?

Hon. Mr. Allan: So, I cannot feel that we are tremendously out of line, and we do not want to be. Mind you, we realize that if we are going to have a good civil service, we are going to have to be competitive in our payment of salaries and we are willing to be competitive in our payment of salaries.

Mr. MacDonald: Competitive! When custodial staff are $1,000 below labour rates!

Hon. Mr. Allan: We do have the responsibility of providing good administration in this government, and that is exactly what we are endeavouring to provide. The mention was made by the hon. member of the provincial police—the civil service association was not permitted to bargain for them. This would have been a great mistake to have attempted it. The provincial police did not want to have anything to do with the civil service association; they wanted to have their own negotiating committee and that is what has happened.

This is another evidence of distorted understanding, perhaps. Mention was made of the editorial that appeared in the Globe and Mail and the terrible salaries that were being offered for certain types of persons who were required in education. The ad was in, the applications had been received. We have had as many applications as one would expect. It has been successful; we have good applications. What is the answer to these questions? Is it someone's opinion, or is it the results that are obtained? It seems to me that it is the results.

I agree with the hon. member when he says that senior officials should be moved around. They are being moved around. If you have any doubts, ask the hon. Minister of Highways (Mr. MacNaughton) how many we have brought down to Treasury from Highways. During the past year we have had 50 competitions for senior staff in the departments to give qualified people throughout the whole of the civil service an opportunity to obtain these better positions—an opportunity to improve their place in the service.

Mention is made of senior officers courses. There is a senior officers course underway at Guelph at the present time. We have a great number of training courses. We have had sales tax staff taking courses at the university and in very large numbers. It would be in the hundreds in the last two years, those endeavouring to improve themselves so that they can earn better salaries.

I thoroughly agree with the hon. member for Yorkview in that, and I have said that we have a dedicated civil service; I agree that they perform good service. I had the opportunity of meeting three of the men who came from the Oak Ridge group. I found them to be very reasonable people. One had the name of Cameron, and I knew right away that you could expect some sense from a man who—

Mr. MacDonald: If he was reasonable and you are reasonable, why cannot you make an agreement?

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. MacDonald: Did he get what he wanted?

Mr. Bryden: They still get the same lousy treatment as they had before—

Hon. Mr. Allan: I can only tell you the complaint that they brought to me.

Mr. MacDonald: What was that?

Hon. Mr. Allan: The complaint was that they were wrongly classified.

Mr. Bryden: Basically, they were not getting enough money.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I am not so unrealistic as to state that if they got the classification they felt they were entitled to, they would get more money. There is nothing wrong with them feeling that way about it.

Mr. Young: But they were refused money.

Hon. Mr. Allan: This was their complaint—that they were doing the work that was comparable to the guards in the reform institutions. They came and spent a half-hour with me; they were very fine fellows. I thought how sound and reasonable they were, because there were a couple of press boys who had waited to get their story on the way out—

An hon. member: They will come to it.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I happened to overhear as they walked out. The boy said: "What have you to say?" He said: "You ask the boss in there."

Mr. MacDonald: Do they think you are reasonable now?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Yes. They must have thought so or they would not have appeared satisfied with my promise. I promised that we would review their classification, and we will.

Mr. Gisborn: Will you change the money alongside the classification?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Let us be a little sensible. I think you want to discuss them on a reasonable and sensible level. They went away, and it was a nice experience for me. Mention was made of the man at Whitby, who had been there five years and was getting $3,240 a year. Of course, I do not know. You see, there is something wrong somewhere.

Mr. Gisborn: I'll say there is.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Anyone who has been in that job and has given satisfactory service is getting more than $3,240 a year after he has been there for five years.

Mr. MacDonald: Wrong classification again.

Hon. Mr. Allan: No, he is not in the wrong classification, but his yearly increment would have brought him up pretty nearly to the $3,900 which is the top of the class in five years in that classification.

I might say to the hon. member, and I do this in a very—

Mr. MacDonald: Kindly way.

Hon. Mr. Allan: —in an effort to be helpful to him—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Be very careful, now.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I had a letter from someone the other day who was in this position complaining about the amount of their take-home pay. So I looked it up and I found out that before the take-home pay was a very substantial payment to the credit union.

Mr. Bryden: So what?

Hon. Mr. Allan: So what? Is that take-home pay?

Mr. Bryden: What has that to do with what we are talking about?

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Just this. You cannot believe everything that people tell you when they talk about take-home pay after they have deducted their savings.

Mr. MacDonald: We have come to that conclusion, after listening to this government, that we cannot believe everything we are told.

Mr. Young: I might say that the take-home pay I quoted—

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Now the other. There is something somewhere that neither of us know, because after five years—

Mr. Young: This is after eight years—$108.95 take-home pay every two weeks.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I would be very glad to get the history of the case. I would like to know, because I want to help you.

Now, the cleaning women. I do not know if you saw the smiles on the cleaning women's faces yesterday or not. I do not think the hon. member for Yorkview will say that this was prearranged, as he said the insurance was prearranged. But every cleaning woman was very happy yesterday—they had a cheque for $250.31 back pay. They are entirely satisfied with the arrangement as it is now.

Mr. Young: No raise.

Mr. Bryden: You mean—

Hon. Mr. Allan: We are looking into the possibility of increasing the hours shortly to give them a greater amount of take-home pay.

Mr. Bryden: Well, is that not nice of you, after you cut them 25 per cent—

Hon. Mr. Allan: The hon. member is trying to get me to say the civil service association brought this on these people. But I am not going to say it, because I want to stay friends with them.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, who is the hon. Minister referring to? Is it me, saying that I am trying to make him say something? I am suggesting that he withdraw that remark. He has no basis for the imputations of motives he has been engaged in all through his speech.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I will tell you. I do not like to discuss in this House salary negotiations between members of the civil service association and ourselves, but this was all discussed. We begged them not to do what they did, but they were determined to do it, with the result as you found it.

Mr. MacDonald: Management always thinks that of their employees.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairmain, I do not know if the two minutes continue past six o'clock, but there certainly is a lot more to be said with regard to some of the matters that have been raised by the hon. Provincial Treasurer. I wish to co-operate in dealing with these matters in an orderly form, and if there is a different vote other than 301 under which some of these matters, such as negotiations of the employer and employees could be raised, I am prepared to deal with them there.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I think that would be best.

Mr. Bryden: Okay. Then there is also the question of the people who are not treated as civil servants or covered by The Civil Service Act. Now, what vote would that come under?

Hon. Mr. Allan: I really do not know what you mean.

Mr. Bryden: Well, your Civil Service Act only applies to some of the people employed by the government—

Hon. Mr. Allan: Well, are you trying—are you talking about casuals, or what?

Mr. Bryden: No, I am talking about employees of such agencies as the water resources commission, the hospital services commission and other Crown agencies—

Hon. Mr. Allan: Crown agencies?

Mr. Bryden: Well, Crown agencies are not all in the same category, but the first vote is the place to deal with this matter because it is bound to have an effect on overall employment conditions in the service.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I do not know what you intend to speak about; the civil service commission does not have any control over the—

Mr. Bryden: I know, and that is what I want to speak about—the fact that they have not, when they should have.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I would expect the proper place to deal with that would have been in the estimates of these various agencies when they were before the House.

Mr. Bryden: We could take them one at a time, but surely it is a matter of total personnel policy—and you can look at it from either point of view. Obviously the people who are covered by The Civil Service Act are affected by the fact that certain other people are not, and the people who are in these agencies are also affected by the fact that they are not covered. Now it seems to me that it is better to deal with all of them in one place rather than take them up as each case comes along.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I am not trying to sidestep anything, Mr. Chairman, but how can I answer for what is being done in the water resources commission?

Mr. Bryden: I do not wish to deal with detailed matters in any of these agencies; I want to deal with the overall matter of policy of the government of having certain people excluded from its general personnel policies. Now it seems to me that, you being the Minister who reports with regard to personnel policies generally, you are the Minister who can answer this.

The fact that the water resources commission or the hospital services commission or any other commission is excluded from the coverage of The Civil Service Act, is a matter of overall government policy. It is not a matter affecting any specific agency.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I find it is difficult for me to answer as to whether this should be done or whether it should not be done. I am the Minister that reports for the civil service.

Mr. Bryden: I am going to suggest to you that the jurisdiction of your civil service commission should be extended.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Chairman, surely if you are going to deal with a question of overall government policy—if we are going to deal with these matters in an orderly fashion—such has its place in the general debates. Here we are dealing with the specific estimates of this department, and that is all we are dealing with. We cannot bring up a question of general policy of the government here if it extends upon the amount of money being asked to be voted—certainly the latitude that is permitted in dealing with estimates is extending—and I might say it is a matter of some concern because it is getting broader with every set of estimates that comes before the House.

I think we are going to have to look at the procedures. There are places in the procedures of the House to put forward any of these ideas, but they cannot be put forward just wherever it suits. There are certain debates called with regularity in this House, which provide for such matters as general government policy with which the Opposition may disagree, and that is where those comments should be made. But they should not be made in the estimates, when the purpose of the estimates, really, is to vote specific sums of money for the administration of the department under review, and the discussions should be limited to where those amounts of money are being spent.

I think my interpretation of the rules of the House is correct. We have allowed latitude here recently that has gone far from the point at issue—we have heard great dissertations upon legal theory that have no more to do with the estimates—

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Oh now, Mr. Chairman!

Hon. Mr. Robarts: We have, and we might just as well bring this matter up right now—

Mr. Singer: The hon. Prime Minister's statement is just not correct. There was not anything that we put before the House that did not relate directly to the votes of The Department of the Attorney General. There is no point in making foolish statements in your own bailiwick about these matters. We intend to continue to examine the estimates exhaustively.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: The hon. member is very sensitive.

Mr. Singer: You are the one who is bringing it up—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: The point I am making is that in conducting the business of the House, we must pay attention to what we are doing in the various items of business before the House. I point out to hon. members that there is, within the accepted procedures of the House, a place for any debate you wish, but it has to be kept, and I think we are going to have to follow the rules a little more closely.

Now, Mr. Chairman, no doubt this will be discussed again before we are finished with this session of the Legislature of Ontario, but in the meantime, I move that the committee rise and report progress, and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report progress and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will proceed with second readings. There are some on the order paper that will not be called. I am referring particularly to the medical services insurance Act, which will be called, as I see it now, on Tuesday of next week. Also there are those introduced by the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Wishart) that are not intended to be called—having to do with the first report of the law reform commission—and there are some others there that have not been on the order paper long enough—for instance, the amendments to The Municipal Act—that will not be called. But the others that have been there for some days will be called; and we will then proceed with the estimates of this department and of Treasury and, following that, The Department of Agriculture.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 6.05 o'clock, p.m.

Presenting reports by committees.

Motions.

Introduction of bills.

THE UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO ACT, 1947

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of University Affairs) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The University of Toronto Act, 1947.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of University Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this Act provides for the repeal of the sections that we discussed in an historical way during the debates on the estimates of The Department of University Affairs. These are the statutory grants going to the University of Toronto and since the university's grants are now considered in total, within the general situation, these two sections are being repealed.

THE YORK UNIVERSITY ACT, 1965

Hon. Mr. Davis moves first reading of bill intituled, The York University Act, 1965.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. members of the House will recall, in 1959 this Legislature passed an Act establishing York University; the institution has operated on the basis of this Act since that time.

The university has grown and developed very substantially, and the need has become evident for some amendments to the Act to take into account the changing circumstances. The bill which is presented here incorporates the changes which the officials of that university feel are required. At the request of the university, this bill is being presented to the Legislature.

LAKEHEAD UNIVERSITY

Hon. Mr. Davis moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act respecting Lakehead University.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, perhaps this bill deserves a slightly longer explanation.

It was in June of 1946 that an order-in-council was passed establishing a provincial technical institute at the Lakehead. The institution was opened in January of 1948, with a programme that was limited to a two-year course in mining technology. Shortly afterwards, further technological courses were added and first-year courses in university programmes were also offered. As the institution grew and developed, it began to take on a new status and in 1956, in recognition of this fact, the Legislature passed an Act changing the name to the Lakehead college of arts, science and technology. Six years later, in 1962, when it became apparent that the college was in a position to offer university programmes through to graduation, an amendment to that Act was passed giving it full degree-granting powers. This year, very recently in fact, the institution graduated its first university class.

It seems clear that if in its size, its programme and its degree-granting powers this institution of higher learning, located in the northwest of this province, is to function as a university, it should have the name, organization and all the rights and privileges that are both consistent with such responsibilities and in keeping with the powers designated to other universities of this province.

The changes have been incorporated, and set out in this Act, and I am happy to present it to the Legislature at this time. This, in essence, puts the Lakehead college on the same footing as the other universities and it will be known in the future as Lakehead University.

Mr. J. P. Spence (Kent East): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I have a question to ask of the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Connell), of which I have already given notice.

The question is as follows: In view of the great interest in southwestern Ontario, would the hon. Minister advise if the police college at Aylmer shown in the work book of The Department of Public Works in 1964-65, and again in 1965-66, will be under construction this year?

Hon. T. R. Connell (Minister of Public Works): The answer is no.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Wishart), notice of which I gave him yesterday.

Is it the intention of the hon. Attorney General to bring in amendments to The Collection Agencies Act during this session which will bring house agencies under the provisions of the Act?

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Speaker, the matter of house agencies acting as collection agencies is under review by my department at this time, as I think I indicated recently in our discussion of the estimates of my department.

I am not in a position to state at this time that I shall definitely be presenting an amendment to the Act in this session.

Mr. Spence: Mr. Speaker, I was cut off. I have a supplementary question in regard to my question. Would the hon. Minister be prepared to answer a supplementary question?

When will the college be completed or built?

Hon. Mr. Connell: Is this in the way of a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker?

I am not sure, due to some of the complexities of getting approval and priority for this building. Actually, there has been a great deal of money spent on the police college as it is presently set up. We have absolutely no plans at this time. It has not been approved by the Treasury board. We have not heard that they are in any dire need of a new set-up. In fact, I think it is working very well. This is a continuation of a request for a building that has been in there for not only the past two years, but for the past five or six. I think it was generally accepted that when we remodelled the set of buildings that are there now, they would last for a number of years. Eventually, there might be a new building there.

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond), as we have a distinguished visitor from Manitoba here today, if he would be so kind as to introduce him.

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): Mr. Speaker, I thank you for the indulgence of the House in getting out of turn on this.

I am pleased to present to you, sir, and through you to the hon. members of this House, the Hon. Charles Whitney, Minister of Health for the province of Manitoba, and his Deputy, Dr. Tanner, who are visiting us here today. I hope they see how a well-run province operates.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

THE MUNICIPALITY OF METROPOLITAN TORONTO ACT

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs) moves second reading of Bill No. 137, An Act to amend The Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto Act.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

REGIONAL DETENTION CENTRES

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions) moves second reading of Bill No. 142, An Act to provide for the establishment of regional detention centres.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE MOTOR VEHICLE FUEL TAX ACT, 1965

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer) moves second reading of Bill No. 143, The Motor Vehicle Fuel Tax Act, 1965.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

TAX ON THE CONSUMERS OF TOBACCO

Hon. Mr. Allan moves second reading of Bill No. 144, An Act to impose a tax on the consumers of tobacco.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Mr. Speaker, a word or two about the principle of this bill. Although it has never been stated by the hon. Provincial Treasurer, or by any other hon. member of the government, it appears to me that the principle of this change in the tax position is so that the government would be free to elevate the taxation on tobacco in the years that lie ahead.

If this is the principle of the bill, I wonder if the hon. Minister might comment a little more specifically as to what he would consider the future of this particular tax on tobacco to be? Is he going to use it for revenue, other than that which would have been raised if the tobacco had been subject to the normal sales tax? Is he going to use it as a means whereby the consumption of tobacco would be controlled? How does he view this change in the situation?

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer): Mr. Speaker, I may say in reply to the remarks of the hon. member for Brant that the reason for the change is purely an administrative one. It has two advantages that greatly appeal to us. I think I mentioned these before. One is that it relieves a great many small businesses from requiring a sales tax licence and reporting each month. Lunch counters and similar small operations have found that the only item necessary for them to report was the item of tobacco. This was one of the reasons for the change. The other reason was that the plan that is being devised is efficient and, in a sense, follows the principle of the collection of gasoline tax; it assures us that we get all the tax and with the least possible inconvenience to those who are concerned. Those are the reasons for the change.

Mr. E. G. Freeman (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. Provincial Treasurer how this new approach will affect the wholesalers of tobacco products from the point of view of tying up their cash and of their principal, where they are servicing small businesses?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Speaker, this matter will be given the most careful consideration when the regulations are being prepared, and, likewise, the effect it will have on wholesalers and manufacturers. Opportunity will be given them to present their views as to how it should be done. Certainly every consideration will be given to that part of the industry.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

Clerk of the House: The seventeenth order. House in committee of supply; Mr. A. W. Downer in the chair.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF CIVIL SERVICE (continued)

On vote 301:

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Chairman, yesterday, at adjournment time, there had been a little discussion as to the scope of this vote. The hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Roberts) put forth what appeared to me to be the quite remarkable proposition that when the vote of an agency is before the House it is not in order to discuss the agency in terms of broadening its functions beyond what they are now. It is my view—and this is the point of view I wanted to express—that the civil service commission, being the central personnel agency of the government, ought to have jurisdiction over a larger number of public servants than it now has. The hon. Prime Minister proposed that it was out of order to discuss that matter at that time. I consider that a rather remarkable position; however, I do not intend to pursue the matter here.

The other way of doing it is to deal with each of the Crown agencies whose employees are not now under the civil service commission as they come along, which means that the matter will be raised six or eight times rather than just once. I thought it would be better to raise it once, but if that is the way the hon. Prime Minister wants it, that is fine with me. I shall have something to say about this on other occasions.

Vote 301 agreed to.

On vote 302:

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I am not absolutely certain as to what is involved in the term "position administration," but if I understand it aright, I believe that this would be the appropriate place to discuss the experiences of the female cleaning staff over the past few months. I think it was mainly in relation to position administration that they found themselves in rather an unfortunate position.

I ask that at the moment because if this is the wrong place, I have no doubt that the hon. Provincial Treasurer will advise me, and I will wait until the right spot.

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer): That is all right.

Mr. Bryden: This is as good a place as any, I take it.

The hon. Provincial Treasurer advised us yesterday that the faces of the cleaning women who work in this building and, I believe, elsewhere in the government, were wreathed in smiles. I am happy to know that; if it is true, it is the first time in some months that it has been so. I think it rather regrettable that in order to make people feel happy the government had to cut their pay and then restore it to where it was. This is the sort of procedure that one would expect from a sweatshop employer of the 19th century. One would not have thought it possible from a government in this age of supposed enlightenment. What actually happened was that the civil service association took up a grievance on behalf of the cleaning women on the grounds that they were wrongly classified.

The hon. Provincial Treasurer suggested yesterday that I was trying to provoke him into saying that the civil service association brought this disability on these people. I can assure him that that was the last thing I was trying to provoke him into saying. I was rather interested, however, that such an idea apparently was in his mind. He expressed considerable concern yesterday that relations between the government and the association do not appear to be of the best at the moment. I would suggest to him that an experience such as that relating to the cleaning women is one of many reasons why that is so.

In my estimation, the civil service association fell into a trap; I do not think there is any doubt about that. In the best of good faith, they were trying to get the wages of the cleaning women raised. Heaven knows, they could stand being raised. Technically, it won its point, but then it found itself in a trap because the government had another technicality up its sleeve, which meant that far from the wages being raised, they were, in fact, decreased.

The civil service association, let us face it, was out-manoeuvred; there is no doubt about it at all. I am going to suggest to the hon. Provincial Treasurer that he will never establish a solid foundation of responsible staff relations if one party finds it is out-manoeuvred by what comes very close to trickery. From here on he can expect that they will be on their guard. They are going to watch for tricks in the future. The way this decision was communicated to the cleaning women was, Mr. Chairman, difficult to believe. I have a copy here of the letter that was sent to them, advising them of their great good fortune. It was sent to them on November 26, 1964. It was a memorandum which, I believe, was sent individually to each member of the caretaking services division—at any rate, to each of the women employees in the caretaking services division. It was signed by Mr. Mitchell, the personnel director of The Department of Public Works who, of course, in this capacity, was acting as an agent for the government. Mr. Mitchell's memo starts as follows;

Please be advised your salary has been increased from $2,400 per annum to $2,640 per annum.

A month before Christmas, this would no doubt be good news to all the ladies concerned. But after they got through all the fol de rol in the rest of the letter, they found that their increase from $2,400 to $2,640 actually meant a decrease to $1,815—a decrease of roughly 25 per cent, I believe. That is the sort of an increase that very few of us can afford.

In particular, I would suggest that these cleaning women are most unable to afford it. For most of them, this is not a part-time job for pin money. A great many—indeed, I believe the majority of these women—are perhaps in their 50s, with families to support, and are the sole breadwinners in their families. They are fortunate in that they can get this sort of employment which occupies them in the evening so that they are at home in the daytime to look after their families. But they are dependent upon this employment—they and their families are dependent upon it—for their livelihood, and I would say that $2,400 is a very small amount of money to pay to them. However, they are not in a very strong bargaining position in the labour market generally. As I say, many of them are in their 40s and 50s, and we all know that there is widespread discrimination in employment against people who have committed the crime of passing the age of 40, as most of us in this House have done.

It is particularly difficult for women who, for most of their lives, have been at home bringing up small children, to get employment. So this type of employment, which is necessary to the government and to the public, is also very useful to them. But I think the government should be thinking in terms of paying these women a living wage; I submit that $2,400 is not a living wage, especially if one has one, two or three dependants, as many of them have. That, I think, is what probably motivated the civil service association when it tried to get a modest increase, but it succeeded only technically in getting the increase. The whole thing blew up in its face and these poor women were cut to a maximum of $1,815. The range actually went from $1,567.50 to $1,815. This, just before Christmas, was their Christmas present—an increase that cut their wages 25 per cent.

What kind of personnel relations are involved there? There has been a long struggle since this heartless action of the government. I had a few things to say about it, some of which were reported in the press; they were not very complimentary to the government. The cleaning women themselves took their courage in their hands and demonstrated in front of these buildings. When I say they took their courage in their hands I do not mean that they had any reason to fear any discrimination; I do not think they did. I certainly hope they did not have any reason to fear that. But to such ladies, it is quite a thing to march up and down in front of the Parliament buildings with a placard in their hands. That is the sort of thing they are not accustomed to doing. Some of them looked quite embarrassed while doing it. But after all, this was their livelihood; that, and that of their children, had been seriously threatened, so they took whatever steps they could.

Finally, we are now told in May, nearly five months after the original communication from Mr. Mitchell, that the government has decided to take a more generous attitude to them. I am not quite sure whether it is doing any more than just restoring them to the $2,400 level where they previously had been. I gather from what the hon. Provincial Treasurer said that that is all that has been done. The ladies have been returned to the $2,400 level where they had been all along, and the difference for the intervening period has been paid.

I hoped that the hon. Provincial Treasurer had done a little better than that, but if that is all he has done, I do not care whether the faces of the ladies were wreathed in smiles or not. I think it is abominable treatment to subject them to mental stress, uncertainty and actual privation for a period of five months, and then do no more than bring them back to where they were.

I would say that the government should now, at least, have the good grace to pay them at the rate of $2,160 to $2,640 that they thought they were going to get. They thought they were going to get that, until they were halfway through Mr. Mitchell's memo; then they found that it was going to be $1,567 to $1,815.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am appealing to the hon. Provincial Treasurer to forget that pettifoggish regulation in which he and his representatives apparently got themselves entangled, and just declare that he is going to pay them at least according to that scale. That seems to me to be a disgracefully low wage for the government to be paying, even at that. But at least it is a little better than they were getting. I am going to suggest to him further that he not only accept that wage scale, as payable to all of them, regardless of the petty little regulations, but that he make it retroactive to the date of the award by the grievance board, whenever that award was made. That seems to me to be only fair and decent treatment. It would not only wreath the faces of these ladies in smiles, but it would give them a genuine basis for feeling happy and satisfied. I think that after all the government has put them through, it ought to do a little bit to make them feel satisfied and happy.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, commenting upon the remarks of the hon. member for Woodbine, I would like to say that I think I have as much interest in the welfare of the ladies he refers to as he or anyone else in this Legislature. No one is, or has been, more sympathetic to them than I. I would inform the hon. members that there was no trap, and I will make a full statement as to what occurred. I am sure the hon. members can come to their own conclusion and if the hon. member for Woodbine is as fair as he says he is, I think he will be willing to retract some of the things he has said about the Provincial Treasurer and this government.

Mr. Bryden: I do not know on what basis—

Hon. Mr. Allan: But you have not heard it yet. Mr. Chairman, I gave this hon. member a perfect hearing. I did not interrupt him, and I do not propose to be interrupted myself at this time.

I would mention that the personnel of the civil service commission are too skilled to endeavour to manoeuvre anyone out of anything. That is not our practice it is not our way of dealing with the civil servants, and I certainly object to a statement that we set a trap, or that we manoeuvred anyone out of anything. It was our hope from the very beginning that we would negotiate the situation which arose as a result of the grievance, one by the cleaning staff based on a technicality; we wanted to come back and negotiate, as you will find when I make a statement covering the whole matter. If this had been done, if the civil service association had been willing to negotiate, these cleaners would never have had a salary of $1,815 a year. We did not want them to have that salary.

Mr. Bryden: But you gave it to them.

Hon. Mr. Allan: We had to give it to them.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald: Why?

Hon. Mr. Allan: I will tell you.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, let us have the explanation.

Hon. Mr. Allan: You will get the statement.

Mr. Chairman: Order.

Hon. Mr. Allan: We certainly did not want to do it. As for the insinuation that they were not happy, I will tell you that when I met one of them last night and I said: "Did you get your cheque?" "No," she said, "but I will get mine tomorrow." I said: "What are you going to do with it?" Being a very fine Scottish woman, she said: "I'm going back to Scotland, and have a trip." She was not unhappy.

Now I will give you the history of the whole situation. The history of this province clearly demonstrates that the association's failure to use negotiation procedures was entirely responsible for the unrest. To understand the problem which arose, it is necessary to describe the following sequence of events. The reclassification programme focused attention on the fact that women cleaners in The Department of Public Works, working in the evenings for a total of 25 hours a week, were paid the same salary as employees working a full week of 40 hours. In effect, their salary was $1.85 per hour. This $1.85 was the salary that was provided by the annual salary of $2,400.

Effective September 1, 1962, a revised rate was issued of $2,640, calculated on a 40-hour week. It was proposed to safeguard the interests of the employees hired prior to the programme's findings by a fine red-circle procedure. This has been done with many other classes of employees. It was proposed that the women cleaners, working only 25 hours weekly, should be red-circled at $2,400 per annum. The red-circle protection was not accepted, and these employees grieved that their rate should be the same as the cleaners working 40 hours weekly.

On the technicality that the classification of buildings cleaners had not been included in the schedule under the regulations prescribing hours of work, the employees won their grievance; they received back pay to September 1, 1962. This was at the end of 1964, and about $500 per employee was paid in back pay to those who had been on the payroll since September, 1962. Such a situation—and this is where we found ourselves, and was the reason that the situation had to be cleaned up—obviously unfair to the 40-hour a week employees could not be allowed to continue. The 25-hour a week employees were now receiving $2.03 per hour, against $1.27 for 40-hour employees. While endeavouring to obtain the concurrence of the civil service association to the establishing of a separate classification covering cleaners who work less than 40 hours a week, with a salary more closely related to the former one of $2,400, an interim step was taken to designate these jobs under Regulation 10 of The Public Service Act by which a prorated salary could be applied.

As from November 16, 1964, therefore, the prorated annual salary was $1,815. The civil service association would not negotiate, but preferred the grievance procedure as a means of settlement. This time the grievance was against the decision to make this designation under Regulation 10-A. This grievance was lost by the grievors.

We had begged the association not to pursue this course. I am sure all hon. members of this House must realize that it was not a happy situation for any of us who had anything to do with personnel administration of the government. We did not want to put that salary back to $1,815.

The association still would not negotiate, and the civil service commission was obliged to exercise its statutory responsibility to create a new class of cleaner, office buildings, Toronto, which will pay employees hired since November 1, 1964 at the hourly rate of $1.50, but which will safeguard those employed prior to this date by allowing the annual rate of $2,400 to be paid. This was done without prejudice to any further negotiation.

I do not think you could complain that we did this in any unilateral way; we did it without prejudice and there still can be negotiations. Our information is that the employees concerned are satisfied—several of them have told me that they are—with the establishment of the commission's original position in regard to a maximum of $2,400 for those previously on staff.

Mr. Chairman, I mentioned yesterday—evidently the hon. member for Woodbine did not hear me—that it was our hope that arrangements will be made to extend the hours of work for these women so that they will have a greater amount of take-home pay. I might have added that the maximum rate for cleaners in the city of Toronto is from $1.30 to $1.50 per hour, so we are not paying wages less than the market rate. I am sure that with this explanation no one can feel that we were willingly unkind to the cleaning women.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, having heard the hon. Provincial Treasurer's explanation, and I was fairly familiar with the facts in any case as he gave them, I would say that the conduct of the government was vindictive in the extreme, at the expense of a group of people whose income is very low. You see, the hon. Provincial Treasurer keeps saying that he would like to have good relations with the association. He has even told them that the basis of sound staff relations is confidence on both sides, but the association is always wrong, according to his thinking, it can never be right. He accused me yesterday of trying to provoke him into saying that the association brought this on these people. As I told him a few minutes ago, such an idea has never entered my head, but he said it without being provoked. He said in his statement now that it was the association's fault—

Hon. Mr. Allan: I gave you the facts.

Mr. Bryden: —that these people's wages were cut 25 per cent. I am suggesting to the hon. Provincial Treasurer that he could have done at the beginning what he did after a long protest—he could have kept them at least at $2,400. He did not have to cut them to $1,815, but he was going to teach the association a lesson; unfortunately, his method of doing so was to punish these women—and punish them most cruelly. That is a drastic reduction in pay for anyone to have to suffer. But for one whose wages are already at the line, I think it is inhuman. There was absolutely no need to make these women the victims of his exasperation with the association. Whether or not the exasperation was justified is not a point I am interested in going into; I do not care about that. These women had always been getting $2,400 a year on a 25-hour week. The rate for that classification was raised to $2,640, and it was only after the association established, through the grievance procedure, the point that they were now entitled to the $2,640—a miserable $240 a year more—that the government decided that it had to prorate them. It had not prorated them for 10, these many years, but now it had to prorate them and thereby pull their salaries away down.

The explanation that the hon. Provincial Treasurer has given simply confirms what I have already said, Mr. Chairman. There is, however, one further matter I would like to ask the hon. Provincial Treasurer about. I understand that these women are now at $2,400 and, as he said, the government is looking around for ways and means of increasing their hours. I do not know what that will amount to, and there is no use asking the hon. Provincial Treasurer now, because nothing has been settled.

Hon. Mr. Allan: The hon. member knows that the civil service commission has no way of increasing the hours; this is done by the department. You would understand that any change of hours would be arranged by the department; we can use our influence, but we cannot—

Mr. Bryden: That may be, but I would suggest that they be paid the $2,640 rate and forget about the hours. They are a special group of employees; there is a very small number of them, and I do not see any reason why you have to be so hidebound by regulations, especially since you were not in the past. When they were getting $2,400 you did not prorate them.

However, what I want to know is this. I believe the hon. Provincial Treasurer said the salary they now get is back to the $2,400 they had been getting all along. Is that retroactive to the period when they were cut down to $1,815 or is that lost permanently?

Hon. Mr. Allan: The cheque for $250.31 that they received yesterday was the difference for that period when they were receiving $1,815, so that they in reality have never received that. The pay is retroactive so that they have not suffered in the overall picture.

Mr. Bryden: I am glad to know that, but I suggest to the hon. Provincial Treasurer that is what he should have done in the first place. He should have kept them at the $2,400 and saved them all the mental stress and worry and concern about how they were going to support their families through that substantial period when they were cut down to the $1,815. The mere fact that he has now departed from his original decision—or whoever made the decision, but as he is the representative of the government I will put it in terms of him—and has now wiped out that thorough injustice, I think, establishes beyond all possible dispute that there was no need to have committed it in the first place. It was simply a matter of punishing these women in order to teach the association a lesson, and I am suggesting to him that he will never build sound staff relations on that basis.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Chairman, following up what the hon. Minister said, that he would not willingly be unkind—and I think that fundamentally he is a kindly gentleman—I questioned yesterday and I question today his understanding of the kind of processes that are involved in this collective bargaining which is going forward. But there is another case I would like to bring before him in this respect, of what I consider to be an injustice, which I hope that he will see fit to correct, within the civil service.

I have a letter which I would like to send to the hon. Minister, and I will do that so that he will have a copy of it. It concerns a man who was mentioned in this House the other day by the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions (Mr. Grossman); his name is Mr. McQuillan. Mr. McQuillan was evidently involved in the Cross case in Guelph, and I am not going to discuss at this point the merits or demerits of that case, because it had a pretty thorough airing in this House, but I was rather startled when the hon. Minister mentioned the other night that Mr. McQuillan harboured an ex-convict for two days, pumping him for damaging information, even though he, the convict, told him he was sought by the RCMP. This kind of statement against Mr. McQuillan, who, I think, is an honest man, is rather damaging, particularly when the hon. Minister sat in my own office with this man several days later. My question is, if he knew that this was the case, then why did he not at that point turn him over to the RCMP?

The other thing is that I sent this man to the parole office and to the parole officers here in the city and they looked after him, for how long I do not know. But they did not turn him over to the RCMP. Then, again, Mr. McQuillan was charged with complicity in tearing pages out of a record book. Again, both of these men so charged have denied this. And this, perhaps, is part and parcel of the kind of statement we have been getting in the House from the Minister when a department is allowed to investigate itself and come up with answers of its own problems and against charges that were made.

However, Mr. McQuillan, being involved in this together with Mr. Lindsay, has been fired. Other people who were also involved with these two men in trying to bring about certain reforms within the institution have left, and in disgust and despair they tell me. These two men have now been fired.

Mr. McQuillan wrote me in this respect after he had been fired. He says that he was with the department for five years and during that time he had built up 70 days of sick leave, which to him is worth around $400 in cash that he would collect at the termination of his period. He gives the dates, and as I said, I will send a copy of this letter to the hon. Minister.

He was suspended on March 25, 1965. A hearing was held with the department on March 29—four days later—and immediately after the hearing he overheard Mr. Harloff ask Mr. Lambie if he was still under suspension, and Mr. Lambie turned to him and said, "You are still under suspension, but will be officially notified of the outcome by letter." In Mr. McQuillan's own words:

On the evening of April 7, Mr. McQuaig and Mr. Welland delivered notification of my dismissal to me at my home. This letter was dated April 6, 1965, and it stated that I was dismissed on the date of my suspension, March 25, 1965. This means I was dismissed before I had a hearing with the department, if this carries through.

At the time of the hearing with the department I had 14 days holiday, four special and two days overtime coming to me. These two days I had been called in on days off for investigation—

Naturally, this would count for him. But the question here is that the department is maintaining that he is two days short of the five years in order to collect his $400 and he claims that he is at least one day over the time.

In any case, it is in that area, and so the case has been sent to arbitration, evidently.

It just seems to me that here is another case where the hon. Minister, with his regard for the civil service, could very well see to it that justice is done. As I say, I am not discussing the merits of the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions and his department feeling that this man should be discharged; that is their business and I am not here to argue that he should not be. He may have done certain things that they disagreed with, but we can have our differences on that, and this is not the case at issue. The case at issue is whether or not it is just to say to a man after five years service, "You are two days short of getting your time for the $400 sick leave pay and therefore you are not going to get it."

I put this before the hon. Minister because he said that he would not willingly be unkind and it seems to me in this case, there is unkindness and injustice being done.

Mr. Chairman: Carried?

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, can we not have some answers to our questions?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Certainly, we can. Mr. Chairman, first of all, as you might suspect, I know nothing about this case. The personnel management is the responsibility of departments, but let me say, and point out to the hon. member for Yorkview that within the last few years we have established an independent grievance board that is entirely independent of the government for the very reason that he suggests, namely, that everyone will have justice. The chairman of that board is Professor Ralph Presgrave, who is, I think, one of the most highly regarded personnel men in the whole of this province, a man who does justice, but a man who is sympathetic always to the person who may be down. This man has grieved and I do not think we should discuss any details in connection with the case. I would not want to prejudice, in any way, his possibility of fair treatment. He can grieve, and I can assure you that from that grievance board—certainly based on my experience and having read every award they have ever made—he will receive justice.

Mr. Young: But surely, Mr. Minister, my point is that this kind of case should never have to go through the grievance procedure; it is so close to the borderline that justice here would demand that that one day be given.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to pursue the point that my hon. friend has been dealing with, but I think the government is obviously a little cheap in forcing the man to go to a grievance board to get what he is entitled to.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I am not sure that is what he is grieving for.

Mr. MacDonald: Sure, that is what he is grieving for.

Hon. Mr. Allan: He is grieving over dismissal.

Mr. MacDonald: Let me come back to the other point. Apart from what I think is rather a cheap attitude, let us come back to the point that the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions introduced in the House the other day. He made what I think is a positively malicious charge. He stated that this man was harbouring a man who had been let out of the institution in Guelph and the RCMP were looking for him.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): I did not say that, Mr. Chairman, with all due respect.

Mr. MacDonald: What did you say?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I said that this man was harbouring a releasee from the institution, who, in his own words, was wanted by the RCMP. I did not say he was wanted. I further added that at the time I made the statement in the House the other night, the RCMP was, in fact, looking for that man. I said that they were under the impression that the RCMP was looking for him. I want you to get the facts clear.

An hon. member: That is not the impression—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Never mind the impression; that is exactly what I said, and this is established by the evidence the man himself gave.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, this is a very nice switching of words, because the fact is that after the man harboured somebody whom presumably the RCMP was looking for, the hon. Minister sat in the hon. member for Yorkview's office and talked to the man. The man went down and was in the hands of, and was being attended to by, the rehab. people in the hon. Minister's own department. So to get up and to leave the suggestion that he was being—

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. Am I concerned through these estimates with something that happens in a department that we have nothing to do with?

Mr. MacDonald: No, Mr. Provincial Treasurer, I agree; you should not be concerned. But we have got to be concerned in the Opposition at this kind of attitude and treatment of civil servants. We are faced with the difficulty, periodically, of dealing with one department and finding the issue is over in another department; we are chasing it back and forward. We got into this difficulty the other day. When this issue was originally raised in The Department of Reform Institutions, the hon. Minister, in effect, washed his hands of it and put it to the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Wishart), so we raised it with the hon. Attorney General. The hon. Minister brings it back into his own department and causes all the confusion.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: You are confusing it deliberately.

Mr. MacDonald: I am not confusing it.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: It was not quite that simple at all.

Mr. MacDonald: The civil servants certainly need somebody to fight for them.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: He has an organization to speak for him and I am sure it will.

Mr. N. Davison (Hamilton East): Mr. Chairman, I have a problem in the Ontario hospital at Hamilton I would like to bring to the hon. Minister's attention, concerning the classification of building cleaners and helpers; I would presume it is group one. They have a wage scale of $3,240 a year. I have a pay check here for a man that has worked there for six years—

Hon. Mr. Allan: Would you mind? I did not hear.

Mr. Davison: I have a pay cheque here for a man who has worked there for six years. For two weeks his pay cheque is $115. I would like to point out to the hon. Minister that in the city of Hamilton, if you are cleaning the floor in the public washrooms you get $70 a week, as compared to $57 at the Ontario hospital.

What I would like to find out is this. There are four groups here, running, I suppose from group one to group four. Is there a possibility when a man is at the top of group one of moving into group two or group three, or would his occupation have to be changed? It seems that pretty nearly everybody in the Ontario hospital at Hamilton is in group one. Have you got the percentages there of how many are in the different groups?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, in reply to the hon. member for Hamilton East, I may say that the salary mentioned of $3,000 a year is paid only during the training period. If the person is performing satisfactory service, the longest that it should take to get to $3,900 per year is six years. It does not take most the six years to get to the $3,900, which is presently the top of the class. These particular classes are being negotiated at the present time. Negotiations fell down, so the matter has gone to arbitration. The percentage of the employees in the institutional classes—in class one—is very small. I do not know if it would be ten per cent or not; I could get that figure and give it to you sometime, but I would think it would be ten per cent or less. It is only there during the training period, and if the person is performing reasonably satisfactory service, with the annual increments he would be at $3,900 at the end of six years.

I cannot explain the cheque. If you would like to—

Mr. Davison: That is fine. I just want to explain that this man has worked there six years. According to the people in Hamilton, his work is very satisfactory.

But what I am interested in is going down to class four, which would be a top of $4,800. Would there be anybody in an institution that would be getting this type? Who would he be?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Oh, yes. He would be the supervisor.

Mr. Davison: Just the supervisor?

Hon. Mr. Allan: The supervisor. They are chosen, of course, from the—

Mr. Davison: The ordinary worker would not have an opportunity of—

Hon. Mr. Allan: The ordinary worker could become a supervisor in two years; he does not have to work for the six years in order to become a supervisor. I think that class begins at $4,000. I have said to you that these rates should be under negotiation at the present time.

Mr. Davison: If I send this gentleman's name over to the hon. Minister, would he look into it?

Hon. Mr. Allan: I will look into it and give you the particulars.

Vote 302 agreed to.

On vote 303:

An hon. member: We have not passed 302 yet.

Another hon. member: It is hard to know what vote some of these things come under.

Mr. R. Gisborn (Wentworth East): Mr. Chairman, I want to raise a few questions. I do not want to be repetitive in what has been said in the general comment about the civil service association and the commission, but I feel I must rise on behalf of many of the employees of the institution in Hamilton —not just in the Ontario hospital, but in The Department of Health and The Department of Highways. The reason I was not here at the opening of the session today at 3 o'clock is because I have been on the telephone, listening to appeals for some action by employees in the Hamilton district. Of course, they are pretty well excited about their problems of trying to live with the kind of money they are receiving as employees of the government of Ontario. Some of the questions that were raised with me this morning were that they were working at the lowest rates—$3,200 a year. The wife had a job. The employee was appealing for some way that he could moonlight and find an extra job to help supplement his income. I told him that I was well aware of this situation; that I had had four or five calls previous to his, and that this is the going trend in many areas. People that are working for this kind of a salary work on other jobs on their days off, and on their off shift. And, of course, their wives are out trying to supplement the income also. Some would say: "This is all right. Maybe between the three jobs they can make $4,500 or $5,000 to keep their families the way they should be kept." This is not always the case. A few who have health and want to go out and do a moonlighting job do it to supplement it. With those who have no children or are perhaps fortunate enough to have in-laws to look after the children, the wife can go out and supplement the income. But in any case, when they do I do not think I have to tell the hon. Provincial Treasurer that this is not conducive to family life, or to the health of a person in this society if you have to work seven days a week or have to work 16 hours a day to supplement your income.

The hon. Provincial Treasurer is aware—it was raised in this House yesterday—of the proposed march on Queen's Park next Thursday by the rank and file of the civil service association members. This is what has caused some of the concern with many of their members. The Hamilton paper today, the Labour Beat, has a write-up taken from a meeting held by the so-called rebel group on Tuesday night of the employees, and an interview by the Labour Beat reporter, Bas Korsanti, with the director of the Hamilton branch. This says that the civil service association is warning them—the so-called rebel group—not to disrupt negotiations by a march on Queen's Park. At this point, I have to say that I think they should come down and make their protest if it is in two ways against their own directors or the civil service association, or rather whether or not it is against the laxity and the slowness of negotiations.

In collective bargaining in the trade union movement, of course, the rank and file gets exercised about delay in negotiations and the time comes when they have to show a little bit of militancy to spur things up and get things going. But I have often thought, Mr. Chairman, that when someone makes comments in this House about the great Canadian way of life and the great pride we have in this province, all hon. members are ready to thump their desks with pride, but if anyone needs to have some shame for the province of Ontario they can find it in the wages we pay to some of our civil servants. Certainly there has to be a real look taken at this bottom wage. I think the request of the association for a base rate of something in the neighbourhood of $4,300 to start is realistic, and so is maintaining this approach of moving up. This $2,800 is just ridiculous in this day and age.

I know that there are many problems in trying to deal with such a large group—400,000 employees—but nevertheless there may be some way that a new approach can be taken. I looked through the last issue of the Trillium, the civil service association of Ontario's official organ, and I saw the classification and salary schedule and it goes on for page after page. You wonder just how any kind of sensible approach to the problem can be finally resolved to please everyone.

I would ask the question, and the hon. Provincial Treasurer could answer it later on, could he tell me how many different rates of pay there are in the civil service groups of Ontario? I would think there would be thousands.

Hon. Mr. Allan: About 50 rates.

Mr. Gisborn: About 50 rates, 50 different rates? There are only 50 different rates in the whole—

Hon. Mr. Allan: I am told that there are sub-groups within some of those sections but that there are 50 main classifications. That is, you will find—if you study these—that certain professional people are classed together as far as salaries are concerned, although the work they are doing may have no relation whatever.

Mr. Gisborn: I would think if this is the case it should be reduced drastically. The steel industry had a real problem in this area for many years and it is now ten years past since it took a real look at this idea of classification. In the Steel Company of Canada, the Stelco plant, prior to 1954 there were 219 different rates. In certain occupations there might have been seven different rates in the labour class and this did nothing but cause a lot of favouritism, a sort of phony, false incentive, and a lot of these things that get the employees mixed up and dissatisfied with their positions. The union and the company went into what was called the co-operative wage study and they boiled that down to 27 rates in that plant. Those 27 rates now prevail. Now there is some reasoning and some cohesion to what a man might be entitled to—27 different classifications and, of course, the groups in those rates.

I think this is something that should be looked at in the civil service. Take, for instance, in the schedule on page 11 we find under "cook": Cook 1, cook 2, cook 3, cook 4, cook 5, and cook 6.

Mr. Bryden: None of them gets paid anything worth mentioning.

Mr. Gisborn: I understand that once they become cook 3 they are in the supervisory capacity. How anyone can put any sensible application to that sort of thing I do not know. It starts, of course, with cook 1 at $2,880 and when you get to cook 6 you get from $4,600 up to $5,500.

But then if we go on to page 14 we find in the laundries, we have laundry worker 1, laundry worker 2, laundry worker 3, laundry worker 4, laundry worker 5, laundry worker 6, laundry worker 7, laundry worker 8. What in the world would be the difference? If you could not come up with an occupational differential where you could have maybe three rates to cover your laundry workers, certainly you could have starter, intermediate and standard rates in the laundry shop and then have a foreman who is paid as a foreman. This silliness of eight different classifications makes one wonder, just what they are trying to do. Certainly this would help to complicate things.

But in the main, it is hard to understand why we are sticking to such low wages; why do we not establish a base that is reasonable? Does the hon. Minister or anybody in the department feel that anything below $3,000 is a reasonable starting rate? Do you not think in this day and age that a base rate should be something in the neighbourhood of $4,000 or $4,200, and then go on up from there? This is the big problem.

Another question I would raise is about the procedure of arriving at a settlement in negotiations. I am not too familiar with it and I will stand corrected by the hon. Provincial Treasurer, but if I may ask a question for clarification, I understand the procedure is that they do bargain, they have now collective bargaining, and if they fail to arrive at an agreement in the bargaining stage or negotiation stage, it is then referred to the joint council, is it not?

Hon. Mr. Allan: The bargaining is at the level of the joint council.

Mr. Gisborn: There is no bargaining before they go to the joint council?

Hon. Mr. Allan: No, I am wrong; there is discussion at the civil service level with the association.

Mr. Gisborn: This has something to do with causing confusion, in the sense they get together with the directors and the commission and they try to settle it. If there is no settlement, they go to the joint council, but then I understand the chairman of the civil service commission also sits on the joint council.

Hon. Mr. Allan: He acts as chairman; he has no vote, no say.

Mr. Gisborn: He acts as chairman, but has no vote—

Mr. Bryden: He is in a neutral position in one spot and in a partisan position in the other.

Mr. Gisborn: I would advise the hon. Minister that this is one of the bones of contention and I can see where it could be a bone of contention. This joint council could take the place of a conciliation stage, but it will not be a conciliation stage in any sense if you have equal numbers on each side and then you have the chairman of the civil service commission—

Hon. Mr. Allan: The chairman is a neutral chairman.

Mr. Bryden: But he is not neutral in his previous state; he is a representative of the government in his previous state—well, he is under the Act. We will deal with this later.

Mr. Gisborn: Whatever happens, this is what I understand happens. In any case, if he is there, whether you call him a neutral chairman or whether we say that he would have some influence, is a little bit beside the point; his presence there does not tend to be conducive to reasonable negotiations. I would suggest you have the joint council and if you have a conciliator—

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I could give the hon. member a little information that might straighten him out. I may have misled you when I said that the civil service chairman does not negotiate at all; it is the officers of the civil service commission, and not any members of the civil service commission who have any discussion with the salaries in the beginning.

Mr. Bryden: That is no explanation—

Mr. Gisborn: This is an area of confusion as far as the associations are concerned and I have never talked to anybody from the executive of the Ontario civil service association; I have talked to some of the rank and file and to one or two directors, and the impression I get, with some experience, is that they have been confused right through the whole business as to knowing where they really get into the meat of having somebody deal with them on a basis that negotiations really mean something.

If it is a fact that the chairman of the civil service commission sits in on the joint council, I think that this should be changed. If this is where you get to the point where you start to talk cold turkey and do some real negotiating, then you should have someone in there in the capacity of a conciliator, one who is really impartial and tries to resolve the questions as they arise.

I wonder, Mr. Chairman, if the hon. Minister, before the afternoon is out, would give us some idea as to whether the present set of negotiations is proceeding in an orderly fashion and if there is some likelihood that there will be a conclusion in the near future, so that we are not faced with protest marches to Queen's Park to protest the delay and the actions of the civil service association in conjunction with the commission. I do not think that it is conducive to the welfare of the government of Ontario to have employees making protest marches in regard to the amount of money they receive for their labours.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the remarks of the hon. members for Hamilton East and Wentworth East. I appreciate some of the suggestions that the latter has made and I certainly shall give them some consideration.

I would point out to him, and he will understand this because he is an experienced labour man, that we had hoped when these negotiations began—and they do include the institution classes, which are one of the largest classes in the civil service—that we could get down to some negotiations. Unfortunately, the two sides, as I said yesterday, were as far apart as the poles. No negotiations took place; very quickly the staff decided they would take it to arbitration and it is in arbitration.

I think in fairness to the government, that anyone must give the government credit for the fact that the determination of these salaries finally is going to be determined by an independent body, namely, the arbitration board. Any feeling that the government wishes to be unfair with the civil servants is a long way from the facts. We want to be reasonable. There is a great difference of opinion as to what salaries should be for certain positions.

I can tell hon. members that there are three institutions in this area and there are only 13 vacancies in all three of those institutions; we have lists of persons waiting to obtain positions at the mental institutions throughout the province—almost every institution, with one or two exceptions.

We want to be good employers, and we have said from the beginning that we want to be good employers and that we are willing to be. Certainly there can be a great difference of opinion as to the salaries that should be paid, but when I tell you that during what would amount to the last three years—that is from 1962—our salaries increased from $144 million to $155 million in 1962, the following year from $155 million to $177 million, and last year from $177 million, with no increase in staff, or only .1 per cent—

Mr. Bryden: You said, “no increase in staff”; I do not know whether that applies to last year or the entire period you were talking about.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Yes, that is the total—.1 per cent.

Mr. Bryden: Pardon?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Point one per cent, and the salary payment increased from $177 million to $190.7 million. I think that this is an indication that we want to be fair with the civil servants. We want a good staff and we realize that to have a good staff we have to be good employers.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I think the government is doing a pretty good job in increasing the wages in some of the higher wage ranges and in some of the competitive places where it found that it could not get people, but in some of these lower scales, I would suggest that its attitude is not a very realistic one, if I may use that term. Maybe it can get people—I do not know—but I would suggest to the hon. Provincial Treasurer that perhaps as many as one quarter of the people on the payroll of the government of Ontario will qualify for subsidization of hospital insurance premiums if and when the bill that the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond) has before the House goes through.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Perhaps we could have a bet on it.

Mr. Bryden: What percentage of your employees in the civil service—we will not bother with the others and you probably have not got the information—gets paid less than $3,000 a year and what percentage gets less than $3,600 a year? It is in these ranges that people are going to qualify for subsidization under the hon. Minister's bill if it should go through.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I have already said that I am quite sure that it is less than 10 per cent.

Mr. Bryden: Getting less than $3,600 a year?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Getting less than $3,000 a year.

Mr. Bryden: All right. It seems that the deputy is looking up the information, so perhaps you could give it to us.

Hon. Mr. Allan: These figures would indicate that there might be 17 per cent under the $3,000 mark.

Mr. Bryden: And how many under $3,600, or whatever figure you have that is close to that?

Hon. Mr. Allan: There would be about 35 per cent under $3,600.

Mr. Bryden: That would include the 17 per cent?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Yes.

Mr. Bryden: It looks as though I have understated the case, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): You lost your bet.

Hon. Mr. Allan: No, I have not.

Mr. Bryden: I am glad I did not take it. I was sure I would have been betting on a sure thing anyway, and I do not believe in doing that. This 17 per cent means that almost a fifth of the civil service of this province are making less than $3,000 per year. Almost anybody in that group will qualify for subsidy under the bill that the hon. Minister of Health has before us, because most of them will have some dependants and that will get them into a taxable income of less than $1,000 a year. I said 20 to 25 per cent. I just have to take that group, and I have about got it. Then there is another 18 per cent that are between $3,000 and $3,600.

I am suggesting to the hon. Provincial Treasurer that on the basis of the studies of almost any experts, those people are below poverty levels. These people are living in poverty, getting wages like that, if they have anybody to support. A single person probably could get by. He would not get very fat, but he could get by on those wages. But for people with dependants that is poverty. We are always talking about the war on poverty; it is getting to be the favourite slogan of politicians. Let us start it right here. Let us eliminate poverty in the civil service of Ontario. I would say that we should not contemplate anything less than $3,600 a year—in fact, I suggest we might be better thinking in terms of a basic minimum of $4,000 a year. I am not suggesting we do that tomorrow, but that should be our objective over a reasonably short period of time.

The institutional services group's salary schedules are now up for review, as I understand; I think they are going to arbitration. I have no doubt that there has been a great deal of study gone into their wage rates by the pay research branch of the department. I have no doubt that the pay research branch is quite competent and has provided the government with information as to rates for people in comparable employment elsewhere. I do not wish to question any information it may have provided the government, but I think we should bear in mind that the pay research branch has the sole function of providing information. It is up to the government to make a policy determination after the pay research branch has provided the information.

I would like to suggest to the hon. Provincial Treasurer that he should consider the information he no doubt has from the pay research branch in this light; the people in this institutional services group are notoriously underpaid all through the community. They provide a major vital service to the community, but they are, without question, the worst-paid group in the community. Therefore, he should not be too much impressed by comparisons with similar groups employed by other employers. I am sure that the people in his institutions are as well paid as the people in the Toronto general hospital; the people in the Toronto general hospital are grossly underpaid. In view of the growing importance that service is assuming in the modern world, somebody has to make a start in getting the wages of these people up, and I say the government should make the start. You see, negotiations broke down before they started because the civil service association was asking that the people who provide services to sick people should be paid as much as common labourers in industry. The government is not prepared to accept that proposition; it wants to compare them with grossly exploited people in other institutions; not government institutions. I am sure the two parties will never get together.

I would not be too happy about the outcome of the arbitration. I hope it will go well for the association, but my own experience in past years with boards of this kind is that they go on the basis of comparison; they never consider the question of basic equity. If everybody in this type of work is being underpaid, how are we ever going to get the wages up? I say that the government ought to take a bold step forward. It should not force this arbitration; it should come forth with a realistic proposal that would make a significant increase in the pay of these people.

We had a group of men from Oak Ridge at Penetang in front of the buildings, and the hon. Provincial Treasurer took them over to the Treasury building and jollied them up in his own inimitable way. He tells us that they went home happy.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I did not jolly them up.

Mr. Bryden: They went home happy, anyway.

Hon. Mr. Allan: The hon. member is disappointed if anyone is happy, is he not?

Mr. Bryden: I am disappointed if anyone is deluded into being happy on the basis of exploitation. These men, with families no doubt, are getting $3,400 to $4,200 a year. I would certainly be ashamed of myself if I tried to persuade those people that they had any basis for being happy. I think you should make them happy on a real basis by getting some more money for them—a living wage. You are paying starvation wages to a substantial part of your public employees, and I think it is time you changed your attitude. There are men sitting on these benches who work in plants where people who sweep the floors are paid $2.30 an hour. My colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton

East, says probably more than about half of your total civil service. And yet you are trying to tell us that you are interested in doing a job on wages. I am personally concerned about this institutional services group, in terms not only of the public service itself, but of that type of employee in the community at large. I think it is time the government set a pattern for the community in trying to get these people up to at least the point of a living wage. The overwhelming majority of them now, both in the government service and elsewhere in the community, are getting less than a living wage.

Mr. S. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I have a word to say on The Department of Civil Service.

Mr. Chairman: What item?

Mr. S. Lewis: Vote 303, on recruitment. Are we not on recruitment?

Mr. Chairman: Vote 303, right!

Mr. S. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I have a small point I would like to raise; I am perplexed about it. In the memorandum to all employees dated March 17, 1965, Mr. Collins indicated the award that had been arrived at. Point No. 1 of that award said that a new schedule for the accrual of annual vacation leave has been awarded. Under this clause, new employees having up to three years of service will have vacation leave of two weeks per year, and employees having three years of service or more will have vacation leave of three weeks per year up to 20 years of service.

Mr. Chairman, through you to the hon. Provincial Treasurer. I am frankly not familiar with this. Is it a cut-back from three to two weeks as part of the negotiated agreement?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Perhaps I could explain it to the hon. member. There will be no cut-back for anyone. I am not trying to speak in a double-talk fashion; for the new people who come in, this will apply once the award has come into effect. This was negotiated and agreed upon by the civil service association. This was not considered by the board of arbitration, and it does not affect any of those who were here before.

Mr. S. Lewis: But it will be limited to two weeks for all those who are new employees?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Yes.

Mr. S. Lewis: Mr. Provincial Treasurer, what I wanted to raise in this House, and what perplexes me about it, is the lack of contact and consultation which this reflects. I stand to be corrected—and the hon. Minister of Health may subsequently do so—but as I understand it, Mr. Chairman, this has seriously and adversely affected prospects of hiring at all Ontario hospitals in the province—indeed, if I understand it correctly, the mental health branch of The Department of Health is presently in the process of making some submissions for encouraging that this be otherwise altered. For nurses, social workers, psychologists and medical psychiatrists, the prospects of two weeks leave at a lower salary for the first three years obviously is not sufficient enticement—certainly not to compete with general hospitals in the community. What I am curious about is that this could have happened without some kind of consultation with branches in the department which this legislation or these rules affect.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I should think that the civil service association, having representatives from all these staffs, must have discussed it with their people; there must have been an understanding.

Mr. S. Lewis: I see. Please understand me, Mr. Treasurer, I am not in fact laying blame; I am trying to understand. Here are OHs in enough staff difficulty as it is, yet another serious obstacle has been put in their path. It will take some time to overcome the impression that has been created, even if it is reversed.

Hon. Mr. Allan: This was really an adjustment of holidays. As you know, there were advantages as well.

Mr. S. Lewis: I appreciate that there were advantages on the other side. All right, I shall let it lie there until the health estimates.

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Chairman, one year ago I made the suggestion to the hon. Provincial Treasurer that he post vacancies in Dominion public buildings, in post offices throughout the province. Has that suggestion been accepted at all?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, my understanding is that we are not even permitted to do it.

Mr. Newman: I beg your pardon?

Hon. Mr. Allan: We are not permitted.

Mr. Newman: You are not permitted at all? May I suggest then, possibly you should take some other public building in the community, maybe one of your own offices in a central location, and post vacancies in that office, so that residents from all parts of Ontario have the same opportunity for applying for positions with the civil service? Will you follow a suggestion like that, Mr. Minister—post vacancies in some other central location in each community, so that other centres have the same opportunity for employment with the civil service?

Hon. Mr. Allan: I will see.

Mr. Newman: You are doing that now?

Hon. Mr. Allan: No, we are not.

Mr. Newman: Will you consider that, Mr. Minister?

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, could I ask the hon. Minister a question? As he knows, the head office of the hon. Minister of Highways (Mr. MacNaughton) is situated in my riding and many of his employees live there. The hon. Minister mentioned, I think last evening, about the engineers' assistants and some problems being ironed out here. One of the problems conveyed to me was that on the road they work a 40-hour week. When they come in, the work week is shorter. There was some question about pay. Has that been ironed out so that they know exactly where they are in that situation?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, I might inform the hon. member that some adjustments have been made. The matter is still under consideration and the final determination has not yet been made. We are working on some change in the classification.

Mr. Young: And they will go on an hourly pay!

Vote 303 agreed to.

Vote 304 agreed to.

Vote 305 agreed to.

On vote 306:

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, could I ask the hon. Minister with regard to 306, about the directives that come from the office? I have seen some of them. I asked the hon. Minister for copies of them, but I understand it is a little difficult to get them all, because there are so many of them. Are those directives based on legislation and regulations, or do they sometimes go out without any basis in regulations?

Hon. Mr. Allan: I may inform the hon. member that there are a great many of these. The manner which is followed in this management of personnel is to develop classifications. Once the salaries have been agreed upon, those classifications are brought to the Treasury board and usually approved. Then an order-in-council confirms the arrangement and that is the basis of the directive that goes out.

Mr. Young: Then, the directives go out that are based on an order-in-council.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Yes.

Vote 306 agreed to.

On vote 307:

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, there are a number of matters I would like to raise here.

First, this may be an appropriate time to come back briefly to a point raised by my hon. friend from Wentworth East a few minutes ago, with regard to the position of the chairman of the civil service commission as chairman of the Ontario joint council. The Public Service Act is quite specific in providing that the civil service commission is a department and is responsible to the Minister for the administration of the Act. The Minister in this case happens to be the hon. Provincial Treasurer, although it could be any Minister designated by the Cabinet.

There are some jurisdictions where the civil service commission, or a comparable body, is in a sense an independent body. For example, in the government of Canada, it is accountable directly to Parliament. I am not saying that is of vital significance, but there is no question here but that the civil service commission is a department and an agency of the government, directly accountable to the government, through the Minister designated as the person responsible for the administration of the Act. Therefore, I suggest to the hon. Provincial Treasurer—and I am not going on the basis of any complaints I have received, because I have received none—that it is not a good practice to have an agent of the government, sitting, shall we say, as the impartial chairman of the joint council.

The joint council, of course, is not a council in the normal sense. It is a bipartite body. There are four representatives from each side, but they act as a unit, and this is as it should be. Then there has to be a chairman who is not associated with either of them. Now, that cannot be as long as the civil service commission is in the position it is in; it cannot be regarded as an impartial body in these matters and its chairman cannot be regarded as an impartial person.

Therefore, the government should seek somebody entirely removed from the government service, in my opinion. This is certainly not intended as any reflection on the present chairman of the civil service commission. I would think that if anyone can act in this dual capacity and carry it off, he is very likely to be the one who could do it, but basically—

Mr. J. F. Edwards (Perth): Well, why bring it up then?

Mr. Bryden: Of course, matters of principle are completely beyond your comprehension. I suggest you just go back to sleep.

Mr. Edwards: You are yakking all the time.

Mr. Bryden: A person with one head cannot successfully wear two hats, and that is what the hon. Minister is suggesting the chairman of the civil service commission should do in this situation. In fact, the comments he made a few minutes ago lead me to believe he even may be wanting him to wear three hats. At any rate, it is quite clear from the Act itself, that he is asking him to wear two hats. I do not know whether the hon. Provincial Treasurer wishes to make any comments on that point.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, I would point out to the hon. member for Woodbine that if I thought that I could make him happy, I might decide to recommend that the chairman be changed. But I am not a bit sure that if I did even then he would be happy.

Mr. MacDonald: No wonder you have difficult employee relations.

Mr. Gisborn: We want you to make some people happy who are looking for more money. You never make me dis-happy.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Let me say this, and I say this seriously, I would be the first to admit that when we arranged to negotiate salaries those who were going to undertake that task had not had even as much experience then as they have had now, and they were not what you could say tremendously experienced. It was thought that the chairman of the commission could be helpful in arranging to get these two groups together.

Our representatives on the joint council are all good men—Mr. McNab, the chairman, the Deputy Minister of Highways; Mr. Elborn, the Deputy Minister of Education; Mr. Metzler, the Deputy Minister of Labour, and Mr. Walker, the associate Deputy Minister of Treasury. We did our best to pick good representatives from the management side, and I think this has been helpful. But I do not seem to be able to impress my hon. friends with the fact that the motive and ambition that we had was to make this work. We did what we thought was wise in that connection.

We may not always have this chairman of the civil service commission. If it would work better with some other chairman, certainly we will arrange to get some other chairman.

As I said last night, and I say again now, we are disappointed that we are not in negotiation, and that everything is being referred to a board of arbitration. This is of great concern to me, and I do not know what we will do, but we will do everything we can to change this situation. I hope that if you have any influence in areas that could bring this about, you will use it to do that.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I am going to try to use my good influence—or whatever it may be—in the area where I think it is most urgent that it be exercised. The hon. Provincial Treasurer, I think, quite genuinely, wants to see the negotiation work; he wants to see a sound basis of understanding in mutual goodwill and confidence. But that does not come about through exhortation, Mr. Chairman. I say to the hon. Provincial Treasurer—and I am not trying to be critical at all—that on the basis of what he was saying yesterday, and on the basis of what he is saying today, the difficulty is that he—and I take it since he is speaking for the government—does not even understand what negotiations consist of. This is where the trouble arises. You see, there is a long history that unfortunately you have to live down if you are going to establish a sound, secure basis of staff relationship. For years, the government of this province flatly refused to consider even the proposition of negotiation. We had many battles in this House in past years on this matter. They just would not consider it; they wanted to maintain a paternalistic relationship where the civil servants and their representatives were nice little boys who could be patted on the head from time to time, and the government would make decisions when the chips were down.

As a matter of fact, this Public Service Act is shot through with that paternalistic attitude. All sorts of matters that should be settled by negotiation are actually, under the Act, determined arbitrarily by the government. Almost everything. I am not saying that continues to be the practice in all fields, but that is still the philosophy in the Act. A paternalistic philosophy is written through this Act.

This was the attitude of the government until very recently, when it said it was prepared to negotiate—to use the joint council actually as an instrument of negotiation. That is a new type of departure that may take some doing to make it work. But, at any rate, the government wants to negotiate, but it is not going to be able to negotiate on a basis of mutual confidence and trust if it continues to hold on to the old paternalistic attitude that it had before, and take the position that every time something is not settled, it is because the other fellows are so unreasonable, and will not do it their way: "Let us be reasonable, fellows. Just accept what we say, and everything will be fine."

Hon. Mr. Allan: Is the rank and file unhappy or is it just the leaders who are unhappy—

Mr. Bryden: Oh, yes, it is just the leaders who are unhappy, or it is just I who am unhappy. I do not give a hoot whether the hon. Provincial Treasurer makes me happy or not, but I would like to see him make some of these other people happy.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I would just love to see you happy.

Mr. Bryden: The only trouble is that there are a lot of unhappy people with whom you are dealing and you are not making them happy; that is a little more to the point. You see, this sort of frivolous dismissal of a serious problem is not really a very good answer. The hon. Minister said that he spent three days in London, England, last year, talking to people connected with the British civil service. He found that their relationship is well-founded in mutual trust and goodwill. Well, I think that perhaps he might have found a few other things. He could have looked—

Hon. Mr. Allan: He looked around and saw both sides—

Mr. Bryden: Yes, but just a second. If he had looked a little further he would have found that that mutual confidence and goodwill is based on 40 years of solid negotiation, or what we in this country call collective bargaining—

Hon. Mr. Allan: That is right. I realize that—

Mr. Bryden: Forty years of it. The British Treasury enters into signed, written agreements with the recognized staff associations and they have been doing it for years. As a matter of fact, the Whitley councils—what we call the joint councils—are not the agency of collective bargaining. There is genuine collective bargaining, such as in industry, with signed agreements between the Treasury, which acts for the government and designated associations. The civil service over there, of course, is a much bigger and more complicated organization than we have here. They have several associations which make their job more complicated.

They have a solid base of negotiation and the Whitley council, or joint council, is just a further level of consultation erected on top of the fundamental basis of what we would call collective bargaining.

We do not have any of that sort of background at all, and we do not have any of the spirit that is implicit in it. I may say, incidentally, that the hon. Provincial Treasurer did not have to take a trip to London at the taxpayers' expense to discover what I have just been saying; it is all set forth with great clarity in a command paper issued by the British Treasury in 1955, which is on file right in the legislative library here, and set forth in somewhat less detail in Professor Frankel's book on "Staff relations in the civil service." You just cannot come back to the boys here and say: "Look, fellows, over in Britain they have mutual confidence and good faith and it is well established," and so on.

You are not going to get that spirit by exhortation. You have to get it by evidence of good faith on your side. That is the only way you can do it. You can exhort them until the cows come home; unless they can see it in what is happening, there is not going to be any real basis of good faith. My observation, and I have had substantial experience in the field of labour relations, is that where an employer genuinely does negotiate and takes the representatives of his employees into his confidence and treats them as adult human beings, he finds that he develops a sound basis of mutual confidence. But as long as he fails to do that he can exhort them all he likes; but all he will get will be more and more ill will, and more and more dissatisfaction, which seems to be the current condition in Ontario.

I would judge, from what the hon. Provincial Treasurer has said himself, that he hardly even gets started in negotiations. There is not even enough basis to get together and sit down and make a first step; it just goes bang!—off to arbitration. There is certainly no negotiating relationship there.

No doubt this is, in part, the fault of the civil service association. As the hon. Provincial Treasurer said, when the parties sat down in this joint council for the purposes of negotiation, they were both very inexperienced. That is probably true, and it will take a while to work out procedures that are satisfactory. But you still have got to treat the properly designated representatives of the employees with respect.

Hon. Mr. Allan: We do.

Mr. Bryden: Well, I raised a matter yesterday and the hon. Provincial Treasurer denied it. But I am going to raise it again today, because I cannot understand the basis for his denial. I raised the matter with him that in an important negotiation, in one of the most vital ones he has had to date, he went behind the backs of the association representatives, directly to the employees. I am telling him that as long as he does that he will never build up any mutual confidence and goodwill.

I refer to the first case that ever went to arbitration, relating to fringe benefits. This was, without going into all the details, and trying to summarize them as quickly as possible, under discussion for a substantial time and it appears that a deadlock had been reached. The question was referred to arbitration pursuant to The Public Service Act. Then the government stated that it had some sort of a committee investigating the matter, and it was thought that the arbitration procedures might well be left in abeyance until that committee reported that its recommendations might be a basis for further negotiation. So the arbitration proceedings were suspended. Then the report of the committee became available and Mr. Collins, as the chairman of the joint council, attempted in September to get the question back to the joint council; he advised the chairman of the arbitration board by letter of September 21, 1964, that he was doing that.

So there was an attempt, and I think a sensible attempt, to try to reopen negotiations on the basis of further information that the government had. I think the chairman of the joint council is to be commended for making that attempt.

There were, apparently, some discussions. Apparently some difficulties were encountered. The employee representatives were not willing to take what the government handed out in its infinite goodness and mercy, and take it as something they should be overjoyed about. They wanted to negotiate; they wanted to discuss the matter. This immediately got the government's wind up. These fellows actually wanted to talk about it; they were not willing to take the government's proposition exactly as it was, so that seemed to indicate that we were going to be in trouble and there was going to be a breakdown. At any rate, the parties presumably were still supposed to be discussing it, because according to the arbitration award, under date of December 8, 1964, Mr. Collins, the chairman of the joint council, again wrote to the chairman of the arbitration board saying that the matter was once again officially on the agenda of the joint council for Monday, December 14. So the matter was on the agenda of the joint council for December 14 for negotiation. Mr. Collins also stated in his letter, according to the report I have here, that it looked as if there might be a breakdown in negotiations and the matter might have to go to arbitration, but as of that date negotiations had not broken down. According to this document, the matter was still to go before the joint council on Monday, December 14, for a last try at an understanding.

On December 7, that is one week before the date it was to go back to the joint council, Mr. A. T. C. McNab, the chairman of the official side, that is the government side of the Ontario joint council, undertook to circularize all the employees of the government. If the hon. Provincial Treasurer wants to know where I got that information, I got it from one of the bulletin boards here; it was posted all over the place. It was also sent, I believe, to the employees individually although I am not certain of that.

While negotiations were still in progress the government went behind the civil service association—the civil service association represented on the joint council—directly to the employees. How do you expect you are going to get a mature relationship on that basis? Mr. McNab's letter to the employees was headed "Government offer concerning employees' fringe benefits." It read as follows:

On November 13, 1964, the chief negotiators for the civil service association and the government agreed to recommend to their respective principals a basis for settlement of current negotiations concerning fringe benefits.

The civil service association, incidentally, denies that the negotiators had agreed to any such thing. However, that is not the point I am getting at. Quoting further from Mr. McNab's letter:

This settlement would have given civil servants presently employed the following improved benefits—then there is a list of alleged improved benefits which I will not read out unless the hon. Provincial Treasurer wants me to.

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Minister of Highways): They are not allegations, they are facts.

Mr. Bryden: Then, continuing from Mr. McNab's letter:

It is estimated that the above proposal would represent an estimated average annual saving of over $140 in premiums to employees who currently have life insurance and comparable medical-surgical coverage for himself and his family. Unfortunately, the association board of directors did not ratify the recommendation of the chief negotiators, although the official side of the joint council and the government accepted it as the basis for settlement and the matter remains unresolved.

In other words, these terrible fellows over in the civil service association have stopped you good people from getting improved benefits. Continuing with Mr. McNab's letter:

Either party may again refer the issue to the Ontario joint council, and if no majority decision is possible the civil service arbitration board would reconvene to decide the matter on its merits.

As I say, Mr. Chairman, this letter was sent out while the matter was still officially under negotiation. It would have been bad enough if it had been sent out after negotiations had broken down—that, in my opinion, would be most reprehensible—but when it was sent out when there was even a glimmer of a chance that negotiations might be resumed, it was totally irresponsible.

It is not really of concern if what Mr. McNab said is right or not; it is the whole procedure that is involved. I do not know how one gets this across to the government because it seems to have no comprehension of what is involved in collective bargaining.

Let us put it this way: On the Treasury benches there are a number of lawyers—perhaps a third to a half of them are lawyers. I imagine that all of them, though probably not engaged in private practice now, have been so engaged in the past. Let them think of their position as a solicitor in this context.

Let us say they had a client who was engaged in certain negotiations with another person represented by another lawyer, and let us say that the two parties were having some difficulties or that the two lawyers who were acting on instructions from their clients were having some difficulty in getting together. Then let us say that the lawyer for the other side went behind the back of the lawyer on this side, the Cabinet Minister who was in that capacity, went directly to his client and told him, "If that lawyer of yours was not such a hard guy to get along with we could get down to business and get an agreement that would be quite beneficial to you. You would get many of these benefits, but this lawyer of yours is standing in the way."

I do not know what any of these hon. gentlemen would do if they found themselves in that sort of situation, but I expect they would report the other lawyer to the law society. But this is what the government does with the civil service association. It runs into difficulty, so it has the chairman of its side on the joint council communicate directly with the employees, saying to them, "If it were not for that association that is supposed to be representing you, you could have all sorts of benefits. We could have a nice agreement that would benefit you all."

Yet in the face of that, the hon. Provincial Treasurer tries to tell us that he is really concerned about establishing a good relationship. It would seem to me that it should come home to him that he will never establish a good relationship that way. The civil service association is the representative of the civil servants. The government, if it wants to have a good relationship, will deal with their representative and with no one else. It will not try to go behind their backs. It will not try to undermine the confidence of the employees in their own association; yet that is essentially what this letter tries to do. It says, in effect, "We had a good settlement that would be good for you but your association turned it upside down."

Mr. MacDonald: Let us not blame Mr. McNab.

Mr. Bryden: No, I am not blaming Mr. McNab. I am quite certain that in a matter of this magnitude Mr. McNab would not act on his own initiative; I am sure he was acting exclusively—

Hon. Mr. Allan: He certainly did.

Mr. Bryden: The government has to take responsibility. I do not think we have to get into the ins and outs of his relationship with the government in this matter, but as far as I am concerned the government has to take responsibility for what he does. He is the government's representative in these negotiations.

Hon. Mr. Allan: He is the representative, and he is entirely free.

Mr. Bryden: Pardon?

Hon. Mr. Allan: He is free. We are not looking over his shoulder all the time.

Mr. Bryden: Does the hon. Provincial Treasurer mean to say then that his official side does not represent the government?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Oh, I said they did.

Mr. Bryden: All right, if they represent the government then they are acting for the government and the government has to take responsibility for what they do. It may be impossible to persuade the hon. Provincial Treasurer even of that, I do not know. No wonder he is having trouble with negotiations if he is repudiating his own official representative, if that is what he has in mind.

As a matter of fact, when I saw this and saw what terrible people these civil service association people were, I phoned them up and asked them if they would let me have their side of this story. It would appear to me that they gave considerable thought to the question of whether or not they would send me anything but they did decide to send me a printed document. I suppose it would be a public document in any case, but I just want it understood they did not come to me—I went to them. They were not even sure that they would give it to me at first but they did give me this so that I would have both sides of the story. I think since I have read part of Mr. McNab's memo into the record, just to keep the picture honest, I should read at least part of their memo into the record.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: No more than you do.

Mr. Bryden: This is from the civil service association, signed by W. J. Foster, president, and Harold Bowen, executive secretary. It is addressed: "To all Ontario public servants re the welfare package." It begins:

Do not be misled.

This shows a sound basis of understanding.

A. T. C. McNab, representing the official side of the Ontario joint council, has distributed a letter which by its omissions, distortions and inaccuracies is obviously aimed at undercutting the association.

I will not comment on their allegations of omissions, distortions and inaccuracies, but the charge that he is obviously aiming at undercutting the association is unquestionably true. What other purpose could it have? Quoting further:

These are the facts:

1. The government has never contributed one cent toward a welfare package.

2. The association first requested in 1956 government participation in Blue Cross and PSI Blue plan or equivalent plans.

This is a matter that obviously has been hanging fire for a long time.

3. A formal submission was placed before the new Ontario joint council in August 1963 for participation in OHSC replacing Blue Cross and PSI Blue plan or equivalent.

4. After repeated attempts to negotiate without success the association requested arbitration.

5. The Ontario joint council promised a decision by April 1, 1964, and the association withdrew from arbitration.

6. The promise was broken and the arbitration board sat on July 8, 1964. The arbitration board referred the matter back for negotiation on the government promise, again, that the government study would shortly be completed and a valuable package would be offered to all employees.

7. The report finally appeared in October 1964 and, in general, expressed the opinions of the committee rather than facts of research.

In other words it was just a propaganda document from the government.

8. They refuse to commit themselves on an effective date and will not talk about retroactivity.

Even after all this stalling they would not talk about retroactivity. These are the people who want to negotiate, according to the hon. Provincial Treasurer.

9. They refuse to discuss participation in OHSC based upon a committee theory that OHSC premiums are taxes.

This is negotiating? In other words, you set all your terms and then say, "Well, fellows do it that way and then we will have a settlement."

10. They now offer 60 per cent for a medical-surgical plan and refuse to increase participation in this area to offset lack of participation in OHSC.

11. They propose an insured medical-surgical plan which would not be equivalent to PSI and would remove benefits which the employees have paid out of their own pockets for years.

12. There was no agreement between the chief negotiators. The association negotiator remained available to seek agreement.

Now these are flatly contradictory statements. I do not think it is necessary here to try to determine who is right and who is wrong but it certainly shows the bad state, I would suggest, of feeling between the two parties.

13. The association counsel invited government counsel to continue negotiations on the areas of dispute.

14. Mr. McNab's letter was issued while the association was awaiting the reply from government counsel.

Now what kind of negotiating is this? The association invited government counsel to continue negotiations on the areas of dispute, and while the association was awaiting an answer on that, the government's representative sent a letter to the employees to try to destroy their confidence in their own association, to undermine their confidence in their representative. The hon. Prime Minister thinks that is a big joke. I would suggest—

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): I do not think it is a joke, I think you are a joke.

Mr. Bryden: Pardon? Well, I am going on the basis—

Mr. MacDonald: You are heading for an awful lot of trouble.

Mr. Bryden: They have already got it.

Mr. Chairman: Order, order!

Mr. Bryden: At any rate, the memo then contains a table which I will not read, comparing what the association was asking for and what the government was offering, and there is certainly a wide difference between the two and then it says:

Our demands are modest and represent far less than you would have received for many years past if you had been working for a good employer.

As I have already said, Mr. Chairman, I am not really inclined to ferret out the precise truth as between the various conflicting statements in these two documents. I do not think there is much point in trying to do that now, but I would like to impress upon the House and upon the hon. Provincial Treasurer the enormity of trying to go behind the backs of the official representatives as was clearly done in this case.

As a sort of a first test of negotiating procedures, the government did not really negotiate at all. It found that the association was making what it considered no doubt quite definite, and even perhaps unreasonable demands; and when it was found that they were continuing to do that, its answer was to do the thing that more than anything else was calculated to destroy confidence and respect.

Now I am suggesting to the hon. Provincial Treasurer that he can make all the trips to London, England, that he wants, he can make all the exhortations that he wishes to the association, but as long as the government carries on in this way there will be no good faith. When I see some of the statements that the association is now issuing, I would say that staff relations in this government at this moment are in a terrible state.

I have known the officers of the association, I have known of their work for a good many years, and I would say that they are extremely cautious men who are very careful not to make extreme statements. Yet they seem to be being provoked more and more into what appear to me to be pretty extreme statements. I think the government, instead of taking the position that the hon. Provincial Treasurer takes—if only these fellows would be reasonable everything would be fine—instead of that, I suggest the government should look at its own record and see if there are not ways in which it could be reasonable; because, after all, the way two parties get together is by both seriously trying to be reasonable.

Some hon. members: Carried!

Mr. Bryden: Of course, these gentlemen over here could not care less about how anybody is treated, but this is probably one of the most important matters before the House, Mr. Chairman.

I would certainly like to have from the hon. Provincial Treasurer an explanation of that letter sent out by Mr. McNab. I would like to have an assurance from him that such a thing will never happen again, if he sees fit to give it.

I would like to have something more than just bland statements to indicate that in future there is going to be a genuine effort on the part of the government to produce good relations; not to blame everything on the other fellow, not to exhort them, but to just look at its own records and do everything possible to establish a genuine negotiating relationship. We certainly have not got that yet. We may have a statutory basis for it, but we have not got the true spirit of negotiation yet.

Vote 307 agreed to.

On vote 308:

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, just a minute.

During the presentation of these estimates, I have resented the statement that we went behind persons backs, that we set traps and that we manoeuvred. I say that that is entirely incorrect. I cannot appreciate the remarks of the hon. member for Woodbine when he would stand up and say in this House that we have done nothing by way of fringe benefits for our civil service.

Mr. Bryden: No, on a point of order—

Hon. Mr. Allan: Well, you—

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Bryden: On a point of order, I said—

Mr. Chairman: The statement is out of order.

Mr. Bryden: I am sure I am entitled to correct a mistake.

I said no such thing. It is unfortunate that the hon. Provincial Treasurer apparently cannot understand what is being said. My remarks were directed entirely to your method of dealing with these people, not to the merits of fringe benefits at all.

Hon. Mr. Allan: No, they were not.

Mr. Bryden: Well, does the hon. Provincial Treasurer have to accept my statement or not, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Bryden: I am tired of him refusing to accept it.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, my recollection of the hon. member's statement was that we had paid nothing for insurance, that we have paid nothing. He created the impression that we have done nothing by way of fringe benefits.

Mr. Bryden: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Bryden: What the hon. Provincial Treasurer is referring to is a statement that I read from the civil service association; and I told him that I did not know all the ins and outs of the specific facts, but this was a statement they made at a specific time. It could be wrong. Certainly I did not make that statement. I do not say that you have done nothing about fringe benefits.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, I accept the explanation because, after all, the contribution that we have made to fringe benefits of our employees is one of the highest in the whole province—22 per cent of salary. How many employers have contributed that much? The purpose of the negotiations was largely to readjust. We recognize, as well as the employees recognize, that it would be better if this were adjusted and that something might be reduced and other benefits increased.

I listened to the statements from the hon. members opposite in connection with the visit of some of our people to London where they visited an insurance company. We were told that we sneaked around the back of the civil service association, that we were acting unilaterally. As I stated last night, I did not know who had gone to London, but I know now and I am going to tell you. This is the statement of that particular incident. I will begin at the beginning.

Active negotiation began between the government and the association, through their negotiators responsible to their respective sides, at the joint council in September, 1964. From the outset, the government suggested a medical-surgical plan similar to the group medical-surgical plan of the public service in Ottawa. This is the only public service that I know of that has such a plan, and because this covers 200,000 members of the federal civil service and the armed forces, we thought that this could be a guide. It was recommended to the government by the advisory committee on fringe benefits. It is the only such plan in Canada, as I have already mentioned, to which the employer contributes, and which is of a magnitude to provide useful comparisons with a plan for the Ontario civil service.

The federal government plan was referred to in the government's proposal of October 29, 1964, and also formed part and parcel of the government's presentation to the civil service arbitration board at its hearings in January, 1965.

During the last six months the government has been contacted by numerous insurance companies and other carriers such as Physicians Services Incorporated and Associated Medical Services. Discussions have taken place with representatives of several of these organizations, both before and after the receipt of the arbitration award on March 1, 1965.

The civil service association has also been contacted by prospective carriers of group insurance plans and has held discussions with representatives of some of these organizations. These include organizations which have been in touch with the government as well as some who have not. The association has retained as its consultant in this whole affair an agent of a life insurance company.

The London Life Insurance Company approached the government concerning the group insurance programme as early as December, 1964, on behalf of itself and a number of other insurance companies. These insurance companies are the principal carriers of the federal government's medical-surgical plan and one of these firms administers the plan.

In February it was suggested by representatives of the London Life that it might be helpful if representatives of the government and the association met with them in London to discuss some of the problems that a group insurance plan of this size might encounter. As a representative of the group of companies who insure and administer the federal plan, they were in a particularly good position to provide such helpful information.

The meeting of February 27, which took place at the suggestion of the insurance company, was attended by the executive secretary of the civil service association, Mr. Bowen, the government's director of staff relations and a member of the Treasury board staff. At this meeting there was a general consideration of the group life and group medical-surgical programme. The information was in response to questions raised concerning administrative problems.

Certain approximate premium rates were discussed, based on life insurance coverage that had previously been agreed to by the government and the association; based on the federal government medical-surgical plan, which had formed part of the government's proposal since the previous September, and based on questions asked by both the government's and the association's representatives at the meeting concerning approximate cost of including or deleting certain kinds of specific health benefits. At no time were any firm quotations given or received.

These discussions did not relate in any way to the arbitration award, which had not yet been received by the parties. No one knew what it was. Any reference to the federal government medical-surgical plan was due to the fact that the government had made proposals based on this plan during the previous five months and also due to the fact that the insurance company, as one of the principal carriers of the federal plan, was in a position to offer useful information based on it.

Mr. Chairman, I ask you if that is going around behind the back of the civil service association?

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, it is not the fact that they were going around behind the association's back; it is that the civil servants for years were paying 100 per cent out of their own pockets and had what they thought was top-quality medical coverage from PSI, but here were the insurance companies in cahoots with the government and going around PSI.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Oh, come off it now; we spend so much of our time straightening out your facts and when you do get them you will not accept them. You cannot take the facts that have been given to you here now and continue to reiterate that this government is in cahoots with any insurance company. You have been playing this tune for too long and it simply is not so and accept the fact.

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. member for Yorkview asked the hon. Provincial Treasurer some two or three weeks ago for an assurance that when tenders were put out for this coverage it would be a general tender to everybody, that the hon. Provincial Treasurer at that time had to be equivocal. He would not state specifically that it was going to be for everybody, and there is no doubt in the wide world that for a certain stage in the negotiations it was going to go to the insurance companies—

Hon. Mr. Allan: That is absolutely false.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Talk about drawing red herrings.

Mr. MacDonald: No wonder you have bad relations with your employees.

Mr. Bryden: The reason for the bad relations is obvious, but the hon. Provincial Treasurer told me he resented greatly my suggestion that the government went behind—

Hon. Mr. Allan: I do, because it is not true.

Mr. Bryden: I presented the evidence to you.

Hon. Mr. Allan: You certainly did not.

Mr. Bryden: Are you denying that this letter was on the bulletin board in this building? I saw it with my own eyes.

Hon. Mr. Allan: That is a statement of fact. There is nothing in there that was not correct.

Mr. Bryden: You see, Mr. Chairman, here is the difficulty. I am telling the hon. Provincial Treasurer that he will never have good relations with his employees because he does not understand what it is all about.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, I will not go to the hon. gentleman for advice.

Mr. Bryden: It might be a good idea if you went to someone for advice because you apparently need it. You obviously did not learn much from the people in Britain because they would not think of doing a thing like this.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): Neither would the Opposition there stir up trouble among the civil servants.

Mr. Bryden: Let us forget that old red herring. Are you accusing me of stirring up trouble in the civil service?

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bryden: In other words, everybody is to blame but you people. The civil service association is in a very bad state so far as its relations with you are concerned, but that is its fault. We dare to raise a matter of public policy here and we are stirring up trouble. You see, this is the attitude of the government, its smug complacency. Everybody is wrong except them. They can learn nothing.

But I am suggesting to the hon. Provincial Treasurer that it is still time he tried to learn something, because whether or not the statements here are true, is not the point. There is real dispute as to whether they are true. The civil service association says that many of them are not true. I am not even interested in trying to decide whether they are true or not. What I am trying to get across to the hon. Provincial Treasurer, and it seems impossible to get it into his head, is that even if every single thing there is true, this is the surest way in the world to create bad relations with your staff. They have an association. You recognize the association as, in effect, the counsel for the employees. It is their spokesman. When a group of people have a spokesman, surely you deal with the spokesman.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: He always says it six times.

Mr. Bryden: You should not go behind backs, but that is what you did. You went directly to the employees, instead of dealing with their designated spokesman and in a letter—

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: That is what the hon. member for Yorkview wanted me to do.

Mr. Bryden: Would you just stay out of this? You have nothing to contribute at all.

An hon. member: You haven't!

Mr. Bryden: The trouble is that anything in this realm is so far above the heads of these gentlemen they cannot understand it. But I would suggest to them that they might do a little reading in the field. At least I would suggest that they read the British Treasury paper of 1955 that I referred to, which is in the library. You see, if they would bother to burden themselves with a few facts, they might have a better understanding of these matters. That document, I might say, is only about 25 pages long, so they could read it in quick order. I would certainly suggest that anyone who read that would never think of this type of thing. I would suggest to the hon. Provincial Treasurer that this letter from Mr. McNab—

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member answer a question?

Mr. Bryden: Well, it depends what it is.

Hon. Mr. Allan: A reasonable question, not in the heat of discussion. If you had been representing government in these negotiations and these discussions, and circulars such as you have mentioned—by now, probably 20—had been sent out by the employee association accusing the government and accusing our joint council of things that they had not done, would you have never sent out a circular stating the facts as they were at that time?

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, if I was dealing with an association—

Hon. Mr. Allan: No—

Mr. Bryden: Do you want an answer, or do you not? You see, the trouble with you is—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bryden: If I was negotiating with an association such as the civil service association of Ontario, with a long record as a respectable and very restrained, I would say excessively restrained organization—and it was sending out memos along the lines that I have seen, I have not seen as many as you say there are, I have only seen a couple, I did not know there were as many—I would certainly be trying to understand why it was that relations were so bad. That should not be an association with which it is difficult to deal, but as long as the hon. Treasurer of the government takes the position that the association is always wrong—whenever there is a dispute it is the association that is wrong—there will never be good relations.

Hon. Mr. Allan: You just cannot understand.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: He can understand, but he does not want to.

Mr. Bryden: This is the position that the hon. Provincial Treasurer himself has taken right in this House. Every time a matter that has been in dispute has come before us, his statement has been to the effect that the association was difficult to get along with—

Hon. Mr. Allan: No, I never said the association was difficult to get along with.

Mr. Bryden: The government was being so reasonable.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. I have never said that the association was difficult to get along with. As I said yesterday, your great ambition is to provoke me to say that, and I am not going to say it.

Mr. Bryden: Yesterday that was not what you said I was going to provoke you into saying. What I was then supposed to be trying to provoke you into saying, you said today from a prepared statement. It was to the effect that the civil service association had been at fault, in effect, because of the difficulty the cleaning women found themselves in. This is your basic position in every statement you have made—that the government has been thoroughly reasonable, but for some reason or other these people do not want to accept your propositions.

Would negotiation not involve differences? You put forward something you think is reasonable and the other fellows do not think it is reasonable, so you think about it and talk about it for a while and then maybe you see it is not quite as reasonable as you think and that maybe they have a point of view. Why not just consider the possibility? But no; they are sending out memos or circulars or whatever they are that you say are unfair. Maybe they are. Were you not implying that those were unfair or unreasonable to you?

Hon. Mr. Allan: They did not represent the situation.

Mr. Bryden: Oh. They were false, in other words. So they were sending out memos that you think are false, but the basic point apparently does not come home to the hon. Provincial Treasurer in any form at all, except that these people are terribly unreasonable. He tries to justify the sort of thing that I have held up so many times, on that basis. A while ago he was denying that he had gone behind the backs of the association, but obviously he cannot deny that. Now, what he is presumably trying to say is that the government had a reason for going behind their backs.

Hon. Mr. Allan: This was not going behind anyone's back.

Mr. Bryden: It certainly was!

The association represents these people and you are going around behind the association directly to the people. It is on all fours with a situation in which one lawyer went directly to the client of another lawyer, bypassing that client's lawyer. This is exactly on all fours with that.

As I understand it, that is considered to be most unethical conduct in the law fraternity, and I would suggest to the hon. Provincial Treasurer that it is most unethical conduct in staff relationships. I would suggest to him that as long as he thinks that sort of thing is all right, there is no hope for sound labour relations in this province.

The fault is essentially on the side of the government, because it will not even try to negotiate in good faith. It wants to retain its ancient, antiquated, paternalistic attitude while presumably pretending to go through the forms of negotiation.

It is no use trying to blame me for trying to stir up trouble. The hon. Minister had his trouble long before I opened my mouth about the matter. Except with respect to the cleaning women, I have not said anything about staff relations in the public service in several years. I was waiting, hoping that a better relationship would be worked out; but as far as I can see it is just as bad as it was five years ago, or twenty years ago. I see little hope for improvement unless the hon. Provincial Treasurer and the government sit down and honestly reconsider their whole position and attitude in relation to the association.

Mr. Chairman: Is vote 308 carried?

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, I would like to bring to the hon. Minister's attention a matter, in a reasonable way if possible, a matter which I do not think is a subject of negotiation because this has been petitioned.

The paydays come on about the 9th and the 24th of each month, and when those dates fall on Saturdays and Sundays, the nearest day is payday. But a case such as we face this weekend, where the 24th comes on the Monday, which is a holiday, then payday does not come until Tuesday.

It seems to me in a case like this it might well be for the government to look into the possibility of payday coming on the Friday prior to the holiday if the holiday falls on a Monday. This just seems to me to make sense and it would help in the general employee relationship.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I am very sympathetic to your suggestion.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. Provincial Treasurer if this vote that is headed employee relations refers to a branch or other unit within the civil service commission? Is this a separate unit or branch?

Hon. Mr. Allan: This is public information branch, really. We have been endeavouring to strengthen this. We have published a magazine for almost a year now.

Mr. Bryden: It has nothing to do with labour relations?

Hon. Mr. Allan: No.

Vote 308 agreed to.

Mr. Chairman: This completes the estimates of The Department of Civil Service.

ESTIMATES, TREASURY DEPARTMENT

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer): Mr. Chairman, it is my privilege to present to the hon. members the estimates of The Treasury Department. With their permission, I will, in my opening remarks, express large amounts in rounded figures.

The total ordinary expenditure for 1965-66 is forecast at $176.7 million, consisting of $30 million in departmental expenses and $146.7 million for expenditure in connection with the public debt. This is an increase over the estimate for the previous fiscal year of $21.9 million, of which $9.9 million is for departmental expenses and $12 million for public debt expenditure.

The above amounts are gross payments on ordinary account, and thus do not represent the net cost to the government. Offsetting these gross payments for 1965-66 are $1 million in reimbursement of expenditures by the Province of Ontario Savings Office, and $33.7 million consisting mainly of interest on moneys loaned, advanced or invested by the province. Taking into account these applications of revenue to expenditure, the total net ordinary expenditure is forecast at $142 million. This is an increase of $14.1 million over the estimate for the previous fiscal year, of which $9.8 million is for departmental expenses and $4.3 million for net expenditure on the public debt.

I now propose to review the estimates for departmental expenditure, and then turn to expenditure on public debt.

About two-thirds of the increase in departmental expenses is attributable to two new items included in the estimates this year. These are a payment of $4,131,000 on the unfunded liability of the public service superannuation fund, and an estimated contribution of $2,500,000 for the employee group insurance plan which will commence this year.

The payment to the public service superannuation fund is being made in accordance with section 7 of the regulations under The Pension Benefits Act. The amount represents interest at 5 per cent on the initial unfunded liability of the plan as determined by updating the liability shown by the last actuarial report to January 1 of this year. The interest payable is at an annual rate calculated to prevent an increase in the initial unfunded liability of the plan.

The statutory payments to the public service superannuation fund are also included in the estimates of Treasury Department. In the coming fiscal year, these payments are estimated at $13,675,000, an increase of $2,183,000 over the estimate for the previous fiscal year.

During the past year, the staff relations branch of Treasury board has been established. This branch is important to our overall personnel policy in that it provides staff to carry out the government's side of negotiations with the civil service association. The branch has already proven its usefulness, and plays a significant role in negotiations on behalf of the official side of the Ontario joint council.

The Ontario committee on taxation is now concluding its work, and is expected to submit its report later in the year. The coming year will be especially active for the research staff of the department, as they will be examining the committee's report, as well as those of the tax committees reporting in other jurisdictions. They will also be co-operating with other departments and governments in the development of studies and material for the tax structure committee, which was set up at the last federal-provincial conference in April, 1964.

The coming year will be a notable one in the history of The Treasury Department, with the opening of the Treasury building which is now nearing completion. The centralization of departmental functions within one building will enable us to carry out Treasury operations more efficiently and effectively than is possible at present. By providing space in provincially owned buildings for employees now occupying rented office space, we will also be effecting a real dollar saving.

It is appropriate to note here that under the Treasury board, an active programme of records management has been commenced. Members generally will be aware that The Treasury Department has custody of all expenditure vouchers. The accumulation of these has reached the point that disposal of such old records is essential. With the concurrence of the provincial auditor and the provincial archivist, we have adopted as a first step, the policy of disposing of such records which are more than 20 years old.

Studies have recently been made by the revenue division staff with a view to improving the operations of several tax branches. Certain operations of the retail sales tax and corporations tax branches are being transferred to the department's computer. This process is extending over a period of time and, together with the implementation of the recommendations contained in the above-mentioned studies, is expected to produce a more efficient operation and a more effective use of staff. We do not expect that there will be any excess staff as a result of these changes, but rather that a better utilization of staff will result, together with improvements in administration which were not hitherto possible at a reasonable cost.

A few comments are in order on the subject of awards to breeders of thoroughbred and standard-bred horses and, generally, on the Ontario racing commission. By statute, the object of the commission is to govern, direct, control and regulate horse racing in Ontario in any or all of its forms. It is our view that the commission has carried out this object to the point where horse racing in Ontario has reached a high standard, and in so doing provides a recreational outlet for thousands, employment for many, encourages the breeding of good stock, and, I might add, contributes substantially to the revenues of this province.

A comparison with ten years ago may be of interest. The proceeds of the race tracks tax has grown from $3,950,000 in 1954-55 to an estimated $9,200,000 in 1964-65, an increase of 133 per cent. In the same period, awards to breeders of thoroughbreds have gone from $28,910 to $73,519, while awards to breeders of standard bred have gone from nil to $80,781. In 1964, more than 675 breeders received grants, the total of which represented only 1½ per cent of the race tracks tax. It is worthy of note also that in 1964, awards to breeders of standard bred exceeded for the first time the awards to breeders of thoroughbreds.

The estimates for The Treasury Department also provide for capital disbursements of $129.5 million. These consist mostly of loans and advances and repayments from special funds, and consequently do not have a direct bearing on the province's net debt. Loans and advances are estimated at $114 million, the principal being the advances to the Ontario Universities Capital Aid Corporation of $100 million and to the Ontario Junior Farmer Establishment Loan Corporation of $12.5 million. Of the $15.4 million to be repaid from special funds, the major item will be the payment of allowances, refunds, and so on, of $14.8 million under The Public Service Superannuation Act.

Turning now to expenditures on public debt, it is noted that expenditures thereon are estimated at $146.7 million in the coming year. This includes provision for sinking fund of $41.5 million to continue our debt management policy, which is directed towards an orderly retirement of the public debt. The remaining $105 million is the estimated gross cost of interest, and so on, on the debt. Offsetting this cost are, as I have mentioned, receipts of interest, and so on, of $33.7 million on loans, advances and investments, leaving an estimated net cost to the province for interest, etc., on the public debt of $71.5 million. This net cost of servicing the debt represents about 4.9 per cent of the province's total net ordinary and capital expenditures, and is equivalent to about three weeks' revenue.

In connection with the public debt, I would point out to the House that, in relation to the huge capital programme that has been carried out, the increase in net debt in recent years has been reasonable. In the three fiscal years ending March 31, 1965, while we have created physical assets estimated at more than $700 million, our net debt has increased by an estimated $214 million to $1,423 million. Thus, over this period, we have been able to finance, including provision for sinking fund, close to 70 per cent of our capital programme out of current revenue. I would also note that the increase in net debt over the past three years has averaged $71.4 million per annum, or $31.4 million less than the average increase in the preceding three years.

In concluding my remarks, I would be remiss if I did not express my appreciation to the officers and staff of the department. They have carried out their duties with diligence, care and dispatch, and I also wish to acknowledge my debt to my colleagues on the Treasury board. The fact that the board met on 88 separate occasions during the past fiscal year is an indication of the tasks carried out by the board and by its members in the continuous study of the financial affairs of the government.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Grey South): Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words about the estimates of The Treasury Department. I noticed that my hon. friend was the soul of brevity in his introduction to these estimates and it may be that I can follow suit. I do not want to traverse the whole ground that is embodied in the Treasury estimates. Some of my hon. colleagues, no doubt, will have something to say about the various items that go to make up the estimates as a whole. I want to deal particularly and in some depth with one or two items in the estimates that are of prime concern to me and I think to many other people in the province.

My manner in dealing with these will not be a particularly critical one—not that I would not like to be critical with my hon. friend, but it seems to me that in these areas I wish to discuss I can do it by suggesting where I think the policies of the government in power have been in error, and where it would serve the public purpose if these policies were changed.

I want to talk for a little while on the provincial savings bank. I have been a long time in the Legislature and have grown up almost with this bank. I want to say at once, Mr. Chairman, that I am very disappointed in the manner in which not only this government has failed in its opportunity, I would say, to make the provincial savings bank a real development bank for the province of Ontario, but the previous Liberal government has failed as well.

I remember one time in Mr. Hepburn's day, when he first came into power, we were finding difficulty in those days in getting the bankers to buy our bonds, so I am told, and Mr. Henry had difficulty before he left the ship—

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): That was the problem.

Mr. Oliver: —and we inherited that difficulty in some measure after the new government came into office. I was thinking that the provincial savings bank was used by Mr. Hepburn in those days as a threat against the banks if they would not come across. He would use the facilities that he thought he saw in the provincial savings bank to get out of the financial dilemma that the province was in at that time.

Of course, we did not have to use the facilities of the banks. Whether they would have been sufficient to alter the crisis by themselves or not, of course, I do not know. But the point I want to make is that after that little flurry, when it seemed as if the bank had a useful purpose and that it might serve in the public life of this province, it has subsided into a position of inactivity from that day to this. At the moment, stagnation would be the only word that one could apply that would describe with any accuracy at all, the position of the Ontario provincial savings bank.

We have an opportunity, I think—and I want to deal at some length with this. The figures reveal that the assets of the bank are little more today than they were ten years ago. If I can find the figures I will give them to you.

These are the figures, Mr. Chairman, that indicate that while other banks and lending institutions and new trust companies are coming into being every day and working to grasp a part of the savings of the people into their institutions, while all these institutions have grown by leaps and bounds in the last ten years, the provincial savings bank of this province has failed to keep company with that forward march. Indeed, one could look at the figures and would find that in 1958 the total assets of the provincial savings bank were some $79,100,000; in 1964, eight years later, and eight years in which there was a buoyant activity in the financial field when all these banks and trust companies were increasing their deposits and increasing their assets, we have fallen from $79 million in 1958 to $78 million in 1964. That, I suggest, is progress in reverse and it more than suggests that this bank is the forgotten child insofar as the governmental activity is concerned. It has lost its purpose; it can see no hope of coming into its own, no hope of living up to the original intention of those who wrote the law that brought into being this provincial savings bank. I want to deal with that, Mr. Chairman, for a moment or so.

On page 47 of the Revised Statutes of 1960, you will find The Agricultural Development Finance Act. The first section says:

The Treasurer of Ontario may borrow money by means of deposit in any amounts and from any persons and may open offices for this purpose at such places in Ontario as he finds expedient.

Then, in clause 3, the purposes for which this bank was founded, the purposes that were seen by those who framed the Act as being the road that this bank could follow to serve a public service. It says:

Moneys borrowed under this Act shall be used for any of the following purposes: for the public service—surely that is all-inclusive and very wide:

—for works carried on by the commissioners on behalf of Ontario; for the covering of any debt of Ontario on open account; for paying any floating indebtedness of Ontario, and for the carrying on of public works authorized by the Legislature of the province of Ontario.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman—and I want to buttress that suggestion with some argument—that if it pleases your honour, I will leave it for a few minutes.

It being 6 o'clock, p.m., the House took recess.

On vote 2201:

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Grey South): Mr. Chairman, when the House rose at six o'clock, I had put on record the pertinent sections of The Agricultural Development Finance Act, the legislation out of which the provincial savings offices grew, and I had enumerated the two sections of the Act which set out the purposes to which the savings bank or offices would apply themselves.

I want to make particular reference to the second one, in which the provincial savings offices were given the power, as I read it, to borrow money under this Act to be used for any of the following purposes: the public service, carrying on public works authorized by the Legislature, and so on.

I want to make particular reference to that quotation from the Act itself. I think we, in the House tonight, can marvel at the foresight of those who drew up this Act in the early 1920s. I think we should be happy indeed that the founders of the provincial savings bank saw in those offices an instrument by which and through which the development of the province could be enhanced and under which it could make progress.

I think it is rather interesting to recall that in the early 1920s it was foreseen that a development agency of some sort would be necessary if the full potential of the province was to be realized, and if it was necessary in the 1920s then certainly a development agency—call it a bank or savings office or whatever you like—is a thousandfold more necessary today.

We have, as we know, in most of the provinces of Canada, some sort of development agency. We have had the new suggestion—I guess that is all it is as yet—from the federal government that it is setting up a development agency. We have the province of Quebec actively in that field. Then I have on my desk Bill No. 50, which was passed in 1962 I believe, setting up a tremendous organization in the province of Quebec to foster development and to give support and aid to ventures which will distribute industry throughout the province and make for a balanced economy across the length and breadth of the province.

We have, of course—someone will be quick to remind me—a development agency in the province of Ontario. I want to say at once and as quietly as I can that I believe that agency up until the present time has been a dismal failure. It has been a dismal failure from two or three points of view.

In the first place the money that has been expended for the purposes contained in its legislation has been meagre in comparison with the problems that have to be met throughout the length and breadth of this province. The total amount of money lent by this organization to date would not do justice to the needs of one large municipality in the province of Ontario let alone to the whole ambit of the province.

Another thing is this, that in this development agency in this province there is no provision for the participation of the man and the woman on the street—the people generally throughout the province. I believe that it is fundamental for any development agency to have supporting it, the tens and the twenties and the hundreds of people scattered throughout the length and breadth of this province. I think they should and must be participants in a scheme that is going to be worthwhile, a scheme that is going to lend itself to the more even development of the province, a scheme that has as one of its main objectives the decentralization of industry, the helping of industry to start in those areas where at the moment it is difficult to sustain industry, and thus cut down this ever-increasing concentration of industry in a small area of the province.

Our future, I suggest, Mr. Chairman, will not be built soundly on a further concentration of industry in a small localized area of the province, but it will be established and it will be enhanced if we take note that half of our province is wealthy and the other half poor and if we see to it that those areas which need industry and which need the development that industry gives and the stability that it gives are helped through a development agency.

We are not going to do it, I suggest, with the kind of money we are spending and the kind of agency we have set up in the province at the present time. This agency, and I do not want to be unkind—I do not know why I should not be, but I do not want to be particularly—which has been set up in the province, up until the present time has been a sort of salvage organization. It has been a rescue mission. It has gone in where the industries are in difficulty, where they are almost bankrupt, and attempted to save them.

That, to my mind, is not the primary function of a development agency. That may be one of its tasks, maybe a small portion of its agenda perhaps, but the main function of a development agency—and it has not been seized by the one we have in this province, I can say that—is to reach out into the areas in this province that need development, and to stabilize industry that is already there, and to make provision for getting new industry in areas that must have new industry if they are going to survive and if they are going to play their full part in the overall development of the province of Ontario.

Mr. Chairman, the day has come in respect to our provincial savings bank, when one of two things must happen. We cannot allow the provincial savings bank to die a lingering death. That is what is happening to it at the present time. I still feel that there is a great role for the provincial savings bank in this province, if we breathe into that organization the lifeblood that we should inject into it, that it is capable of receiving and responding to. If we do that, it can become the real development agency of this province.

I see no reason, Mr. Chairman, why we cannot pay four per cent on deposits in the provincial savings bank. I cannot see why we cannot use the provincial savings bank as an agency through which we can sell provincial bonds in this province of Ontario. I think that is a field we have not tapped at all in Ontario. I think we would find, if we put our hearts behind this endeavour, that the response of the people of this province would be beyond our present dimensions of thinking. I believe that Ontario people want to be a part of the overall even development of this province. I think they want their money to count in the further development of this province of Ontario.

We have missed, I suggest, a golden opportunity in the past in that we have not asked them to contribute, in that we have not asked them to be shareholders and to be participants in the growing prosperity of the province. We can use the provincial savings bank as an instrument, as a focal point, through which we can induce and persuade the people of this province to invest in the province itself and in its future progress.

There are some, of course, who will say that we should not be competing with the other lending institutions. I do not share that view at all. I think we have a right and an obligation to collect money from our people for our own affairs, to finance our own undertakings as a province. I am sure that that would not be unfair competition. To me it would be good business and I say in concluding this portion of my remarks that there is a responsibility on this government at this time, in view of the condition of the provincial savings bank and in view of the fact that it is a dying organization at the moment, that either we shut up shop so far as the provincial savings banks are concerned or else we realize their potential and move to tap that potential in its full.

I am one of those who feels that we have the organization at the moment—20-some branches throughout this province—which can become the nucleus for a development policy in this province that will overshadow that which any other province in this country has. We will be missing a golden opportunity for the good of our province if we do not grasp this opportunity when it is presented to us.

I suggest to the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) that he take this very serious matter under active consideration.

I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that we can delay decision on it very much longer. Either we go ahead with the provincial savings banks or we admit defeat and abandon them. We are standing at the crossroads, and I hope we move in the direction of utilizing to the full the ability of the provincial savings bank to be a great instrument for good in the public life and the economic life of the province of Ontario.

The hon. Provincial Treasurer said something in his remarks about The Racetracks Tax Act and racing in general in the province of Ontario. I want to say a few words about that matter. I agree with my hon. friend that betting at races has certainly increased during this last number of years; I think there is a growing indication that it will increase even more. One is not safe to prophesy just how great the dimensions of interest will be that people will have racetracks in the future, but I am sure they will grow and one can look at figures and get an indication of what is happening.

In The Racetracks Tax Act, as the hon. Provincial Treasurer will know, there is a provision for a five per cent tax on the part of the province. This five per cent is subject to change by regulation. I want to review for a moment with the House some of the changes that have taken place in this tax imposition during the last number of years. In 1944, the tax was ten per cent; in 1950 it was 12 per cent; in 1953 it was eight; in 1954 it was seven, and in 1956 it was six. In other words, it has been six per cent since 1956.

Let us trace for a moment what is happening in respect to the amount of money wagered on the tracks. In 1943, with the five per cent tax we collected $1 million on wagering of some $21 million. In 1944, with a ten per cent tax, we collected $2.2 million on wagerings of some $22 million. In 1950, with a 12 per cent tax, we collected $4.1 million on wagerings of $32.9 million. In 1951 to 1964 the tax was reduced to eight per cent and then to seven and then to six in 1956.

In 1964, with a six per cent tax, the one that has been invoked for the last eight years, we collected $5.9 million on bets of $99.4 million. That, of course, is in the thoroughbred section. When you come to standard breeds, you find that in 1960, there was $8.6 million wagered. In 1964, there was $57.4 million bet on tracks and we got a tax this last year of $3.4 million.

I think we should look at that in this way. In New York state, for instance, the wagering last year was some $703 million, just in that area. They collected by a ten per cent imposition, some $74 million. During the years, they have steadily increased the amount of the tax, and while the amount of the tax went up, the wagering and the betting still increased on the tracks. I am saying that, to recall that in Mr. Frost's time, in 1956, when the debate was carried on when he lowered the tax to six per cent, some of us opposed the lowering to six. We asked Mr. Frost to tell us why it was being lowered to six per cent in 1956. I remember very clearly his explanation at that time. He said that he felt and the government felt that if we taxed too high, if we had the rate much above six per cent, then we would get into the area where the law of diminishing returns applied.

Now, I did not believe that then and I do not believe it now. I think we could have held to our higher tax rate and we would have found today that the figures on betting at the tracks would be comparative to what they are. I mean the tax, so long as it is not an exceptionally high tax, it seems to me has little or nothing to do with the amount of money that is bet and with the number of people who participate in the sport of kings, as it is called.

I suggest to the hon. Provincial Treasurer, in all sincerity, that I think it is time we had a look at this tax in the province of Ontario. When we need money as badly as my hon. friend pretends to need it, then certainly if we had an impost in 1950 of 12 per cent, there is not any justification at all for having an impost of six per cent in 1964; none whatever. I suggest that particular industry is not contributing its just share to the revenues of this province. I make that suggestion for an analysis to my hon. friend at this time.

My hon. friend said something when he was speaking about the breeder award grants. I want to say just a word on that as I conclude because I feel, for one, that these grants to breeders who have winning horses is necessary in this province if we are going to maintain and if we are going to increase the calibre of the horses at the tracks. I think it is necessary.

In the debate last year, the House will recall that we did not have any figures to indicate what each recipient receives by way of award. These figures are now available and I want to again reiterate that in my opinion these grants are necessary for the improvement of the calibre of horses in this province; but I do suggest to the hon. Provincial Treasurer, in all sincerity, that I think that the government of this province of Ontario should not be paying those awards. I believe that the industry itself is well enough established in this province and has the interest of increasing the breed of horses so much in mind that they themselves should pay their breeders' award and not the provincial government.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Oliver: The state of New York, as my hon. friend probably knows, pays nothing by way of breeder awards. The industry as a whole pays those awards. I think it is time in this province that we revamp our legislation, our grant system, to the point where we would say to the industry that we believe these awards are necessary but that they should pay them and not the people of the province of Ontario.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Chairman, I am happy to associate myself with at least some of the remarks that my hon. friend from Grey South has made. His eloquent presentation of certain subjects, makes it unnecessary for me to deal with them at any length.

I was particularly interested in his comment on the savings offices. A few years ago the hon. Provincial Treasurer, before one of the standing committees—I forget which one it was—said that he was going to look into ways and means of expanding the operations of the savings offices because he regarded them as a useful source of funds for the Treasury of the province. I have been raising that matter with him every year, I think, since he made that comment. Needless to say he has done nothing about it, but he said that a few years ago.

I have been raising the matter with him every year since, more or less at any rate, and last year I recall that he said that the trust companies are now offering such high interest rates on savings deposits that it is hardly worth the government's while to look upon the savings offices as a source of short-term capital.

That may be true—I am not completely sure that it is true and I have not yet clarified the matter to my own satisfaction, but let us assume that it is true. I would suggest to the hon. Provincial Treasurer that he could look upon the savings offices as a source of long-term capital. I would suggest to him in particular that it would be much better to raise long-term capital through voluntary savings than through the method now envisaged in the Canada Pension Plan of imposing a levy on the poor to force them to make capital available for some of the capital requirements of the provinces and municipalities.

I think that the hon. Provincial Treasurer should again look at ways and means of expanding the operations of the savings offices. Those offices, as I understand—and I confirmed my understanding with the hon. member for Grey South who is quite familiar with the entire history of these operations—were first established by the Drury government in 1921. Every government that succeeded that Drury government would have liked to have ditched them, but they never quite dared to do so.

Instead, my hon. friend for Grey South has suggested, they tried to destroy them by attrition. I think it is a significant indication of the fact that people want these savings offices that they have survived. Notwithstanding the fact that succeeding governments have done everything possible to torture them to death, they are still there; but the government makes them as unattractive as possible and as inaccessible as possible.

At a time when trust companies are moving to shopping plazas and engaging in what used to be regarded as a most undignified form of advertising, the government does nothing to promote the savings offices. It makes no effort to mobilize this capital that it could at least use for its own long-term purposes, even if the interest rates were not attractive enough for short-term requirements.

I would ask once again that the hon. Provincial Treasurer remember his good resolve of a few years ago and consider doing something about it; at least make the investigation that he said he was going to make and at least make the offices that now exist attractive offices. They are located in ancient crumbling buildings with no attempt made to modernize them, although the banks and trust companies are making very modern offices available. There has been no attempt to expand their activities by increasing the number of branches. I believe that the government should show a little initiative and make a genuine effort to use these offices for the benefit both of the people of the province as individuals and of the people of the province collectively through their government.

I do not quite go along with my hon. friend for Grey South in regarding these savings offices as representing a kind of development fund. I am in favour of development funds, I think the government of this province should follow the example of Quebec and get into that field; but development funds as I see them are essentially for mobilizing risk capital. Admittedly they reduce the risk by spreading it, but it is still risk capital that is involved.

I do not think that people who are putting money in savings offices regard their money as risk capital. Therefore, I think we should have both. We should have a development of the savings offices and we should also have a genuine development fund in which the people of the province could invest whatever surplus funds they have available to assist in provincial development.

I also concur in the proposition that has been put forward—and not for the first time by any means—that the hon. Provincial Treasurer should reconsider the whole basis of the tax on parimutuel betting. I think my hon. friend for Grey South established well the fact that the rate the government now imposes is completely antiquated and unrelated to modern conditions. It is possible to argue that 10 or 15 years ago this industry could have been regarded as a development industry with taxes kept at a low level so as not to discourage development. That is certainly not the case now.

The jockey club is in the position that it just does not know what to do with its surpluses. It has modernized every track that it considers it is profitable to operate—in fact, there are extremely plush establishments at its various tracks—it has money rolling in so fast that I do not know what it is going to do to hide it in the future.

I think the hon. Provincial Treasurer should relieve them of this embarrassment. He should increase the tax on parimutuel betting to, shall I say, ten per cent, in line with New York state. If he did that he would be able to get at least some of the money that would assist him to cease paying starvation wages to approximately a third of the civil service of this province.

This would be a good source of revenue. Let him get rid of all these wage rates of less than $3,000 a year, which are now paid to 17 per cent of the civil servants. Let him get rid, as far as he can, of all wage rates below $3,600 a year which are now paid to about 35 per cent of the civil servants. This is a source he could use. In fact, some of the civil servants whose wages he increased might even pay some of it back by going out to the racetracks.

I am suggesting to him that this is a source of funds. It is not a tremendous source in relation to the total Budget of the province, but it is still a useful source that he ought to be exploiting.

I would like to mention one other area where I think our revenue capacity could be significantly increased. I do not want to get into the general field of taxation, even though it is relevant, I believe, under these estimates, since we have a Royal commission inquiring into this matter. It has been inquiring into it for some time; there is also a federal Royal commission inquiring into it.

I sometimes get a little alarmed about Royal commissions. They get started and sometimes they never seem to finish. The Royal commissions on taxation have been an unconscionable time doing their job. I hope they will present reports fairly soon. I am beginning to think we should not really wait for them to complete their inquiries before starting some reforms in our tax structure.

However, I am deterred from making any such suggestion. It is my observation that whenever Tory governments start reforming the tax structure it is usually for the purpose of soaking the little fellow and relieving the big fellow.

Mr. G. H. Peck (Scarborough Centre): As usual you are wrong.

Mr. Bryden: This is particularly true of the small "t" Tory government we have at Ottawa which recently did make some change in the tax structure both by—

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): That is an eloquent comment.

Mr. Bryden: Both by making an across-the-board reduction of ten per cent and also by imposing levies under the Canada Pension Plan. When you take the two together, you find that overall the little fellow is paying more taxes while the rich fellow is receiving a significant reduction in taxes.

I will not go into the figures; I presented my calculations on a previous occasion in this House. This is what happened when that small "t" Tory government in Ottawa went to work to make some revisions in the tax structure. I do not want to precipitate anything more like that. I am rather inclined to wait for the Royal commission to report in the hope that they might take a more progressive view of the tax situation, and I will not press the government for any major reforms in the tax system at this time.

However, there are two smaller reforms that I think should be considered. One of them relates to the income tax. The government, of course, does not levy the income tax payable in this province, but it receives a significant and increasing proportion of it. Therefore it has an interest in any proposal that might help to increase the yield. There is no question in the world, Mr. Chairman, that an area where the tax collector should start to ride herd is that of expense accounts.

The late Mr. Garland, when he was Minister of National Revenue, indicated that he was going to crack down in this field. I would judge from some of the cries of anguish I have heard from the poor rich that some cracking down has been done. The amount of chiselling that goes on in this field, nevertheless, is quite unjustifiable. A businessman will take a trip to Europe and probably take his family with him. He will say that he is visiting the company's European offices. He may spend two per cent of his time visiting the company's European offices saying hello to the local manager, and the balance of his time on a holiday. Yet he will charge this up to the company.

Mr. Peck: Not for his family.

Mr. Bryden: Probably not, as the hon. gentleman says, not for his family, just for himself. In other words he charges his own holiday up to the company. So the government gets cheated in two different ways: (a) This is income that this man enjoyed. He got his income in kind in the form of a free holiday. He ought to be paying tax on it, but he escapes it. (b) The company charges it up as an expense. It ought to be paying tax on it but it escapes that tax. So the government pays for most of this man's holiday.

This sort of thing, which is possible, of course, only in the higher income levels, ought to be brought to an end. The late President Kennedy had plans to do something along that line in the United States, but the business advisory council moved in and that was the last that was ever heard of that proposal. His proposals to reduce taxes were implemented but his proposals to reform the tax structure and tighten up collections somehow got lost along the way. I am afraid that similar proposals in Canada have been lost along the way, too. But it is time something was done about them. Many of these expense accounts are adequately described by the old term "swindle sheets." I think the income tax authorities in The Department of National Revenue ought to crack down on them.

I know that the hon. Provincial Treasurer does not have any direct control over this matter but he has a real interest in it because a significant part of his revenue comes from this source. I am suggesting to him that he should take up with the federal government the question of plugging up some of the loopholes in The Income Tax Act, out of which revenue is spilling in torrents. This is one of the most important loopholes.

The final matter that I want to mention briefly, Mr. Chairman, relates to a tax that is exclusively within the provincial field—the provincial sales tax. A few days ago the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Welch), who unfortunately is not here at the moment, raised with the hon. Provincial Treasurer the matter of the sales tax as it applies to children's clothing. I pointed out to the hon. Provincial Treasurer last year that it would appear that the sizing standards being used in the administration of The Sales Tax Act are completely out of date. We all know that children of this generation are substantially larger than they were 10, 20, 30 years ago, yet I take it that the sizing standards being used are those of a good many years ago. The result is that the sales tax has to be paid, in many cases, on clothing which is definitely for children but does not fall within the antiquated size standards that the government is using.

The hon. member for Lincoln verified from his own experience that he has had to pay sales tax—or his wife has had to pay sales tax—on clothing bought for his children. They definitely are in the age group it was envisaged would be exempt from the tax, but because of the sizing standards that are used by the administration, it is found that the tax has to be paid.

I can assure the hon. Provincial Treasurer that this is not a peculiar experience of the hon. member for Lincoln. I have had many complaints from mothers of children of eight, ten and 12 years of age, that they regularly have to pay the sales tax in buying clothing for their children. I think the hon. Provincial Treasurer should get down to business and do something about this. Maybe my explanation is wrong, maybe I am wrong when I say the standards they use are out of date; but whether it is because they are out of date, or whatever the reason, they are clearly wrong.

Mr. W. D. McKeough (Kent West): You are wrong.

Mr. Bryden: The hon. member for Lincoln at least supports what I say, and if you were in touch with reality you would know that is true, too.

Mr. McKeough: He is not here today.

Mr. Bryden: The hon. member for Lincoln, speaking in the Budget debate stated that he had to raise this matter in the House, otherwise he would not be allowed to go home. His wife had told him that if he did not raise it in the House he could not come back home that weekend—that was last weekend.

Mr. McKeough: He did not say that at all. He did not say that at all.

Mr. Bryden: He managed to get back home last weekend because he did raise it in the House.

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer): Now he is not here.

Mr. Bryden: Maybe she is keeping him there. Maybe he is a hostage, I do not know. At any rate, Mr. Chairman, I am sure that a woman who would be intelligent enough to marry an intelligent man like him will not be satisfied with that answer for very long. She may be satisfied for a week or two to have the hon. member raise the matter in the House, but I am sure that she will begin to realize there is very little future in that unless the hon. Provincial Treasurer does something about it.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Bryden: We have the juvenile section over here in full flight again tonight.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Bryden: I trust they do not bother you, out of order as they may be; they do not bother me a bit.

I would suggest to the hon. Provincial Treasurer that for the benefit of our fine hon. member for Lincoln, if for no one else, he should do something about this. I would hate to think that the hon. member for Lincoln is now being held hostage through the hardheartedness of the hon. Provincial Treasurer, or alternatively that he may in future find himself unable to go home because the hon. Provincial Treasurer will not accept the perfectly reasonable proposition that has been put to him. I am sure that when he thinks it over he will do something about this. When I raised it with him in the past it had no effect on him, and I am hoping the hon. member for Lincoln may be more successful than I was.

Mr. Chairman, before I sit down I would like to call to the attention of the hon. Provincial Treasurer question No. 26 on the order paper which has been there for at least two months. I am certain that the hon. Provincial Treasurer must have the answer to the question.

I stepped out of the House for a few minutes this afternoon and while I was out I believe he made some references to the grants that are paid to the thoroughbred horse society, also to the standardbred horse society, but I think he spoke only in aggregates. He will notice that my question asks not so much about aggregates as the distribution of the grants. I am asking this question, and I have asked it only in terms of the thoroughbred horse society. I am not interested in the answer with regard to the standardbred society. My question was, and the hon. Provincial Treasurer had before him a similar question last year: In the current fiscal year—that means the fiscal year ended March 31, 1965; this question was put on the order paper some substantial time before the end of that fiscal year—(1) How many breeders received grants from the government's annual grant made to the Canadian thoroughbred horse society? (2) What breeders received in excess of $1,000 in individual grants and how much did each of them receive?

As I say, the hon. Provincial Treasurer had plenty of notice of this question. I think it is reasonable to ask him to answer it now.

Applause.

Mr. Chairman: Order, order! Applause from the gallery is not permitted.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, in replying to some of the comments of the hon. gentlemen, I would like at first to say that it is always interesting to listen to the hon. member for Grey South. As a rule, and this was so again tonight, his criticism is usually constructive and I appreciate the thought that he had given to this matter and some of the suggestions that he made. I am not sure, but I might ask the hon. gentleman if he was not in the House as a member of the government when the savings banks were instituted.

Mr. Oliver: No, that was just a little before my time.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I thought the hon. member had been here then.

Mr. Oliver: No, five years before.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I recognize the criticism in connection with the savings banks. I would point out that they are not savings banks and we should not use the word "bank," we should use the words "savings offices," which they are. Especially in view of the feeling of our friends at Ottawa at the present time with respect to provincial banks we had better keep our savings offices.

I realize that there is a good deal to be said for using these funds for development purposes. There is something to be said with respect to the fact that these have not been expanded to a greater extent than they have. However, I would like to point out that in our overall policy of obtaining funds for the use of this government through the years, this has been a useful tool in this connection and it does provide us with about $80 million of money which really costs us about four per cent. Keeping that in mind and recognizing the suggestion of the hon. member—I am not sure whether it was the hon. member for Grey South or the hon. member for Woodbine—that the interest rate be raised, all the hon. members in this House will realize that there has been intense competition for savings, especially during the last few years and since the time of much greater competition in the trust company field, and they will remember that the funds we obtain in this way, that is the cost of the funds, must be looked at on the basis of the cost of our money that we receive. If we were to increase our interest rate one per cent, we would find that those funds would then cost us more than the average cost of the funds that we are borrowing in the manner in which we are borrowing them today.

Mr. Oliver: Will the hon. Provincial Treasurer tell me what the average cost is?

Hon. Mr. Allan: The average cost would about 5.25 per cent.

Mr. Oliver: You are getting it for four now on a three per cent basis. If you raise it to four, it would cost you not more than five, which would be a comparative rate.

Hon. Mr. Allan: This is a pretty close margin. Mention was made of Ontario government savings bonds. We have looked at this very carefully and I would not say that at some time we may not want to have Ontario government savings bonds, but we would not introduce them as long as we are able to obtain the funds we need at the cost of the funds we are now obtaining. We are getting this money at a lesser cost than if we had the Ontario savings bonds. These are a revolving fund, as it were, and not particularly a source of cheap money. Of course, the cost of savings bonds in other provinces is in the neighbourhood of five per cent, and this policy does not lend itself as well to the overall borrowing policy as does the policy which we are following at the present time, when we know when the maturities are going to happen.

I appreciate the remarks from the two hon. members in this connection and assure them that we are always looking at our Ontario savings offices and will continue to look at them. I do not agree that they are dying. As a matter of fact, we have had a steady policy of improving these offices during the last few years to a much greater extent than has been so before.

The other matter that was mentioned had to do with our taxes in connection with our racing in this province. I would point out to the hon. members of the House that I have given this matter a good deal of consideration, too. Although the opinion was expressed tonight that we should increase the percentage of our tax on the money that is wagered, I would like to point out that as a result of a careful study throughout this whole North American continent, there are only two or three small states that take a greater percentage of the money that is wagered than we do in this province.

In each of the provinces of Canada, the track takes the same amount as is taken here. In connection with that, I should point out that we do not determine the take of the track; this is determined by the federal government. It is part of the criminal code, and the criminal code places a limit upon the amount that the tracks can take of the wagers. This amount is nine per cent and this is taken by the tracks in every province in Canada.

I would like to correct the hon. member for Grey South in his figures on New York. They have a complicated formula, and although it begins at ten per cent, it drops to nine per cent, and even to four per cent. I am not familiar with the details of the sliding scale but they do not take ten per cent. It is generally agreed, and you will get those who are supposed to be authorities on horse racing to agree, that the greatest amount of money can be obtained from the betting if the take on the part of the track and the state or the province is 12.50 per cent, although the states are all practically higher than that.

In New York state, the take is 15 per cent. Here it is 15.50 per cent. In Kentucky the levy of the two is 14 per cent; the state takes four per cent on a sliding scale to six, and the track, of course, the balance. In California, which is where a great deal of betting takes place, the overall takeout is 14 per cent; the state takes five per cent on a sliding scale to eight per cent. Maryland, another state where there is a good deal of racing, the takeout is only 13 per cent, the state takes five per cent.

The only states I see here where the take is greater than 15 per cent are the states of Vermont, Rhode Island, Ohio, Maine and Louisiana. So the takeout here is a reasonable amount.

When you consider that we have nothing to say about the amount that the track is able to take out, it leaves us, I think, with the six per cent, which seems to be a reasonable amount. I am quite sure it enables us to get as great a revenue from the operation as any percentage that we could take out. You have to remember that—

Mr. Oliver: The 12 per cent in 1950 must have been in the view of the hon. Minister an unreasonable amount then, was it?

Hon. Mr. Allan: I would point out to the hon. member, and I have the figures here, that in 1955 our takeout was seven per cent, our revenue was $5,154,000. The following year it was reduced to six per cent and the revenue was $6,363,000.

Mr. Oliver: That does not seem right.

Hon. Mr. Allan: It proves that we got more money, more—

Mr. Oliver: Because more people were betting.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Certainly more people were betting. This is the principle that is acknowledged by those who are supposed to be knowledgeable in the horse racing business.

Now I make no excuses for the grants—that is the breeder's award to the various breeders. I have looked into this a little bit this year. I find that the percentage of winners at our tracks, that is the percentage of winners that are Ontario-bred horses in both the thoroughbred and the standardbred, is steadily increasing. This is because of the improvement in our stock.

I was surprised to find that even now we expend a million dollars each year in purchasing standardbred horses in the United States. We look at this province of ours and think of the splendid climate we have, and certainly some of those who are interested in the developing of our horse breeding have the feeling that instead of being purchasers of horses in other areas we should be raising horses here to sell in the United States.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Are some not sold to the United States?

Hon. Mr. Allan: There are some, but nothing like the amount we buy from the United States. I was very interested in the state of Florida. The state of Florida pays breeders' awards of 10 per cent of the purse. They will tell you now that in the last 10 years—as a result of their effort in improving their breeding stock and in developing the industry, the state has had two winners in the last ten years in the Kentucky Derby. They give credit to the breeders' awards in assisting to improve the standard of the breed in that state.

There was some discussion and something in the papers a year or so ago with respect to doing away with breeders' awards. Surprisingly, the letters that I received—and I think this was pretty general—were received from the small breeders. I think we have to remember that horse racing is sport, that those who are interested like to have a little something of the unknown in it; and as no doubt it is in the minds of some persons who, it is said, buy sweepstakes tickets, they are always hopeful that they are going to make a killing. I think that the breeder's award has a value altogether out of proportion to the amount of money that is paid out in these areas. I think we should continue this, I think we should do everything we can do to develop the breeding in this area.

I can give you the number of breeders of thoroughbreds, the number of breeders receiving over $2,000. I look at this and it is very encouraging. In 1962 it was three, in 1963 it was four, in 1964 it was five.

Mr. Bryden: How many over $1,000?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Five in 1962; 16 in 1963; and 13 in 1964.

Mr. Bryden: That includes the five who received over $2,000, does it?

Hon. Mr. Allan: I do not have the names. I am not ashamed of the names, I do not know who they were. I suppose you are referring to E. P. Taylor. I suspect he was one of them, but mind you, I think he did a great deal for horse racing and a great deal for our province—

Several hon. members: Hear! Hear!

Mr. Bryden: Could the hon. Provincial Treasurer tell us the total amount received by all breeders and also the total amount received by the 13 who got more than $1,000 apiece?

Hon. Mr. Allan: No, I do not believe I have that information.

Mr. Bryden: How many got grants of any kind, of any amount, in 1964?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Last year, in the thoroughbreds, there were 529.

Mr. Bryden: Five hundred and twenty-nine?

Hon. Mr. Allan: No, that was the standardbreds. I am sorry. The thoroughbreds, 147. The average size of the award was $500.13. You will be very happy to know that Mr. Taylor got much less last year than he had been getting.

Mr. Bryden: How much less?

Hon. Mr. Allan: It is an indication of the improvement in the breed, that is the progress that other breeders are making.

Mr. Bryden: The total number of qualifying breeders was down from the previous year if there were only 147 of them. It was 160 the previous year.

Hon. Mr. Allan: There were 156 the previous year, but the average size of the award last year was $500.13. As we improve the standard of the horses, the attendance at the track increases, the betting seems to increase, and the revenue that we receive as a province increases.

To give you the number of the standard-breds, last year there were 529. Naturally, with the increase in the harness tracks no doubt this number will continue to grow. Of the total amount last year, as I already stated today, the standardbreds received greater awards than do the thoroughbreds.

I feel this: It is decided that we are going to have horse racing in Ontario; once this has been decided I think that every hon. member here will agree with me when I say that we want such horse racing to be well conducted. I think it is. I give the racing commission credit for doing a good job in the carrying on of the racing in the province, and I give credit to those who have provided good equipment and good tracks, and who carry them on in a way that is a credit to the industry.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, with respect to item No. 10, in vote 2201, the grant for the Canadian thoroughbred horse society, is put in nominally again at $70,000, I have no doubt that is approximately the figure the hon. Provincial Treasurer—

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, if I could explain to the hon. member. We did not know the amount. They were larger than we expected they were, and the $70,000 this year really is not going to be enough.

Mr. Bryden: For the thoroughbreds either? I understand it is not for—

Hon. Mr. Allan: No, I do not think it will be.

Mr. Bryden: At any rate, the amount that is put in is $70,000, and it will be somewhere in that neighbourhood. I want to emphasize again I am talking only about item No. 10, grants to the Canadian thoroughbred horse society. The hon. Provincial Treasurer was, shall I say, somewhat less than fully illuminating in answering the question I asked, which was: How many breeders received grants, what was the total amount that all of them got, how many breeders received more than

$1,000, and how much did each one of them get? The hon. Provincial Treasurer was a little less—

Hon. Mr. Allan: I almost answered your question tonight.

Mr. Bryden: You almost did, but you have had it in front of you for two months and I am sure it would take 15 minutes to get the information.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I am going to get it for you, too.

Mr. Bryden: No doubt, but failing that, at the moment I will have to go on the basis of the information I now have. I would judge from the answer the hon. Provincial Treasurer gave to my question, as far as it went, that the situation continues very much as it was in the past. This year 147 breeders qualified for some sort of grant. Last year, I have the figure as 160, but the hon. Provincial Treasurer says 156, so I will take it at that. The total number is down. The number getting $1,000 or better is up a bit. The number getting $2,000 or better is up a little bit too. Only a small minority got more than $1,000 and an even smaller minority got more than $2,000, and yet that small minority got most of the money. That is what I object to.

Hon. Mr. Allan: No, that is not so.

Mr. Bryden: I will take it on the basis of the figures for last year. I suppose it would be the 1963 racing season, the fiscal year ending March 31, 1964, for which I have complete figures. In that year, the total distributed was approximately $70,000. I do not have the exact amount, but I think it was a little over $70,000.

Ten breeders got $1,000 or more. Those ten between them got $37,000, or more than half of the total. I say more than half is the lion's share, so a small minority got the lion's share of the money.

Mr. Peck: They have got more horses than the others.

Mr. Bryden: I have no doubt there are many reasons why they are getting the larger amount. One poor barefoot boy from Bay Street, by the name of E. P. Taylor, got $3.75 less than $21,000, or by himself he got about 30 per cent of the total. Some of the other poor breeders that needed this encouragement so desperately were people such as Beasley, Conklin, Armstrong, Conn Smythe and so on. I am suggesting to the hon. Provincial Treasurer—

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): They support your job, do not forget.

Mr. Bryden: I am suggesting to the hon. Provincial Treasurer that the purpose which he has in mind in making these grants is defeated by the method of distribution. Nobody has to encourage E. P. Taylor to breed horses. I am quite satisfied that he will do it whether you give him $21,000 or not. But I could think of many small breeders who could very well be encouraged if they got a little bit out of this pot.

The little fellows are being squeezed out; the big fellows are taking it all. It is small change to some of these rich men. I would doubt if E. P. Taylor even knows he gets it and I am sure that he could not care less whether he gets the $21,000 or not. To be honest about it, Mr. Chairman, I see no reason why the people of this province should hand out $21,000 to E. P. Taylor, or whatever the amount is this year. It was $21,000 last year and it was $18,000 the previous year. There is no valid reason that I can think of, especially when we have people in this province who have a much greater need for the money than E. P. Taylor will ever have, and especially since he has now moved off somewhere to the Caribbean, I am not sure where, to escape as much income tax as he can.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): The insurance companies are probably behind it. It is a conspiracy.

An hon. member: You do not know what you are talking about.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Bryden: I certainly would not go to you for advice in any case. The figures I have cited are figures provided by the hon. Provincial Treasurer, and the hon. member can judge for himself how reliable they are. I, personally, accept them as reliable but I would not care to speak for the hon. member for Scarborough Centre.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, ignoring the cheap comments from the cheap seats and getting on with the business of the House, I would like to move that item 10 of vote 2201 be struck out, that is the item for the Canadian thoroughbred horse society. I am not necessarily against the policy of awarding grants, but I think the basis of doing it is so completely wrong. The type of inane, moronic comment coming from there indicates, I think, that I have a pretty good argument. They cannot answer with logic, they can answer only with inanities.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I move that that item be struck out of the estimates.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Bryden moves that item 10 of vote 2201 be struck out.

All those in favour of the motion—

Mr. Oliver: Mr. Chairman, I think there are one or two misconceptions that ought to be cleared up before we vote on any amendment. One is, if you agree, as I agree, that breeder awards are valuable, then I think you have to agree that the one who gets the most by way of awards has rendered the greatest contribution toward the improvement of the breed. As I said when I was speaking a little while ago, I am absolutely in favour of breeder awards, but I think the day has come when those awards should be shifted from the public purse to the shoulders of the industry itself.

It is pretty hard to tell the little fellow—I should not say little fellow, but I do not mean it in any derogatory sense; the ordinary chap in the country—it is pretty hard to tell him that we should be paying any particular individual $10,000 or $15,000, even if it is to improve and better the breed of horses. While I think it is valuable, I think it is valid for me to say that the time has come when we should have the industry pay these awards. There is no reason in the world why it cannot, and let the public off the hook. The public has served the association and the breeder well through the nursery stages, but we have got to the place now where they can stand on their own feet and so, Mr. Chairman, I want to move an amendment to the amendment:

That the racing commission direct that awards to breeders be paid by the industry rather than by the government.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Oliver moves—

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a very few words in connection—

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): We have not had the motion.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Oliver moves an amendment to the amendment—or an amendment to the motion:

That the racing commission direct that awards to breeders be paid by the industry rather than by the government.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, I have only a very few words that I want to say in this respect and they are these: that my feeling toward breeder awards is entirely an impersonal one. I have no concern as to who gets the breeder awards. I am quite willing that everyone else should make up his mind as he likes, and perhaps I have that privilege too, but I have the feeling that breeders' awards are given for the purpose of improving the standard of horses that carry on the races on our tracks in this province, and that is the reason that I think what we are doing is a sensible thing to do.

The other point that I would like to make is that it is essential, if we are going to build this industry on a sound foundation, that the purses be good, because if the purses are not good—and we find that this is so to some extent in this province now—a number of our good horses leave the tracks here in the summer and race in the United States where the purses are larger.

I can hardly agree with the hon. member for Woodbine when he said we have matured. It is my opinion that this industry is a growing industry and that we have not matured, and I am firmly of the opinion that, as outlined in the estimates, it is the proper course to follow.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, before the debate proceeds any further, I would like a ruling on this alleged amendment to my motion. As I heard it, it would have this House direct what other people would do with their money. I cannot see that that is relevant, either to the estimates before us or to my motion. My motion is to strike a certain item out of the estimates.

The amendment proposes that certain other people should be required to pay that money to still other people. I submit to you, sir, that the thing is completely out of order. It is totally irrelevant. I would rather have the matter dealt with—

Mr. McKeough: Puts you on the spot—

Mr. Bryden: It does not put me on the spot. I am quite prepared to direct what the jockey club or others will do with their money, but unless we pass specific legislation to that effect, I do not really see that we have the power to do that. I would much rather not have the water muddied up; I would rather see the matter dealt with on its merits. The question is what will be done with the money that the government is asking us to vote, not what we want somebody else to do with his money. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that the amendment is out of order.

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Minister of Highways): Mr. Chairman, if I may, I would like to propose that both amendments be voted down, and I personally do not propose to support either one of them. First of all, if we believe that horse racing is an industry—and I think it has developed into that stage and it has developed very, very rapidly during the last few years—and second, if you want even to categorize it as a sport, Mr. Chairman, I would say to the House that we either have to decide, in the first instance, whether we are going to continue horse racing in this province or whether we are going to eliminate it.

Mr. E. Sargent (Grey North): That is a stupid statement—

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: You are about as familiar with stupidity as anyone in the House. I would say that the hon. member for Grey North—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I simply propose to you, Mr. Chairman, and to the hon. members of the House here tonight, that if we believe, first of all, that it is a sport in which each individual citizen in this province has a right to participate, either as a breeder, an owner or a spectator, then I think we have to determine the extent to which we, as a government, or the public, or any other sector of our industry—if you like—or our economy, are going to support this thing.

I firmly believe that if we are going to develop a breed of Canadian horses, and if we are going to be able to meet the competition that from time to time is introduced into this country from other jurisdictions, either by horses entering this country to race, or by attracting our better horses outside of this country to race, then we must sensibly look at this.

I would submit to you, Mr. Chairman, and to everybody who has proposed amendments here today, that the very fact that one man, who is a man of means, or any number of men who are men of means, has seen fit to make a contribution to an industry that many people admire, should not, in any sense of the word, prevent them from being recognized in the form of breeder awards. Mr. E. P. Taylor's name has been mentioned rather loosely, I would suggest to you here today. Mr. E. P. Taylor is, and I think everyone will admit, a great Canadian citizen—

Mr. MacDonald: He is such a great Canadian he took all his money down to the Bahamas—

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Very well. He has developed enterprises and industry in this country that people like you, who believe the way you do, will never accomplish—never, if you live to be 1,000 years old.

The very fact that he has done this and seen fit to make a contribution to an industry that he has some admiration for does not in any way, I suggest to the House, indicate that he should not reap some of the sensible spoils that may go toward the development of this breed and the development of the industry.

Mr. MacDonald: Spoils is right—out of the public Treasury.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: We do not live in Sherwood Forest any more, we are not a band of Robin Hoods; we do not rob the rich to pay the poor all the time—

Mr. MacDonald: You rob the poor to pay the rich!

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: No, we do not do that. I simply suggest to you that these amendments should both be voted down. I am prepared to concur with the sensible observations of the hon. member for Grey South; maybe the proportion of tax revenue accruing to the province from racing should be reviewed. I am prepared to admit that that is a sensible thing to look at.

Mr. Singer: He is a sensible man.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: That is a sensible statement that I can concur with. Maybe that should be reviewed, and I think it is fair to say that this is something that has been under review by the hon. Provincial Treasurer and certain hon. members of the government and government agencies who are interested in it. But to propose to this House that one man who has decided to make this type of contribution to a good sport, and to a good industry, and decided to develop it, should be restricted from receiving breeder awards as long as they are in effect, to me is preposterous nonsense.

I can tell you, Mr. Chairman, if I may, that there are many breeders and owners of racing horses in Huron county. Certainly standardbred horses are there in great numbers, and thoroughbreds as well. I do not know of one breeder in Huron county, Perth or any of those areas in western Ontario, who objects to Mr. Taylor or anybody else receiving these awards, because they are strictly balanced against the contributions they have made to the development of a very good industry and a very good sport that many people admire, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I just want to make a brief comment here. I think there is some merit in the idea involved in the sub-amendment, namely, that industry rather than the public purse should be paying this. I think there is some merit particularly if, as the hon. Provincial Treasurer has indicated—and I draw this to the particular attention of the hon. Minister of Highways—there is little likelihood that he is going to change these figures. Indeed, the whole import of his remarks tonight was to defend and justify what we are now doing. So if the public Treasury is not going to take any more and the jockey club is going to be left with the present “take,” now that it has expanded this industry as much as it can expand for the immediate future, I certainly think it is an idea that should be considered, that the industry should pay the money, not the public purse.

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): The industry is paying the money.

Mr. MacDonald: However, Mr. Chairman, I submit to you that my hon. colleague from Woodbine is absolutely correct, that you cannot have a motion in this House which directs some other body, some other corporation in this province, as to how to spend its money. This is simply an impossibility. If this is within the rules of the House, we have to rewrite all the rules. I would suggest that those who want the public Treasury to cease to underwrite this—so that it will then become an obligation for the industry and the jockey club—should support the motion that was moved by the hon. member for Woodbine. I can assure you that as long as this government continues to pay them, the jockey club is not going to. If this motion passes the House tonight, the public Treasury will be relieved of the burden and then it will be necessary for some other body—and the obvious body would be the industry—to pay breeders' grants. I agree that there can be a case for paying breeders' grants; but I still disagree with the proposition that one-third of the breeders' grants, which come from the public Treasury, should go to a man who would continue to breed and develop horses even if he never got a cent out of this Treasury.

And remember this: For every $20,000 we give to E. P. Taylor, who does not need it, we deny a wealth of other interested breeders in Huron, in Perth and in other part of this province. They have not got the money. This is a fact. If the hon. Minister of Highways has not talked to a single horseman up in his constituency who objects to E. P. Taylor then he has not talked to very many, because I have rarely run into people who are interested in horse racing—and I have talked to many of them—who do not object to the domination of the racing industry by E. P. Taylor and to the excessive proportion of the breeders' grants that goes to him even though he has no need for it.

However, I do not want to argue that point. We have argued it and I think the case is made. The basic point I am making is: I think there may be some merit in the idea that the hon. member for Grey South has raised, but I do not think we have any jurisdiction in this Legislature to treat it as a subamendment. I suggest that those who want to relieve the public Treasury, support the amendment. Then it will be free for the jockey club to pick up the tab.

Mr. Oliver: Mr. Chairman, of course I would have to rise and report the contention that this amendment to the amendment is in order. In the first part of it, my hon. friend from Woodbine says that it is not in order because he moves to strike it out. Well, this simply moves to do it in some other way. Now, I think as far as that is concerned, it is all right.

Now then, my hon. friend from York South says that we have no authority to direct any other body to do something. I quite disagree with that.

Mr. MacDonald: By a bill?

Mr. Oliver: Well, what is the difference, actually, between a bill and a motion?

Mr. MacDonald: Obviously we cannot—

Mr. Oliver: Between a bill and a motion, there is no difference at all. The racing commission is an agency of this government and, I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that we are quite in order in saying that we will not pay it from this pot, but we will direct it to be paid from another one, through an agency created by this Legislature and under our supervision and control.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak to the item in the vote in reference to the motion and the motion to amend, which are presently before us. I can understand the interest produced by the hon. member for Grey South, but I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that it is not within the competence of this Legislature during the course of the estimates, to direct a body outside, or a group of undetermined individuals within the body of our province, how they must spend their money. I put that to you, because were that to be the case, it would have to be the subject of some legislation in some other form, rather than a consideration of the estimates before this House.

While I do not wish to speak in a technical sense, there is such a thing as having proper procedure before the House and I must submit, Mr. Chairman, that this motion to amend, from the hon. member for Grey South, be ruled out of order, and I urge you to so rule.

But speaking to the original motion to amend this vote, the facts are simply these, that thoroughbred breeding is a legal business within this province. It is a legal operation to race horses, provided that the legalities and the supervision requirements are complied with. And it is of some interest to bear in mind that this province, or in other words, the people of this province, receive something in the order of $10 million a year revenue, which goes into the general funds of the Treasury and are available for the legitimate purposes of the government of this province.

I submit to you that a donation, or a grant, of $70,000 is little enough to improve the calibre and the standard of the raison d'être—If I could put it that way, namely, the horses—of these exhibitions. Our grant of $70,000 toward improved breeding of thoroughbreds is not a large amount of money and I think it is the least that the people of this province would want to approve, having in mind the revenue of some $10 million, which accrue to our benefit from the operation of racing.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it would be of some help if we might have some direction from you as to your intentions about your ruling, with respect to the motion and the motion to amend. In any event, I take it that at the end of the vote on the motions before us, we will carry the vote in its entirety at its conclusion.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, before you make any ruling, it is my contention that this motion is perfectly in order, because it would allow the government to direct the racing commission to take a certain course of action. The government directs most of its commissions to do certain things. My hon. friend, the House leader, was here—

Mr. McKeough: The motion does not mention the racing commission.

Mr. Oliver: Yes, it does.

Mr. McKeough: You changed it then.

Mr. Oliver: I never changed it at all.

Mr. Singer: My hon. friend, the House leader, was present when Mr. Frost suddenly determined that there was going to be night racing and an announcement was made that there was going to be night racing. Nobody amended any statute. It was there and the racing commission was told there was going to be night racing, and the commission acted accordingly to administer it. Now, this is all that we are asking be done tonight. We are suggesting it is fully within the competence of the government to tell the commission that this is the way the award should be granted. It is exactly the same, sir, and for those reasons I suggest it is perfectly in order.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, on that basis, as a taxation measure, it certainly could not be moved by, or proposed by, a private member of the House.

Mr. Oliver: We are not proposing that at all.

Mr. Bryden: The hon. member is proposing that a certain levy be imposed on—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: I have very grave doubts as to the validity of the amendment, and yet knowing something of the sincerity and dedication of the two members, I am going to allow the amendment, first of all because—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Actually the first amendment says we will stop payment altogether. The second amendment simply says we will stop payment by government but have the commission direct how the payment will be made.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Was not the word, "industry," Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Chairman: I am saying they will have the commission direct the industry as to—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: The commission cannot direct the industry to pay.

Mr. Chairman: I am going to permit the amendment and we can vote on the amendment. If the amendment is lost, the motion is lost or the first amendment is lost, and more than that, then item 10 is automatically carried.

Mr. Bryden: Just a minute, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MacDonald: We are writing rules as we go along.

Mr. Bryden: Just because we departed a mile from the rules in one point does not mean we do it right down the line. Now, there is no proposition—

Mr. Chairman: We are going to vote.

Mr. Bryden: We will vote on both and then the vote, other than item 10, is still open under the rules, and under the procedure that was followed as recently as—

Mr. Chairman: I just said that. The amendment to the motion: Mr. Oliver moves that the racing commission direct that awards to breeders be paid by the industry rather than by government. All in favour of the amendment to the motion, please stand. All opposed to the amendment, please stand.

Clerk of the House: Mr. Chairman, the ayes are 19, the nays 46.

Mr. Chairman: I declare the amendment to the motion lost.

Now we shall vote on the motion by Mr. Bryden, that item 10 of vote 2201 be struck out. All in favour of the motion, please stand. All opposed to the motion, please stand.

Clerk of the House: Mr. Chairman, the ayes are 19, the nays 46.

Mr. Chairman: I declare the motion lost.

Item 10 of vote 2201 agreed to.

Vote 2201 agreed to.

Vote 2202 agreed to.

Vote 2203 agreed to.

Vote 2204 agreed to.

On vote 2205:

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Chairman, I think my colleague, the hon. member for Grey South tied down the thoughts of most of us in the Opposition in regard to the Ontario racing commission, in that there is a very sympathetic policy on behalf of the Ontario racing commission towards the Ontario jockey club. In fact, a lot of us feel, a lot of the racing fraternities feel that there is a liaison there—in fact that the Ontario racing commission is a tool of the Ontario jockey club. This may or may not be news to many of you but I think hon. members of the House know that in the estimates last year the news came out that in New Orleans, through the betting of $411,000 per day the track profit was $12,000. Ontario, with the same amount of betting, $460,000, the track profit was $22,000 per day. In other words, in Ontario the track profit is $9,000 more per day than in other provinces.

Now along the same line of thinking of the $4 million bet in 1961 in purses: $1 million in purses went to 47 horses owned by 37 men; and five of these 37 were directors of the Ontario jockey club. So I think it is pretty well established with the people in the racing field that anything that the Ontario jockey club feels is profitable and politic, the Ontario racing commission will enact as legislation. Further, in the United States, all uncashed tickets go to the state. In Ontario, all the uncashed tickets go to the jockey club. This runs into figures of half a million dollars a year. So, instead of the hon. Provincial Treasurer concocting ideas to increase the gasoline tax and hospital taxes, let us go after this money that rightfully belongs to the people.

Another item along these lines is called "breakage." This is the uneven amount of money paid out. In the USA this is split 50/50 between the track and the state, here all the breakage goes to the jockey club.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I do not want to interrupt the hon. member, but I could give him some information that I think would save him the effort or the embarrassment of continuing this discussion. This is a matter with which the federal government deals entirely. We have nothing to do with it.

Mr. Sargent: I am not asking you for information. I would like to show hon. members of the House—most of you are fair men but to show the arrogance of this commission insofar as the little fellow is concerned, you sit over there like a bunch of fat cats and you pound the desks—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sargent: I would like to show for a few moments this evening, on this vote, the wide powers of the Ontario racing commission insofar as the racing people are involved, and how completely unfair that the racing commission is to the drivers, in relating to the House three specific cases where I think you will agree, when you have heard the evidence, that the commission is most unfair. In any judgment handed down by the racing commission there is no appeal possible. Here we have a situation which has no parallel in any jurisdiction, where a body can lay a charge and then try the case. I think you will agree that the racing commission would naturally be prejudiced when it lays a charge and then tries it. And it has to judge itself right or admit it was wrong in the first place. This is a situation today where a race driver, if there is an infraction—

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, the racing commission appeared before the committee on commissions. The conduct of racing is the responsibility of the racing commission, which is an independent body. I am in no position to defend the treatment of drivers in those races. I think the discussion here as to suspension and that sort of thing having to do with drivers is completely the responsibility of the commission and I think any discussion of it is entirely out of order.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Chairman, this is what I thought would happen. In every case this powerful, arrogant government in power—

An hon. member: Get off the kick.

Mr. Sargent: For 20 or 25 years, I do not know how long it is, you have appointed all these commissions which are not responsible to elected people.

Hon. Mr. Allan: They came and met your committee.

Mr. Sargent: And here we have a case of people who have no recourse and the only time we get a chance to let the public know what is going on is through the House here. I demand my right to put the case of these citizens of Ontario, who have been dealt with unjustly.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, in considering this point of order, with respect, the hon. Provincial Treasurer is obviously away off base. When we had the water resources commission before us, it came before the standing committee, but when The Department of Energy and Resources Management came in here, the head of the water resources commission sat in that chair and answered any questions we wanted to ask. I trust the procedure will not change so that, when the estimates of The Department of Health are here, the head of the Ontario hospital commission will sit in that chair and answer any questions.

I submit to the hon. Provincial Treasurer that he cannot separate the purely financial end of raising the money from the Ontario racing commission from the other important aspects of the Ontario racing commission.

This is a fit topic to be discussed in the House here, and therefore I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that it is in order. Indeed, I have some things I want to say on it.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Well, Mr. Chairman, and I quote from The Racing Commission Act—

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Chairman, who has the floor?

Mr. Chairman: The Provincial Treasurer is speaking to a point of order.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Section 11(d):

To enforce the carrying out and observance of all regulations, rules and conditions established under this Act by a fine or other penalty or otherwise.

With the very greatest respect I say that I am not in a position to go into the details of this legal matter which was in the courts. One case is still before the courts and I think it is most improper to discuss that in this House and these drivers who are referred to.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, let me address myself to the point of order. The hon. Provincial Treasurer comes before us and he asks for the sum of $239,000 for the Ontario racing commission, in the same way as the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. Boyer) spoke in answer to the request for money for the Hydro in the Energy estimates. This matter is at present before the House. With the greatest respect to my friend, the hon. Provincial Treasurer, I think this is here because it is in his estimates. The sum of $239,000 is asked for and it is my submission that my colleague, the hon. member for Grey North, is perfectly in order.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the hon. leader of the NDP—

Mr. MacDonald: The Chairman has not made his ruling yet.

Mr. Chairman: Just a moment. I will make the ruling in a moment. Please be seated. It is unfortunate that the member for Grey North did not appear before the government committee on government commissions and there ask his questions, but I still maintain as a member of the House, as chairman of this committee, that any member of this House has a right to ask questions in the estimates about any commissions. We have had precedent after precedent. As one of the members of the Opposition has said, we have had the Ontario hospital commission and the Ontario water resources commission before us; its man was on the floor of the House. I believe in a democratic House and that any member has the right to ask any question during the estimates.

Mr. Sargent: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I must apologize to the House but this matter came before me a few hours ago and I hope I can put the facts to you clearly. I know that you all, in fairness to small people, will give me a good hearing on it and I apologize for any gaps I may leave.

The two men in the first two cases are highly regarded in their communities. They were charged with collusion or fixing a race.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I do not want to interrupt but just so we will have the rules clear, are you ruling, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Sargent: Are you rising on a point of order or what are you doing? Who is running this show?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I want this ruling clarified.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: So that we might have your ruling clarified, sir, what is the effect of the fact that certain of these cases are at present before the courts of the province and what effect does that have on the debate on those particular items and the facts surrounding them?

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister is in error. There is no case before the courts. There is one before the commission, but the commission is not a court, it is a body that is before this Legislature.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, the information that I have here, and this is in connection with the appeal of Clarence Lockhart, is that this motion of certiorari has still not been heard.

Mr. Chairman: Then it is quite simple to make the ruling, although I made the ruling before I knew anything about this part. If it is before the courts it is sub judice, it cannot be discussed here in the House. If it is not before the courts, then anyone in the House has the right to ask a question.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, before you make the ruling, from my knowledge of this situation, the hon. Provincial Treasurer is in error. As far as the Clarence Lockhart case is concerned, it came before the racing commission and he was, in effect, convicted and suspended for a year, and he is now sitting out his suspension. There is nothing before the courts at all. He appealed the suspension to the courts.

Mr. Sargent: And won the appeal.

Mr. MacDonald: No, no, you are mixing it up. There is another case which has been before the courts.

Mr. Sargent: I have the document in front of me here. Mr. Chairman, the motivation behind this is the fact that these people cannot get the facts before us, the people of Ontario, or before anyone, because there is no chance for an appeal—they cannot appeal these charges.

Now, the case is this: These two men were charged with fixing a race, or collusion. When the hearing was held they were found not guilty and they were absolved of the charge.

October 1, 1964, the ruling of the Ontario racing commission: The appeal of Clarence Lockhart from the decision of the judges suspending him indefinitely for collusion in the seventh race at the Greenwood Raceway on August 4, 1964, is allowed—his appeal is allowed:

—and the penalty imposed by the judges is nullified.

Immediately after this was given by the Ontario racing commission, another charge was laid by the Ontario racing commission. They laid the charge and the charge was—somebody had been in the army—an all-embracing charge, “racing contrary to the public interest.” This is a charge ranging from soup to nuts and could mean anything. Now, the daily report of that race shows that $279,000 was bet. That was August 5 and 5,924 people were there. Concerning the seventh race, a claiming race, there was no comment by the judges of the day. All the races were completely fine according to the board. Yet he is charged with racing contrary to the public interest.

The transcript is very lengthy and I will not bring it before the House, but the essence of it was—this man has 14 horses. He is highly regarded in his home community of Collingwood, as the hon. Chairman knows. He is trusted by all, by the complete council, by all the citizens. And the chairman at that hearing said that in 17 years of racing this man had always tried to drive hard and tried to win his races.

Going back a question, the report says:

Mr. Hall: What is the rule? You mentioned a rule for letting a horse go through in the middle.

This is technical, but I will be through in a moment.

What is the rule?

Answer: Well, it says “for needlessly letting a horse through on the inside.”

Briefly, the fact was that Mr. Lockhart was racing on the outside and the horse on the inside was choking and he heard the horse choking, and he felt the best thing was, that if the horse choked and went down there would be a tumble so he let the horse through.

The horse he let through and his own horse finished seventh and eighth. They both finished last. For this, the man was suspended for one year. He has 14 horses tied up. It damages his income, his reputation; it will cost him $25,000.

Now, I am going to tell this House briefly of how an employee, the manager of the mutuels, employed by the jockey club, in charge of the mutual betting, was placing bets with these drivers—an infraction of rules right down the line. If this man is allowed to continue his job, he does not lose his licence; but a highly regarded man in the profession is suspended and has no chance to appeal.

Now, being fair in my demand, this is not very important to this House probably, but it is of importance to an individual to have his rights looked after. And this commission, and I say this respectfully, are appointed by this government and naturally it behooves them to be taking orders from the OJC who pull all the strings. I recognize that, but this can happen. For this man, it is the first offence and he has no appeal. I understand, in speaking about his licence again today, that he was told there was no guarantee he would ever get it back.

Now, this is the serious thing this man has done.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Could I ask the hon. member about whom he is speaking?

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Clarence Lockhart. A glaring case, Mr. Chairman.

Hon. Mr. Allan: You mentioned something about betting.

Mr. Sargent: Well, I hesitate to go into that. I have a letter here. It is doubtful. It was written by the judge of the racing commission to a man who has been suspended for five years. The judge, in his letter to this man says in effect, “if you did no more wrong than Mr. Dunbar, who is the man in charge of the mutuel betting and who is placing bets for these drivers on countless occasions"—

Hon. G. E. Gomme (Minister without Portfolio): For the drivers.

Mr. Sargent: For the drivers.

Hon. Mr. Gomme: What drivers?

Mr. Sargent: Oh, this is in many, many cases. It was in the transcript, it will come out. But before I go into that, Mr. Murray Waples—

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I say this in the best terms to my hon. friend from Grey North: Could he define his terms a little more carefully? Frankly, thus far it is completely incomprehensible to me, as a member of this House. I admit I am a novice in this field, but I would like to understand a little better. Can he be a little more specific in the people he names and the terms he uses?

Mr. Sargent: The motivation, the end result of this will be to show injustice and the mechanics of trying to get justice in this profession, because of a government commission which is responsible to no one.

Hon. Mr. Allan: They are.

Mr. Sargent: Well, to whom are they responsible?

Hon. Mr. Allan: He can appeal to the courts.

Mr. MacDonald: You should read some of the transcripts.

Mr. Sargent: Well, I am told by this fraternity, Mr. Chairman, that these people have no appeal.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Well, I can give you two instances right here and read them out to you, where two men did appeal.

Mr. W. E. Johnston (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. It is absolutely wrong to say that these men have no appeal. Mr. Lockhart did have an appeal. His counsel made an appeal through what is known as a certiorari motion. Now, the term is unknown to me, but these men who are lawyers know what it means. He had his appeal. And any one of them has an opportunity to appeal if his counsel is acting for him in a proper way.

Interjections from hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, I have already made a motion—the motion for certiorari has still not been heard, but he made a motion for certiorari and I do not think we should be discussing this.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, could I ask what was the date of that motion for certiorari?

Hon. Mr. Allan: March 10.

Mr. MacDonald: Of this year?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Yes.

Mr. Chairman: If the matter is before the courts it is sub judice and it cannot be discussed here in the House.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I think it is entirely improper. I can give you a statement as to what went on; I am not worried about all this, but I think it is improper. It is not fair to Mr. Lockhart.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Lockhart is here—his lawyers were here this evening and they feel that the very fact that this commission can lay a charge and try the case themselves is the first point that is wrong.

The other case of a Mr. Waples—

Mr. Chairman: I would remind the hon. member for Grey North that we have already agreed that it is before the court and I made the ruling. We cannot change a ruling of this kind. I have no authority to change it. This is an old-established rule of this House.

Mr. Oliver: May I ask the hon. Provincial Treasurer if this is before the court?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Yes. I could give you a statement on it here. I could tell you just what has happened. This is the information that I have been given by the chairman of the commission, and the last line of this is:

This motion of certiorari has still not been heard.

The certiorari motion is scheduled for Tuesday, January 27, 1965—

Mr. Sargent: What case, Mr. Treasurer?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Lockhart. I continue:—and will be adjourned until after the disposition of the Waples case.

Then on March 10, there is a notation:

This motion of certiorari has still not been heard.

Mr. Singer: That is March 10, and this is May 20. The hon. member for Carleton is on the commission—

Hon. Mr. Allan: I was only taking the word of the chairman of the commission.

Mr. Singer: But that is as of March, sir. The hon. member for Carleton indicated that, in his opinion, the motion for certiorari had been heard and dealt with and was finished. That was the way—

Mr. W. E. Johnston: I did not indicate that; I was simply saying that they had a means of appeal, through a certiorari motion.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Sargent: I will deal with another case then—

Mr. Chairman: Order, order!

Mr. Sargent: —not Mr. Lockhart's. Mr. Lockhart's suspension is here and the appearance of suspension is on.

Mr. Waples was in this same race and he was charged with collusion. He was tried and acquitted of collusion—of fixing a race. Immediately after the hearing the ORC charged him with driving contrary to the public interest. The thing he did wrong in this race was he lost by a nose. He is allowed to run, not in Ontario, but he was convicted and suspended because he was driving contrary to the public interest.

How a man can lose by a nose—and he said he was trying to lose the race—is hard to believe. But he is allowed to race under the Canadian trotting association in Montreal, and in all its history for any such charges it has had suspensions for from three to five days. But this man's case comes up for review on Tuesday, and using the past actions of the commission as a yardstick, he could get a three-year suspension.

In the case of Mr. Kingston, this letter to Mr. Kingston is signed by Mr. Floyd Milton, a judge—a racing commission judge, is that correct?

Mr. S. Lewis: What happened to Mr. Lockhart?

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Lockhart is still under suspension.

Mr. Oliver: What about the fellow who lost by a nose?

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Kingston was charged and suspended for five years for betting $150 of someone else's money with his own horse in the race.

Hon. Mr. Allan: On another horse.

Mr. Sargent: On another horse. But he also bet $200 on his own horse, and his own horse did show. The letter from Mr. Milton, the racing commission judge says:

Hi, Gord,

Re our phone calls. First don't quote me or show people my letter—

An hon. member: Who did he say that was?

Another hon. member: One of the judges.

Mr. Sargent: I do not very often get browned off with this nonsense here, but I think it is important that you people in your arrogance realize that the lives of some people are at stake here. I do not have the complete facts neatly arrayed in front of me, but the facts are here, and there is an injustice here. I think you owe it to your people. If you have not got the brains yourselves to listen to some facts that have done wrong, then you should not sit in this House.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Grey North is having an exceptionally good hearing and I do not see that there is any call for this outburst.

Mr. Sargent: That is my opinion, Mr. Chairman. This is a free country.

Hon. Mr. Allan: What is the name of the racing judge who wrote the letter?

Mr. Sargent: This man, who is chairman, who is a judge on this commission, writes this letter and he says:

First don't quote me or show people my letter—

He goes on to—

Hon. Mr. Allan: Could we have his name?

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Floyd Milton.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: He said, "Please don't quote me," and that is what you are doing.

Mr. Sargent: I certainly am and this letter is coming out to show what is going on in this racing commission.

This man is appointed by the racing commission—and you will know by the grammar, the intelligence of some of the people on this commission.

The hearing has been set back one day and due to the standardbred sale so they will now start on September 22, one each day, I believe.

Now you should have the man that you had in front of Mr. Mooney that you claim it was his money, and if he says [blank] and gave you $950 or $1,050 to bet for him, you just handed it to Mr. Dunbar. He is the manager of the mutuels, who is taking bets for the drivers. His word should be as good as Mr. Dunbar's.

Now if you can talk to this commission meeting, without getting nervous and keep to the point, if not, you should have someone talk to you.

I would start from the time Mr. McKee made you acquainted with Mr. Dunbar, then Dunbar coming to you that he would do the betting for you in secret, and so forth.

You lost a lot of bets. He used to come to the paddock to pick up the money. All through the night he handed the $1,200 back with Max, when your horse won, and paid $830. He said he couldn't bet it because Mr. Body was there and that sounds like a bookmaker to me.

[Blank] He says you have raced horses for so many years and have never been in such serious trouble and you have a lot of faith in horse racing. You realize that you have made a mistake but you are not the first man that ever made a mistake around the racetrack, and Mr. Dunbar is as guilty as you are for dealing in this underhanded way.

I believe if you had someone like Leslie Erick—he goes on about the commission. He tells Mr. Kingston to get a lawyer:

—if you did make a mistake and you believe the commissioner will deal fairly with you for your mistake. I talked to Bev last night and asked him to keep his chin up and keep going under his handicap and that the presiding judge and myself and Mr. Dickerson were trying to help him. Once again, now, don't go saying Milton said this or that when I am trying to help you. Keep my name out of it.

Signed, FLOYD MILTON.

This man is a judge on the racing commission and he implicates Mr. Dunbar as being as guilty as the man who lost his licence for five years. I have told you he is the manager of the mutuels, employed by the Ontario jockey club. His practice was to take bets from the drivers, which is illegal, and this man did not lose his licence, but Mr. Kingston lost his licence for five years.

Mr. Chairman, in view of these three cases of injustice to people in this racing field and the fact that they are not given a chance to appeal, regardless of what the hon. member says, I feel that there is need for a real searching inquiry into the activities of the racing commission and I would so move.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I wanted to raise some matters and I am a little puzzled at the moment to know what can be done. May I try to sort this out?

First, with regard to the Gordon Kingston episode and that letter which the hon. member for Grey North read, I have nothing to say on it. It has been put in the record. It obviously was a confidential letter to begin with, but I suggest to the hon. Provincial Treasurer that it is an important issue that you cannot now ignore.

Second, with regard to the Clarence Lockhart case, I was not aware, I had not been informed that there was an appeal and that it is before the courts. If the hon. Provincial Treasurer is accurate that it is before the courts, that cannot be dealt with and I shall not discuss it.

The Murray Waples case—Murray Waples of Coldwater—has been in and out of the courts and I am going to speak to it, because it illustrates the point that I want to make, at least, and I think it is an important point.

I have always been puzzled by the procedures of many of these commissions and particularly the racing commission. Indeed, this is a matter of considerable concern, there being representations made almost weekly, if not daily, before the McRuer commission on what happens to the rights of the individual, in the operation of these commissions. Now, in the instance of the Ontario racing commission, it has regulatory and disciplinary powers, and the remarkable thing, Mr. Chairman, is this: that while the Act does not state that the Ontario racing commission has the right to delegate these powers, in practice the Ontario racing commission does delegate these powers to the Canadian trotting association. So, in many instances, in the first case when charges are laid, the charge will be laid by the Canadian trotting association, which as far as this Legislature is concerned, is a sort of subsidiary body of the racing commission.

Hon. Mr. Allan: No, it is not. Why, they are as separate as day and night.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, just bear with me for a moment then, if you think that is the case.

For example, in the instance of the Waples case, when the charge is laid, and here it is right here: "Murray John Waples, Canadian trotting association summons, Ontario racing commission, King Street East." Now, there is the summons that went to Mr. Waples, a summons from the Canadian trotting association, and yet at the bottom of it is "the Ontario racing commission." Now, this is my first point.

I do not know what the law is. I am not a lawyer, but as a layman, and as a legislator, I object to the proposition that we give certain powers to the Ontario racing commission and that it apparently, in fact, delegates its powers to the Canadian trotting association for charges and for penalties being imposed—if those charges in the trial that the Canadian trotting association holds, result in a verdict.

Let me illustrate what happened in the instance of the Waples case, because this is a fascinating thing, and I am glad the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Stewart) is here, because I sat on the committee yesterday, in which the solicitor—Mr. Harris who is acting independently, I think, but has been hired in connection with The Milk Act—said that there is absolutely no doubt at all that there is an appeal from the commission by mandamus, prohibition, or certiorari. Now, before I am finished, I will give you reviews of the chairman of the Ontario racing commission, in which on the record, in the transcript, he obviously looked for three or four ways to deny a right of prohibition when it was brought before him, so that this has really got to be clarified.

Now, what happened in this instance is this: There was a race on August 4. The judges' record, or what they call the "daily report of the judges," a copy of which I have in my hand here, has not a single notation on the bottom of it. In other words, as far as the judges who are responsible for reporting on this race, were concerned, there is nothing to indicate that there was anything untoward, illegal, or what you will, in the conduct of this race. Now, some three weeks later, a charge was laid against Waples and Lockhart, and I shall have to bring them in for the moment because it was a joint charge of collusion. And this trial was held by the Canadian trotting association. There was an appeal made from this, by the two gentlemen involved, to the racing commission.

Now, here, Mr. Chairman, I want to draw to the attention particularly of the lawyers in the House, that we give the Ontario racing commission certain powers, and it delegates them to the trotting association. The trotting association hears the case in the first instance and there has to be an appeal from it back to the body to whom we originally delegate the powers, namely, the Ontario racing commission.

Well, three weeks after the race, this trial was held and these gentlemen were going to be suspended. They appealed their case from the trotting association to the Ontario racing commission and the appeal was heard about a month later. As a matter of fact, it was on September 22 and 23, a two-day hearing. They were asked to come back two or three days later to get the judgment, and when they came back, Mr. Chairman, here was the fantastic thing that happened. The racing commission said to them, in effect, "We have quashed the charge for which you were convicted by the trotting association. We have accepted your appeal, but we immediately charge you with something else." And the other charge was a very vague thing. It is for "driving in a manner contrary to the public interest."

Now, in the instance of Mr. Lockhart, he was there and they made arrangements and proceeded immediately and it was heard by the racing commission and he was convicted by the racing commission, suspended and apparently he has appealed.

In the instance of Mr. Waples—and I want to pursue it, because it is not before the courts—he did not happen to be there and his lawyer was not there when the racing commission in effect accepted his appeal from the trotting association suspension, but immediately was going to lay another charge. And this charge was delivered to him two or three weeks later on October 15. I have the transcript of what happened before the racing commission at that particular time.

October 15, 1964. His lawyer was the late W. E. MacDonald, and I just want to quote two or three instances, brief quotes from the argument of Mr. MacDonald, which strikes me as having considerable validity. He said:

I, of course, object to this and I said in my opinion as a counsel that it was a denial of natural justice because we had come to the commission on an appeal from the judges at the race track—namely, the Canadian trotting association hearing:

—and the commission had, in fact, sat as a court of appeal. I have never heard of a court of appeal taking and instructing another charge be laid, instead of the one that was appealed, and yet that is precisely what happened.

But let us go on a bit further, to quote from the transcript of the day at page 6. This is his reference to Magistrate Bigelow, the chairman, in which he really took the gloves off and spoke rather frankly. He said:

I felt that, as a counsel—and these are not my personal views or my professional views, but I felt that the chairman—the chairman of the racing commission:

—had dominated this commission during this appeal, so as to be authorized to bring this other set of facts before the commission and put us in the position of saying, "Well, we are going to have to get Waples anyway. He is not guilty of what the judges say he was guilty of, but he is guilty of something else and we will get him this way." And having said that, the subpoena was issued.

And then—and this is what I draw to the particular attention of the hon. Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Chairman, and indeed, to every hon. member in the government who is arguing, for example, that there is the right of an appeal—you see, what happened was, that when this second charge was laid against the racing commission, which was actually acting as a court of appeal from the trotting association, the lawyer for Mr. Waples moved in and said, "I am taking a motion before the court for prohibition." In other words, it would be to get the rights from the courts to say that "this is beyond the ORC's powers and you are prohibited to deal with them." And they immediately got into quite a discussion between Mr. MacDonald on behalf of Waples and Magistrate Bigelow, as chairman of the racing commission, and a Mr. Hall, who I think was counsel for the racing commission when it was there. For example, just let me give you a few quotes:

The Chairman: Well now, Mr. MacDonald [This is W. E. MacDonald, the late W. E. MacDonald] I take it then that you and your client refused to stay for any hearing that the commission is going to conduct.

Mr. MacDonald: We say that the commission is without authority to conduct any hearing pending the outcome of the motion for prohibition. It is in the nature of an appeal and it absolutely stays all proceedings, and I think Mr. Hall will agree with that. If the order of prohibition is granted, you are forever stayed from the inquiry and if it is not, then you can proceed. [Precisely the kind of information that was given to us yesterday by Mr. Harris.]

The Chairman: The only thing that concerns me [This is Magistrate Bigelow] in the allowance of an appeal is that it restores Mr. Waples to good standing. [Because he had been under suspension.]

Mr. MacDonald: I don't think you need to worry about that. Mr. Waples' horses are going to the farm and he does not intend to race. It was not my purpose to have him reinstated.

The Chairman: I was just wondering, in any event, if we have the power, in view of Mr. MacDonald's statement on behalf of his client, to suspend Mr. Waples' licence for conduct the commission considers to be contrary to the public interests, namely, refusing to attend a hearing of the commission.

In other words, because he would not attend a hearing of the commission then, because his lawyer wanted to take it off and get a writ of prohibition, here is Magistrate Bigelow saying:

I wonder if we cannot suspend him for action contrary to the public interest, namely, his refusal to attend a hearing of the commission as is provided in section 11 subsection (c) of The Racing Act.

I continue:

Mr. Hall: May I see a copy of the Act?

Mr. McKee: This is the same as the other one, isn't it?

The Chairman: Here is your ribbon copy, Mr. MacDonald.

And then, facetiously, I think:

Mr. MacDonald: Why not suspend him for appealing to the courts while you are at it?

The Chairman: I was just asking that question, Mr. MacDonald, of our counsel.

Then the counsel, Mr. Hall, comes in:

I do not believe this can stay any decision, and it is my off-the-cuff opinion that this cannot stay a hearing or stay a suspension, because if that was the case, then with all due respect, counsel at any time a motion was brought, instead of saying October 24, could say April 27, 1965.

Mr. MacDonald: You could not bring it unless there was seven days' notice.

Mr. Hall: But the date you set would be set sometime in the future. It does not have to be brought on the seventh day. That is what I am saying. You have chosen October 27, and you could have chosen February 15, 1965, or any other date—

The Chairman: October 27, 1990.

If I may just interject here, here is all of this going on between the counsel and the chairman of the Ontario racing commission—sort of facetious comments about why they were objecting to the right in coming with a motion of prohibition. However, Mr. Hall comes in:

I think the commission could suspend Mr. Waples for not appearing at the hearing now.

The counsel to the racing commission: I think he could be suspended now. I think the commission could suspend Mr. Waples for not appearing at the hearing now.

Mr. MacDonald: He is here!

Mr. Hall: But you don't want to give evidence.

Mr. MacDonald: Oh, I just said that the application for prohibition is the same as an appeal and it just stops all proceedings.

The Chairman: I don't agree, Mr. MacDonald. I think the proper procedure is, it seems to me—and again I am taken by surprise, as Mr. Hall is—but it would seem to me that the thing to do would be to call Mr. Waples to the stand and swear him and then start to ask him questions and if he refuses to answer questions, then that would take care of the matter.

Mr. MacDonald: If you were sitting as a magistrate and you had an application for an order of prohibition served on you, you would not proceed with the matter, pending the outcome of the motion. And that is what would happen under law. Any counsel can give advice—and Mr. Hall has the study of the matter and he can give advice too.

Mr. Hall: If you could give me about ten minutes.

The Chairman: Yes, certainly.

A few moments later they reconvened. Apparently Mr. Hall had thought the matter through and the chairman announced:

On the advice of our counsel, this hearing should be adjourned sine die, if that is the feeling of the other members of the commission that it should be done.

The shocking thing, Mr. Chairman, is the whole approach of a magistrate, sitting on one of our commissions, who clearly had no appreciation at all of what was explained to us only yesterday as almost a fundamental right in this province—to be able to appeal from one of the decisions of these agencies on mandamus, writ of prohibition or certiorari. In this instance, they did get a writ of prohibition. They went before the court.

Mr. Chairman, I have just two or three more brief comments that I want to make here. This went before the Ontario Supreme Court and they got a writ of prohibition. It was appealed by the Ontario racing commission and the court of appeal quashed it. However, I want to go back to the first hearing before the Ontario Supreme Court. I have not seen the transcript or the judgment in the instance of the quashing, but I want to go back for two or three brief quotes and evidence with regard to the racing commission, which I think is factual in the judgment that was handed down at Osgoode Hall on December 29, 1964.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Chairman, might I inquire of the hon. member if there is much involved by way of time?

Mr. MacDonald: I think I can finish this in about ten minutes.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I was just thinking of the session in the morning.

Mr. MacDonald: In the judgment, the judge said this, and I think this is pertinent when we are considering the racing commission, Mr. Treasurer:

I draw attention to section 14 of The Racing Commission Act:

"The Lieutenant-Governor in Council may make regulations with respect to any and all matters or things as deemed necessary for the carrying out of this Act."

On a search I find [says the judgment] that there has not been one regulation made under the provisions of the Act. On the material files, on the other hand, I find that the racing commission administers by rules and directives.

At first blush, therefore, the fact that the rules and the directives have not received approval and have not emanated from and with the approval of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, and its lack of publicity in acquiring a public character, leaves them in a state of flux and uncertainty. This, to my mind, is not to be condoned.

The existing three volumes of revised regulations of Ontario, 1960, established the wise practice of boards and commissions to set down, with the approval of the Lieutenant-Governor, their rules and regulations. For instance, under The Optometry Act, regulation 474, "disgraceful conduct" is defined.

There is no definition that I can find of what constitutes "driving a horse against the public interest." By virtue of this section 92 of the Act, the members of the commission are civil servants. To operate without regulations invites the abuse of discretionary power.

Mr. Chairman, I think this is extremely important. I was not aware of this. The Ontario racing commission has not a single regulation which is incorporated in the compilation of regulations for various bodies in the province of Ontario. The members operate in their very secret fashion and the hon. Provincial Treasurer must be aware of the amount of criticism that has gone on with regard to the secrecy of many of these bodies, but particularly this body. Not only do they operate secretly in many of their hearings, but their actual rules and directives are to a considerable degree secret, in that they are not regular regulations that are authorized by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council and therefore published in what is known as the Revised Regulations of Ontario, 1960.

What the Ontario racing commission does is this: We give the members some power and they run off in the corner and run their own show—not with regulations but with rules and directives. They delegate some of their power to the trotting association, the trotting association issues summonses, with the racing commission listed at the bottom of the summons, holds trials, and then people have to appeal from this unauthorized illegal trial—it is certainly without legislative statute that I am aware of. They have to appeal to the Ontario racing commission. I think it is about time that this kind of empire building should be looked into.

Hon. Mr. Allan: It must have been the judge who represented the trotting association.

Mr. MacDonald: I do not know who represented the trotting association but all I am saying is that it is held under the trotting association—

Hon. Mr. Allan: My information is that the original decision is made by the judges.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, this may be true, but I ask you where, for example, in the Act that sets up the Ontario racing commission, is there the power to delegate these responsibilities to another body with a power of appeal back to the Ontario racing commission?

Hon. Mr. Allan: I think there is an error there somewhere.

Mr. MacDonald: I agree with you. In this judgment—just one other comment—any commission or board which gives itself such right usurps power far beyond what the Legislature would grant even to itself.

Well, I think I have made the point. I could make further quotes from this, Mr. Chairman, but I submit to you that in the instance of the operation of this, we have to take a solid look at it and at the proposition that individuals should have their rights taken away. In this instance I am not in the position, I am not competent, to judge the merits or demerits of the charges. I would not for one moment do what the hon. member for Grey North has done, and try to assess whether a horse was driven up the middle. I am not competent to judge this.

But I am competent—and it is my responsibility—to examine the exercise of power that we have given to these bodies and I suggest to you in the history so far of the Waples case that it is an extraordinary story with great abuses of power. What has happened now is that having got a writ of prohibition from the supreme court, having had it quashed in the court of appeal, it is now coming next Tuesday before the Ontario racing commission. And what will happen, who knows? But in view of what appears to be something of a closed mind on this whole issue, by the racing commission, I suspect that Mr. Waples is going to be hit with a year's suspension as Mr. Lockhart was. But, you see how a racing commission—I say this finally, Mr. Chairman, and I just go back to one small point in the Lockhart case. In the Lockhart case, when it was appealed to the racing commission and the racing commission quashed the decision of the trotting association or the judges at the track—

Hon. Mr. Allan: The judges, I think.

Mr. MacDonald: Okay, the judges at the track—they immediately slapped another charge on him. The other charge was with regard to another race on another day.

Hon. Mr. Allan: This, I understand, was as a result of pictures.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, I do not know. I repeat, I am not competent to deal with the details but the proposition that you have a daily report here from the judges that has not a single mark on it and then three weeks later you start laying collusion charges and they get quashed and then you start slapping another charge—it strikes me that this has all the possibilities for vindictive action against people, which bears no relationship at all to justice or what may have gone on in the courts.

I invite the hon. Provincial Treasurer—without carrying this further, because I have other points and other issues on this particular vote—but I invite the hon. Provincial Treasurer to have his authorities look into it. I would also invite the hon. Minister of Agriculture to take a serious look at this business, Mr. Chairman, because if the chairman of one of our boards has this concept of what the right of appeal is from the board, I am going to have a healthy look at any amendments the hon. Minister may bring in in The Milk Industry Act, because I have to be persuaded when the head of one of the commissions—who is a magistrate—did not think you had these rights.

Hon. Mr. Allan: You know they do have the right to appeal?

Mr. MacDonald: I do, but why would not Magistrate Bigelow?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree moves that the committee rise and report certain resolutions, and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report it has come to certain resolutions and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow morning, following the flag-raising ceremony and when the House sits, we will have certain second readings. There will be a Budget debate to enable some of the hon. members to participate and we will continue thereafter with estimates.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 10.40 o'clock, p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

FRIDAY, MAY 21, 1965

The House met at 10.30 o'clock, a.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: We are pleased to welcome as visitors to the Legislature today in the east and west galleries, students from North-view public school, London.

Petitions.

Presenting reports by committees.

Motions.

Introduction of bills.

THE AGRICULTURAL RESEARCH INSTITUTE OF ONTARIO ACT, 1961-1962

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Agricultural Research Institute of Ontario Act, 1961-1962.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

THE UNIVERSITY OF GUELPH ACT, 1964

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The University of Guelph Act, 1964.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education): Mr. Speaker, a very brief explanation of the two bills that have been introduced. It was roughly a year ago when the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) introduced the Act establishing the University of Guelph. When he introduced this bill he drew attention to the fact that for the relatively short term the federated colleges would maintain their traditional association with The Department of Agriculture. He further explained at the time that it was the intention of the department to transfer both effective control and the assets of the colleges to the university, but that time, careful study, negotiation and a good deal of effort were required to settle these matters effectively. I am pleased to say this morning that, consistent with the general progress that has marked the first year of the University of Guelph, the questions related to the transfer of assets and the future relationship between the university and The Department of Agriculture have been satisfactorily resolved.

This bill provides for the transfer of land, of buildings and equipment and provides that certain property will be retained by the department for its own future needs in agricultural research and other matters related to that department.

The bill now presented, provides for amendments to The University of Guelph Act consistent with agreed arrangements and I am very pleased to present it to the House on this occasion.

THE DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION ACT

Hon. Mr. Davis moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Department of Education Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the indulgence of the House to make a somewhat lengthier explanation of this bill than is normally my custom, but the bill is of some real significance and I think it requires a fairly complete statement, so that it will be properly understood by the hon. members of the House and, of course, by the public at large. So I would ask the hon. members to bear with me when I trace the background, the need for this bill and some of the plans that are contained in the particular legislation.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, and the introduction of it in this assembly, provides for the establishment and operation of a system of colleges of applied arts and technology and I believe this to be an historic occasion in education in our province. The bill, Mr. Speaker, marks a major step forward in the development of our educational system; it provides for the introduction of a new level and type of education, one which is still in keeping with our traditions and our present accomplishments. Above all else, it goes far towards making a reality of the promise—indeed, I believe, of the policy—of this government and, I believe, of this House. And the policy is to provide, through education and training, not only an equality of opportunity to all sectors of our population, but the fullest possible development of each individual to the limit of his ability. In this new age of technological change and invention, also, it is essential to the continued growth and expansion of the economy of our province, and, I suggest, of our nation, that adequate facilities be made generally available for the education and training of craftsmen, technicians and technologists.

Dr. John Deutsch, chairman of the economic council of Canada, made this point abundantly clear in his address of March 1, 1965, to the Canadian Club in Toronto, and I just quote very briefly from this address:

The world in which we live and must make our way is one which demands an ever-changing pattern of occupations and rising levels of skills. The occupations which are growing most rapidly are those which involve advancing levels of basic education and training. The occupations requiring the lowest levels of formal education are declining. Much has already been done to meet the educational needs of our times, but there are significant deficiencies and gaps which remain to be overcome, especially in respect of research, the retraining of workers and the development of highly skilled manpower.

I am sure the hon. members have read the complete version of Dr. Deutsch's speech. I think it underlines the importance of the recommendations for the expansion of technical education and trades training made by our own select committee on manpower training, under the chairmanship of the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management (Mr. Simonett), which reported in February, 1963; and of the emphasis placed on the implications of technological change during September, 1963, at the conference on automation and social change.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the policy of this government was set forth with equal clarity by our hon. Prime Minister in his major statement to this assembly on February 23, 1965. The implications of technological change for economic growth and for education were stated by our hon. Prime Minister at that time.

The government of Ontario recognizes that, while there are differences of opinion as to the nature, extent and timing of public policy, there is nevertheless basic agreement on certain fundamental assumptions about the problem of technological change.

It is generally agreed that changes in technology have always affected and will continue to affect our social and economic system. It is also agreed that the rate of change in our social and economic system is related to the rate of change in technology and that the rate of technological change is accelerating. Further, there is general acceptance that the first implication of technological change will be the change in the nature of individual jobs and each such change eventually leads to changes in values, patterns of behaviour and our social institutions, including government itself.

The policy of this government with respect to education and training in this connection was laid down by hon. Mr. Robarts in the same statement and I think it is a very fitting statement to read on this occasion:

Our true wealth resides in an educated citizenry; our shrewdest and most profitable investment rests in the education of our people. A general phenomenon of our day is that brainworkers—"knowledge workers," as they are more frequently labelled, to contrast with "manual workers"—in the future, of an ever-higher calibre, are the prime economic need for societies in advanced states of industrialism.

I think this states very clearly the policy as represented by our hon. Prime Minister.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the proposed legislation for colleges of applied arts and technology must be viewed in the light of the economic and social demands not only of today but of tomorrow. It will be recognized, I am confident, that this expansion of our school system is imperative to meet the needs of individual citizens as well as those of society as a whole. This development is another step towards the fulfillment of our efforts to expand and redesign our system of schools and universities to meet more adequately the changing demands of very challenging times. We have recently completed, as the hon. members are well aware, a far-reaching reorganization of our secondary school programme and, under the federal-provincial agreement, have built vocational schools sufficient in number to ensure that courses of study in the commercial and technical fields, as well as in the academic, are provided throughout the province.

I may add, parenthetically, that these new courses have met with enthusiastic acceptance and support—almost embarrassingly so in some communities, I must admit, where the realities of actual enrolment have somewhat outstripped the expectations of the planners. At the same time, we have approved, and this House has approved and underwritten an expansion of our university facilities unprecedented in our history.

Now, having put in train our plans for other areas of our school system, we must and can focus our attention on the design of this remaining section, directly related to the applied arts and technology, for full-time and for part-time students, in day and in evening courses, and planned to meet the relevant needs of all adults within a community, at all socio-economic levels, of all kinds of interests and aptitudes, and at all stages of educational achievement. Our efforts here could, I suppose, be considered also as a co-ordination and culmination of all previous work in this area: a welding into a coherent whole, so to speak, of the parts which have sometimes seemed fragmented and—I think the hon. member for York South (Mr. MacDonald) made this observation when we were discussing adult education a year ago—of the parts which have sometimes seemed fragmented and unrelated, so that we have a complete system extending from the kindergarten to the postgraduate level.

I would like, Mr. Speaker, for a moment to give a brief review and evaluation of recent changes and developments in the worlds of work and of education which have made essential the creation of this new level of our school system. In terms of the factor of need, there are two or three main items which stand out above all others. First, there is the matter of the so-called “knowledge explosion,” by which is meant that recently, knowledge in certain fields—science, in particular—has been doubling about every ten years. One very natural consequence is that a longer period of schooling is demanded by the circumstances. Where the limit may be, I simply do not know, but obviously a much higher level of education is going to be required of all of us.

We now have accepted the principle of secondary education for all. We probably must now recognize the inevitability of some form of post-secondary education—i.e. beyond grade 12—for all of those who are capable of profiting from it. Further education must be provided in a variety of courses or programmes, varying in length from a few weeks perhaps to six or more years, in new types of institutions as well as in universities, and for part-time day and evening students, as well as for full-time day students, for adults as well as for youth, and for the upgrading and updating of workers either on the job or in evening courses, as well as for the unemployed.

Secondly, the new technological revolution in which we have been caught up has seen the disappearance of most of the unskilled, and a high proportion of the semi-skilled, jobs. Indeed, the occupational world has altered beyond recognition during the period of 25 years extending from the beginning of World War II. Much higher levels of basic educational qualifications, and of technical skills, for instance, are demanded of those who supervise or work in our new automated factories and offices.

These higher levels of skill and knowledge simply must be attained by employees, either before employment or through upgrading courses while in service, as Dr. Deutsch pointed out. I admit, however, that I experienced a considerable sense of shock when, during our recent visit to California—and I am sure the members of the committee on youth experienced this as well—where we were studying these and related matters, we were informed quite casually and as an accepted fact of life, that employers in that jurisdiction were not really willing to accept high school graduation as a minimum qualification for new employees, but were demanding graduation from junior college as the irreducible minimum.

As I review the situation developing in our own very highly industrialized province, though, I not only appreciate their situation better, but realize that I had probably been afforded a preview of things to come in our own province and in the not-too-far-distant future. We simply must provide the facilities for education and training at these higher levels if we hope to continue to compete for markets on even terms at home and abroad.

The third and final factor which I wish to mention is what is commonly known as the “population explosion”—and I guess the hon. members think I am being somewhat melodramatic in using the terms “knowledge explosion,” “technological revolution” and “population explosion,” but I assure you I am not; these are, of course, the simple facts of life with which we must live today. Probably I need stress neither the facts nor the implications in this matter of population growth; all hon. members are well aware that we have just experienced the first of the many tidal waves of students that will threaten to engulf our secondary and post-secondary educational institutions for the next 20 years at least. Nevertheless, a brief review of the facts may not be amiss.

Let us start with the live births. These had reached an all-time low before World War II, at about 60,000 per year—the small pool of talent, incidentally, from which we have had to recruit our teachers for many years—then climbed dramatically right after the war. We have the first wave in grade 13 this year, hence the 25 per cent increase in grade 13 enrolment. After a short period of levelling off at around 100,000, the number of live births climbed steadily each year to reach a new high of approximately 160,000 in 1960. I am sure the hon. members will realize, of course, that the survivors of those born in 1960, will probably graduate from high school in 1978, and 1979, and from our universities in 1982, or 1983.

In addition, we must take into account the added load arising through immigration from other provinces and countries; and I would point out to you that it is not an insignificant load. I note that in the period 1949 to 1962, Ontario received 261,000 children under 18 years of age from other countries—and, from other provinces, a net gain of 40,700 children under 16 years of age. Excluding those children under five years of age, we have had to supply during those few short years about 8,000 additional classrooms and teachers for immigrant children alone, over and above our own natural increase.

At the secondary level, enrolment was 37.6 per cent of the population aged 15-19 years in 1946, but reached 74.1 per cent in 1964. Actually, up to 1957 and 1958, the secondary school enrolment increases arose mainly through the increased retention rates; and, of course, under the reorganized programme of study such rates will no doubt continue to increase. I am comforted by the fact, however, that there is an automatic 100 per cent limit on the age group, and we are nearly three-quarters of the way along that road. But I think we can take some pride in the fact that these pressures have developed; nothing else could so dramatically illustrate the success of the policy of this government to extend secondary school facilities to all parts of our province, thus going far towards making equality of educational opportunity a reality.

As for the future, the predictions are rather staggering. For elementary schools, we started with 539,000 pupils enrolled in September, 1946, reached 1,278,500 by September, 1964, and anticipate that we should reach two million elementary school youngsters by 1982 or 1983. The secondary: 123,800 pupils in September, 1946, reached 395,300 in September, 1964, and will reach at least 700,000 about 1983. The enrolment figures of the universities I have given to the House on other occasions. And I see from my notes, after some study two or three days ago, that we may anticipate a levelling off in university enrolment in the early 1980s.

Now, for a glimpse into the more distant future, may I point out to the hon. members that, whereas the 0-5-years age group in 1941 totalled about 300,000—and some of the academic survivors of this group are presently pursuing their studies on the graduate fellowships—we anticipate that the same age group will total about 1,700,000 by 1986. And this may seem a long time in the future, Mr. Speaker, but really it is only 20 years hence; and the academic survivors of that group will constitute the high school enrolment of the year AD 2001.

Now, with such growth patterns—and I do apologize for taking so much time, but I think it is really rather relevant—with such growth patterns facing us in the segments of the present school system, why then do we add another part to the structure? Well, I suggest, Mr. Speaker, we really have no choice; certainly not as we press forward with our reorganized programmes in secondary schools. It is not feasible, and I suggest it is not indeed desirable, that all graduates of our high schools should go to university. The real needs of a very substantial number of our young people lie elsewhere; they would be served poorly and fare poorly in the traditional university programmes.

Perhaps the best summary of the situation may be found in the report of the grade 13 study committee, 1964, and I quote very briefly from it:

The truth of the matter is that we are now in an entirely different world from that of the 1920s and 1930s, and it is necessary that we extend our educational system to meet the demands of this new world. In the past, when we have faced that sort of crisis, we have solved the problem by expanding our secondary school programme—in 1871, for example, when we added general education for the many to special education for the few, or in the 1920s when technical training was introduced in a considerable number of high schools. In the present crisis, the need cannot be met simply by alterations or additions at secondary school level; this time we must turn our attention to the post-secondary level, where we must create a new kind of institution that will provide, in the interests of students for whom a university course is unsuitable, a type of training which universities are not designed to offer.

Fortunately, a beginning has been made in the establishment of the institutes of technology and vocational centres. The committee is therefore recommending the establishment of community colleges to provide these new and alternative programmes.

I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that the evidence of need and of demand for this new sector of our system is overwhelming.

Many people have assumed, but quite erroneously, that I am planning simply to import and implant, unchanged, in our province the system of junior colleges, or community colleges, that has been developed in the United States. It is true that the American junior college has had a long and honourable history, for 50 years or more in some states, but our "senior matriculation," so I am told, admitting to what was then the second year of a four-year BA degree course at the University of Toronto, dates back to 1853. We have, therefore, had experience for over a century with a programme half the length of the junior college transfer courses. Moreover, we have had vocational education at the secondary school level for over 40 years.

What we have in mind, therefore, as you will see in a few moments, is not the imposition of an imported or alien institution on our educational system, but the development and expansion of our present system to meet the particular needs of this province. Although it is true that our colleges of applied arts and technology may resemble some of their United States counterparts in many respects—and this is not surprising, since the age group is the same and the basic needs of youth in our two countries differ little—yet there will be real differences in programmes and in emphasis.

I hasten to add that, far from refusing to profit from experience elsewhere, we have deliberately sought to learn from others and to select the features which strengthen our own proposals. I have personally visited many of these new institutions in the United States, more recently in Florida and in California, and have discussed our tentative plans with knowledgeable educators and laymen in other provinces of Canada as well. As you no doubt know, a form of junior college, differing fundamentally from our proposed colleges in the emphasis on university-parallel courses, is being developed in Alberta and in British Columbia. We are observing their experience, Mr. Speaker, with great interest.

What programmes do we plan to offer in these colleges? As indicated earlier, we have in mind composite or comprehensive institutions, preferably with several buildings on the same campus, providing a wide variety of programmes of varying length, including work-experience programmes, by day and in the evening, for adults as well as for youth, and for probably more part-time than full-time students.

Nevertheless, some features will be common to all programmes: They will be to a substantial degree, occupation-oriented, they will be designed to meet the needs of the local community—and they will be "commuter" colleges. Residence or dormitory facilities will not be provided, except possibly in some areas of northern Ontario.

We have not yet determined the number and location of these colleges, or the final criteria which should determine the area that each should serve. I have initiated studies of all these matters, but definite decisions must naturally await the formation of the provincial council of regents referred to in the legislation. My hope is that a few such colleges will be in operation in the very near future. I would hope by September of 1966, when the first four-year graduates will be coming out of the secondary school programme, but I want to emphasize, Mr. Speaker, to have a planned and intelligent programme on a province-wide basis, this cannot be developed overnight.

Studies of local needs and requirements must be made in each case, and much will depend on evidence of real local interest in the establishment and operation of such an institution. We must decide what part our present institutes of technology and trades and vocational centres will play in the new plan. It may well be that the provincial council of regents will recommend a complete integration of existing institutions and efforts, using the present buildings, staff, and programmes as nuclei for the development of the new colleges.

As for the programmes, our plans are not yet advanced to the point where I can be specific and definite. Besides, the emphasis not only could but should vary from one community or region to another. In general, however, one may recognize three major responsibilities of every such college:

(1) to provide courses of types and levels beyond, or not suited to, the secondary school setting;

(2) to meet the needs of graduates from any secondary school programme, apart from those wishing to attend university; and

(3) to meet the educational needs of adults and out-of-school youth, whether or not they are secondary school graduates.

I would hope to see the following range of offerings in most if not all colleges of applied arts and technology, the choice to be determined by local circumstances, as indicated above, and extended where a particular need exists in a community.

(a) engineering technician and technologist programmes below university level;

(b) semi-professional non-engineering type programmes—e.g. in the paramedical field—

(c) high-level programmes in office and distributive occupations, specifically of junior and middle management level, and including courses for small business;

(d) agricultural and agricultural-related programmes, at least in rural areas, in co-operation with The Department of Agriculture;

(e) general adult education programmes, including cultural and leisure time activities;

(f) programmes of recreation, including physical education;

(g) general or liberal education courses, including remedial courses in basic subjects, and often incorporated as part of the other programmes;

(h) Retraining, upgrading and updating courses;

(i) pre-apprenticeship and apprenticeship;

(j) service industry courses;

(k) commercial courses; and

(l) other courses to meet local needs.

With respect to the general or liberal education courses, and the general adult education programmes, I would point out that these are not thought of as university-level courses. Nevertheless, and I wish to emphasize this, Mr. Speaker, no able and qualified student should be prevented from going on from a college of applied arts and technology to a university and, indeed, such a pattern exists today for able graduates of institutes of technology, as you may know. The university doors should always be open to capable and ambitious young men and women. It is our intention to set up a committee of representatives of the department and of the universities to determine, as proposed by the Ontario council of university faculty associations, in their recent brief to me, the conditions and procedures under which universities may grant admission to those students who have completed successfully an appropriate programme at one of our colleges of applied arts and technology and who have demonstrated that they are prepared to undertake university work.

Moreover, I have no doubt that where circumstances warrant it, some of our universities will make arrangements with particular colleges of applied arts and technology, as provided in the proposed legislation, to conduct one or two years of their own degree courses within those colleges. The present university extension courses leading to a general arts degree might be a logical beginning point. I should explain, Mr. Speaker, that the legislation provides that the board of governors of the college of applied arts and technology may enter into an agreement with an existing university to establish the first, or the first and second year of the actual university programme in affiliation with that institution. In such a programme, the academic content to be administered or supervised by the university.

You will note from the remarks, Mr. Speaker, that I have not included in the list of courses what is popularly referred to by the Americans as the "transfer" or "college parallel" courses, leading to advanced placement in universities, and I want to make this clear because there is no need for such courses in Ontario at the present time at least. In Ontario we have the grade 13 course in our secondary schools now, and will probably long have its possible successor, the proposed matriculation year, specifically designed as a university-preparatory programme for our academically able students.

May I remind hon. members also, that we have studied very carefully the needs of university-type courses and have adopted as government policy and, I think, with the general support of this House, an expansion of existing universities and the establishment of new universities sufficient to meet that particular demand for the foreseeable future. Present plans for expansion of university education should suffice for the remainder of this critical decade of the "sixties"; and we are now studying the demands of the "seventies." If circumstances so require, we will naturally change or make adaptations to our present plans.

I should mention some of my own thoughts on the organization, administration, and financing of these new colleges. We must, of course, have a province-wide system, carefully planned in its development, and built upon experience with institutes of technology and vocational centres. We have no choice but to press forward as rapidly as possible with the establishment of such colleges and if we are to do so they must, for the immediate future at least, be fully financed by the province, without local taxation. The headlong pace of technological change gives no chance of a pause in the development; the needs of young people, of the unemployed, and even of the employed are indeed urgent. It might take up to five years, and I think this is an optimistic estimate, to set up a provincial system of local administration and financing of such colleges, of the type I observed in Florida and California. We simply cannot wait five years; indeed, we cannot afford to mark time for even one year. As I stated earlier, the Ontario council of regents should co-ordinate our efforts and provide for a healthy growth. The legislation also provides for the establishment of local boards of governors who shall have the powers of incorporation, subject to regulation, and also for the establishment of local advisory committees in the various branches of studies.

For the foreseeable future, I think that these colleges will not be "free," but that a tuition fee, modest in amount, will be charged. It is anticipated that bursaries and Canada student loans will be available to many youngsters entering these colleges. However, the final details of administration and financing must await the result of studies already underway. At the present stage when plans and regulations are being drafted—which is a task my officials will undertake almost immediately—we shall invite the widest possible presentation of comments, suggestions, and proposals from interested parties. I have in mind, in particular, representations to be sought from leaders of industry, labour, and commerce; parents; trustees; and experienced educators.

We have not had an opportunity to investigate thoroughly the source of supply and the form of training required for the members of staff of these new colleges. From experience gained elsewhere, and within our own province in the cases of institutes of technology and vocational centres, however, I have gained the impression that many of the teachers will come from industry and commerce, and hence will already possess the essential technical skills. I recognize, of course, that it is inevitable that some of the teachers will be recruited from the present secondary school staffs, and from the university staffs, which will naturally pose some irksome problems of supply of staff for those already hard-pressed institutions. This is a difficulty that I acknowledge, but we are aware of and which will require careful study and consideration.

For the present, at least, it is my intention to commence operation of these new institutions under The Department of Education, not under the new Department of University Affairs, although the colleges will be post-secondary institutions and the fullest co-operation between these two departments of government will be essential. There are many advantages to be gained—and perhaps even a few disadvantages to be suffered—under such an arrangement. I would remind hon. members, for instance, that we have had in The Department of Education some considerable experience with institutes of technology and vocational centres, and in many respects these older institutions have served, and are serving even today, as prototypes in some areas, at least, of the new colleges.

Indeed, our present technological and trades training branch within the department might well be reconstituted and expanded to fulfil the necessary functions at that level. Further, we have over the years developed reasonably satisfactory financial working arrangements with the federal government authorities in the field of technical education and trade training, and we plan to take full advantage of these financial arrangements for our new colleges of applied arts and technology—and I should interject here, Mr. Speaker, that we have had some very excellent discussions with the federal Department of Labour and we are most encouraged by their attitude toward this proposed programme. I need hardly remind you that the new Department of University Affairs certainly has its hands full trying to cope with the vexing and significant problems of university expansion. In the meantime there must be some overlapping of functions and duties—without serious duplication. I realize that the presidents of our universities suggested that the so-called "city colleges" that they advocated should be administered by The Department of University Affairs, but in our discussions they readily admitted the logic of my proposal, and have never pressed this particular point. Perhaps sometime in the future, a change of jurisdiction will appear advisable, and if so, it will be made; for the present, however, the arrangements I have suggested seem much more advantageous.

I readily admit, Mr. Speaker, that this concept of colleges of applied arts and technology has captured my imagination; I am enthusiastic and optimistic about the probable outcome of this new venture in education. I am confident that it will go far to meet the needs of youth and adults in the future.

I wish, quite frankly, sir, that opportunities were generally available throughout our province today and we intend to see that developments take place as rapidly as possible. I recognize full well the scope and magnitude of the undertaking and I think this is rather relevant, Mr. Speaker; in numbers enrolled, if not in costs, the experts indicate that the new college system could eventually well outstrip the university family. But once more, and more particularly now that our four-year secondary school programmes are becoming accepted and are rapidly expanding, we simply must provide opportunities for the higher education of this segment of our population as well as for the university-bound group.

In closing, I wish to express my appreciation to the individuals and the groups such as the Ontario university presidents, the Ontario council of university faculty associations, and the Ontario teachers' federation who submitted briefs for our study.

The new colleges, Mr. Speaker, I think, will perhaps pay in returns to the individuals concerned some rewards in technical advancement, but I would hope more particularly, in human happiness and satisfaction.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Mr. Speaker, would you permit me very briefly to say that we on this side welcome the introduction of this bill, and although we looked for notice of it on the order paper, it is apparent, of course, that notice was delivered through the morning newspaper, and a very interesting notice it was, indeed.

We look forward, certainly, to discussing this, and I would compliment the hon. Minister on what he has called his "sketch"—but I would say a rather complete sketch—of what the bill entails.

If I may be permitted to ask, perhaps the hon. Minister would add to his lengthy statement a word or two on just what the involvement of the federal authorities might be in the financing of this great project.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, there has been no final conclusion, but we would estimate the federal authorities may contribute in the neighbourhood of 50 per cent to the vocational or technical aspects of the proposed development. Where the line will be drawn is very difficult to determine at this stage.

Mr. Nixon: The hon. Minister will look after remedial liberalism himself, then?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I am not sure whether that is the correct terminology—

Mr. Speaker: I may say to the member for Brant that I am informed by the clerk that notice was given some days ago and for some technical reason it has not been entered on the notice paper.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): If a little latitude is being given here this morning, I think on this occasion I can use it in a fashion that the other side of the House will quite likely approve of. Rarely has any bill come into this House that I felt as enthusiastic about as this one. Undoubtedly there will be points in it that, as we begin to dig into the great range of problems, we will have our differences on, but this is indeed a historic development in the educational system in the province of Ontario.

I listened to, and I would like to read with some care before I come to a final conclusion, the hon. Minister's apparent resolution of the difficulties in the two points of view as to a community college. Indeed, in that connection, Mr. Speaker, I think the time may well have come for us to cease leaning over so far backward and arguing that we are not going to import alien institutions into our system, because I think quite frankly we are fighting some myths here.

When I not only listened to the hon. Minister say that there is going to be worked out in studies that he has set up, a procedure that will assure the opportunity for the bright student to move ahead, but when I also heard him say that universities will, in effect, work out courses in these colleges and have them staffed and supervised by the universities—in fact, using these institutions as a junior college in the American sense—I thought maybe that part of tradition in Canadian history of saying that we will not have anything American is a bit of a hang-over from the American revolutionary war, and the emergence of the United Empire Loyalists in our midst is becoming a bit out of date.

There may well be some things in the American junior college system that are worthy of emulation, and I suspect if one examines carefully, they are being emulated here while we are saying that we will not have anything of it. Let us cease fighting these myths. Generally speaking, I welcome this and I congratulate the hon. Minister on coping with and solving many of the problems. I note that he stresses that the day may come, and is not too far off, when he will have to do some reorganization in his own Departments of Education and University Affairs, and I predict that that perhaps will be earlier than he thinks, or that he has publicly conceded it this morning.

THE CHILDREN'S INSTITUTIONS ACT, 1962-1963

Hon. L. P. Cecile (Minister of Public Welfare) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Children's Institutions Act, 1962-1963.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. L. P. Cecile (Minister of Public Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the amendment to The Children's Institutions Act increases the financial participation of the government in these centres of group care.

The provincial subsidies for construction of buildings and new additions will be doubled, it is raised from $2,500 per bed to the new maximum of $5,000 per bed. If the organization purchases an existing building, the grant will be up to $1,200 for each bed thus acquired.

Our financial support for the day-to-day maintenance and treatment of children has been extended, and the provincial subsidy has been increased from 50 per cent to 75 per cent of actual costs.

We have also removed the determination of the financial circumstances of parents. That is to say, 75 per cent of cost will be paid through my department for all children in the institutions, except wards of children's aid societies. These wards, as you know, are fully covered by the society, which recovers 100 per cent of such expenses from public funds.

As hon. members know, children's institutions were operated by private charitable organizations who give special care and attention to the child who is unable to live in his own home or a foster home. There are at present 21 of these institutions, and their programmes vary from normal group residences to the highly specialized treatment centres. Among the latter are the Boys' Village of Toronto, the Warrendale home at Newmarket, and the Sunnyside children's centre in Kingston.

Many of these groups are vitally concerned in maintaining and extending residential care for children. There are, for instance, nine orders of Catholic sisters; the Mennonite Church; the Salvation Army, and the Orange lodges. I believe that these amendments give fitting recognition to the private organizations which are doing such fine work in the field, and we are hopeful that with this encouragement, more treatment centres will result to the benefit of children who need such special care and attention.

THE HOMES FOR RETARDED CHILDREN ACT, 1962-1963

Hon. Mr. Cecile moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Homes for Retarded Children Act, 1962-1963.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Cecile: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this amendment to The Homes for Retarded Children Act is to give greater encouragement to the chain of local associations for retarded children throughout Ontario. There is a need for additional residential facilities which, in the main, operate in conjunction with special schools for the retarded child.

The amendment to the Act provides capital grants from the province of up to $5,000 per bed for new construction. This doubles the previous figure of $2,500 a bed. Where an existing building is acquired the grant will be $1,200 for each bed established.

We are satisfied that these grants will be most acceptable to local organizations and will stimulate an expansion of the accommodation available for retarded children.

A further amendment increases the provincial contribution to maintenance expenditures. The grant is now raised from 50 per cent to 75 per cent of daily costs for supporting a child in the home, and besides this percentage increase, we have eliminated the $5 daily maximum, so that the 75-per-cent subsidy is payable on actual costs. We have also removed the determination of the financial circumstances of the parents.

I am given to understand that the fine groups of citizens' associations who are concerned with the lives of retarded children in their own communities, will find these financial improvements of immense advantage in pressing forward with the programmes of residential care.

THE DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WELFARE ACT

Hon. Mr. Cecile moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Department of Public Welfare Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Cecile: Mr. Speaker, in introducing this amendment to The Department of Public Welfare Act, we are recognizing a need to encourage further consideration of municipal welfare services. We would like to see more local municipalities unify their welfare programmes under the authority of the county council, or in northern Ontario, under a district welfare administration board.

This amendment provides that the provincial government may share in the administration of expenditures of a county or district's consolidated services. Through the regulations we intend to make our share 50 per cent, in relation to the personnel and services directly involved in the welfare operation.

Participation in such costs is a new departure on the part of the province. This aspect of welfare responsibility has traditionally been an obligation of the local municipality. I should mention, however, that at this time, sharing in municipal administration does not apply to cities, which would normally remain outside a unified welfare service. It is known that few rural municipalities have a full-time welfare officer. In a consolidated administration, the county or district will likely employ a regular staff qualified to carry out the programme.

It should be noted that there are now four such welfare units established in Ontario. These are the counties of Wentworth, Prince Edward and Welland, and the district of Sudbury. We believe that consolidation of welfare services is a progressive step from many viewpoints. It assures, for one thing, that in general welfare assistance and the other municipal programmes, standards will be maintained at a high level and the services will be extended to the fullest possible.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this seems to be government legislation day.

THE PENSION BENEFITS ACT, 1965

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves first reading of bill intituled, The Pension Benefits Act, 1965.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make reasonably exhaustive statements concerning this bill, in order that it may be well and truly understood. There has been a great deal of misunderstanding in the area of pensions during the last two years and I think it is proper that we get this bill in perspective and that the hon. members know where it fits in the overall picture.

As hon. members know, The Pension Benefits Act became law during the 1962-63 session, and was amended in 1964 to repeal the standard plan provisions, which were rendered no longer necessary in view of the intervening announcement that the Canada Pension Plan would be introduced on a national basis. The establishment of pension plans by employers under this Act is no longer compulsory, but the plans that exist are regulated by the terms of this legislation.

The purpose of the Act, as it now stands, is to strengthen the existing system of private pensions by requiring that the pension benefits should, under certain conditions, be portable and by establishing standards of solvency. While no employer is required to establish or maintain in force a pension plan for his employees, those who do so must provide vested pension benefits in the form of deferred annuities for employees who leave employment over age 45, after having completed ten years' service. Moreover, to help ensure that the pension promises will be kept, the plan must be funded and the pension fund must be properly invested.

The Pension Benefits Act came into full effect on January 1 of this year and the pension commission has received more than 8,100 applications for registration of pension plans operating in this province. The vast majority of these plans have already been amended to a greater or lesser degree, in order to comply with the new standards.

To illustrate the positive achievements of our policy, I need only mention that in more than half the plans, the vesting rights were seriously inadequate before the Act came into effect. Statistics published by the pension commission show that in the case of 4,359 pension plans covering some 553,000 Ontario members, the employee was not entitled to full vesting of his pension benefits until he had in excess of ten years' service with the employer or participation in the plan. All these plans affecting that number of people have had to be amended and the amendments were, of course, in favour of the employee members.

Moreover, 98 plans were completely unfunded, being operated on a pay-as-you-go basis, and 76 plans were unfunded except as regards retired people. These two classes covered some 43,000 employees. Many other plans were not funded up to the level required under the Act and in all these cases the financing will be strengthened, resulting in a greater measure of retirement security for the employees.

The necessity of making the amendments to the terms of pension plans and filing them for registration has, in many cases, imposed considerable burdens upon employers and their pension advisers. The response has been most encouraging and we greatly appreciate the co-operation of employers in industry, commerce and elsewhere in this very necessary task.

The Canada Pension Plan will soon be providing an additional source of income for those retiring in the future, but this will obviously not meet all the pension needs of our workers. The supplementation of the public plan by private plans is essential if we are to have a well-balanced pension system. I want to make it very clear that there is no conflict between the aims of the Ontario Act, which regulates private plans, and the new national plan.

I have pointed out on previous occasions that the Ontario Act is a piece of pioneer legislation which we are ready to expand and improve in the light of experience. Some of this experience has now been gained. The Pension Benefits Act has been subject to careful review during the last 12 months and a number of improvements can now be made to strengthen the legislation and in the interest of achieving uniformity of legislation across Canada.

Following my proposal to the other provinces at the conference of provincial Prime Ministers held at Jasper Park last summer, two interprovincial conferences have been held to consider a model or uniform pension benefits Act to be used in the provinces right across Canada. The representatives of the provinces, as well as the federal government observers, have made many helpful suggestions in producing uniform legislation for consideration by each province. A very large measure of agreement was reached by the representatives who attended these conferences, on the need for uniformity and how it might be achieved across Canada, in the basic rules governing pension plans, and on such matters as the vesting formula, locking-in of contributions, interprovincial co-operation and the need for ensuring solvency of pension funds.

I am pleased to be able to report to the House that the province of Quebec has indicated its intention to introduce its own Act regulating private plans, to be effective on January 1, 1966, as was foreshadowed in the resolution of the Quebec Legislature on June 9, 1964. We understand that in spite of some differences of form due to legal technicalities, the Quebec Act will closely follow the uniform pension benefits Act in all its essentials.

In other words, we are reaching a point where we can co-operate with the province of Quebec in this area.

The uniform pension benefits Act provides for making agreements between provinces to avoid duplicate reporting and duplicate examination of pension plans where the employer operates in more than one province. We are ready to enter into discussions on such an agreement with Quebec and with any other provinces adopting this uniform legislation.

In view of the understandings reached with the representatives of other provinces and the favourable position taken by Quebec, our goal of uniform rules regulating pensions across Canada is in sight. In addition, the federal Minister of Finance has stated that as soon as there is a wide measure of agreement by the provinces, the government of Canada will introduce similar legislation applicable to employees under federal jurisdiction.

Incidentally, it is interesting to note that the concept of portable pensions is finding support in the United States. In January, President Johnson's committee on corporate pension funds and other private retirement and welfare programmes recommended that a "private pension plan, in order to qualify for favoured tax treatment, must provide some reasonable measure of vesting for the protection of employees."

Hence it is evident that the initiative that we have taken in the last few years—and it has taken a few years to develop this—has borne fruit in many places. We are therefore moving to the next stage by introducing at this time a revised Pension Benefits Act, which has been developed from our discussions with representatives of other governments.

The pension commission of Ontario announced earlier that the new uniform bill will not contain any changes that will require re-registration of pension plans already registered with the commission. The bill that I am introducing for first reading adheres to this undertaking. This is naturally a very important consideration for employers who have amended their plans in the last few months and who may have to make even further amendments in consequence of the Canada Pension Plan.

Mr. Speaker, bearing in mind the widespread misunderstanding of this legislation, I should like to summarize the differences between the provisions of this new bill and the provisions of the present Act.

First of all, we have introduced the concept of a designated province, to refer to a province that enacts legislation substantially similar to this bill. The statutory rules will become applicable in each designated province on the date named by that province under the terms of its pension benefits Act. In this way we will be able to achieve the uniformity that we seek across the country.

This will mean that the vesting and locking-in rules will become applicable at different dates across Canada. This problem is temporary and has been solved by linking the rights and obligations of a member of a pension plan to the qualification date in his particular province. The qualification date in this province is January 1, 1965.

Second, as in the case of the present Act, this bill does not require employers to establish pension plans. It merely lays down the terms and conditions under which pensions must be provided under pension plans that are now, or in future will be, established. Although none of the proposed amendments of The Pension Benefits Act requires any retroactive improvement of pension benefits, they do close several loopholes which have existed.

Third, the definition of "employer" has been broadened to include the successors and assigns of an employer in order to prevent evasion of liability under the Act through corporate reorganization. The definition has also been broadened to include the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto and its local boards; other municipalities were included in the original Act but Metro Toronto was omitted.

Fourth, the vesting of employer contributions and the locking-in of employee contributions commences when an employee has been in the service of the employer for a continuous period of ten years, or has been a member of the same pension plan for ten years, and has attained the age of 45 years. The reference to pension-plan membership for the ten-year period has been added to include so-called multi-employer plans under the Act. This simply means that an employee may work for several employers while at the same time participating in one multi-employer same pension plan.

Fifth, in order to prevent possible evasion through suspension of employment intended to interrupt the ten-year qualification period, the definition of "service for a continuous period" provides that periods of temporary suspension will not interrupt the period of employment for the purposes of the Act.

Sixth, supplemental pension plans will be required to be registered. A supplemental pension plan is a plan established for employees who are entitled to become members only if they are members in another plan. In many of these plans the employer is not required to make contributions—they are sometimes referred to as employee-pay-all plans. If they are supplemental to a separate plan they must be registered notwithstanding that the employer is not required to make contributions.

Seventh, plans that do not require employer contributions—except the supplemental plans that I have just mentioned—will not be required to register. This exception is introduced to exempt employee-pay-all plans and union or fraternal plans controlled by union or fraternal membership.

Eighth, the provisions for reciprocity and co-operation among the provinces of Canada have been broadened. The bill provides that the pension commission may, subject to the approval of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, not only enter into agreements with other provinces for the reciprocal registration, audit and inspection of pension plans, but also delegate to other provinces such functions and powers under this Act as the commission may determine. The purpose of this provision is to make it possible for every employer to register his pension plan in only one province, and by so doing qualify in all provinces. It is probable that the rule will be that an employer will register in the province in which the majority of his employees report for work.

Ninth, the commission may, in addition, subject to the approval of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, authorize a Canadian association of pension commissions to carry out such duties as the commission may require. The purpose of this is that uniformity not only must be achieved at the outset, but it must be maintained as the whole proposition of pensions develops. One of the functions of the proposed Canadian association of pension commissions would be to conduct interprovincial consultations to maintain uniformity in the changes that lie in the future.

Tenth, the former provision of the establishment in 1970 and thereafter of an advisory review committee is to be repealed. The functions of such a committee will, to a large extent, be assumed by the pension authorities in the various provinces who will confer among themselves through the proposed Canadian association.

Eleventh, a new provision is added to enable members of pension plans to designate beneficiaries who may receive benefits upon the employee's death.

Twelfth, the existing Act provides penalties which, upon reconsideration, have been found to be too severe. The bill therefore drops the penalty of imprisonment but provides that an employer who is convicted of an offence must pay to the pension plan all amounts that he has wrongly failed to pay as required by the bill. Our purpose is to protect the rights of plan members and this can be done most effectively by requiring financial compliance. Officers and directors of a corporation who acquiesce in an offence under the Act may be made personally liable for the default of the corporation.

Thirteenth, the present Act unintentionally locks in employees' voluntary additional contributions and the bill corrects this error. Employees are permitted to withdraw up to 25 per cent of the commuted value of their deferred life annuity under a pension plan prior to attaining normal retirement age, but apart from this exception employee required contributions made after January 1, 1965, are locked in. Voluntary additional contributions may be withdrawn at any time if a pension plan permits such withdrawal.

Fourteenth, the statutory restrictions upon surrender or commutation do not apply after the death of an employee.

The bill introduces a new provision here permitting variation of the amount of a deferred life annuity by employee election. It simply gives an additional measure of flexibility in the plan, and if a plan so provides, an employee may elect to receive a reduced annuity upon early retirement or an increased annuity if retirement is deferred. He may also elect optional annuities to survivors and he may elect to vary the term of the annuity payable to his beneficiaries after his death.

Fifteenth, the formula for the benefits and contributions may be governed by regulations in order that the obligations imposed by the Act shall not be avoided by an unreasonable type of plan.

Sixteenth, upon termination or winding up of the pension plan all vested and locked-in contributions to the plan must be used to provide the deferred life annuity to which every employee and former employee is entitled, as if the employees had left the service individually. This provision is necessary to prevent retroactive evasion of the provisions of the Act by the winding-up of a pension plan.

Seventeenth, a further rule affecting plans that are terminated will require the employer to pay to his pension plan all amounts that he has failed to pay as required by the solvency regulation up to the date of termination of the plan. The employer must be up to date and acting in conformity with the regulations. As hon. members know, the present requirement is that plans have 25 or 15 years to make up unfunded deficiencies.

Eighteenth, to provide needed flexibility, the commutation for cash of small annuities of less than $10 a month is allowed, and a lump sum payment or series of payments may be made in cases of mental or physical disability, as prescribed by regulations. Except in such circumstances, a retiring employee may not commute the pension in respect of service after January 1, 1965.

Nineteenth, the bill includes a new section to protect employees from any loss of existing pension rights as a result of the coming into force of the Canada Pension Plan. Pension plans may be amended to integrate with the Canada Pension Plan, but no such amendment shall have the effect of reducing pensions purchased by contributions in respect of service prior to January 1, 1966.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, and to summarize what I have said, this Act remedies certain weaknesses and fills certain loopholes that have been found in the present Act.

1. It does not depart from the principles of the present Act.

2. It protects employees from loss of existing rights in private plans that are amended because of the Canada Pension Plan.

3. It is independent of the Canada Pension Plan and does not conflict with any federal pension legislation.

4. It has been drafted in co-operation with other provinces.

5. It does not require the re-registration of pension plans that already qualify for Ontario registration.

6. It further strengthens the retirement security of one million present members of Ontario pension plans and those who come after them.

7. This Act not only protects pension rights in this province, but is an important part of a larger edifice which will, we believe, ultimately cover pension plans across Canada with uniform rules.

Hon. I. Haskett (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we have with us today a distinguished group from the neighbouring jurisdiction of the state of Michigan. The group comprises a government committee studying methods of indemnifying the victims of motor vehicle accidents. It is interested in Ontario's motor vehicle accident claims fund, and with the officials of The Department of Transport is reviewing the content of our Act.

We welcome these fellow legislators to Ontario and I would ask now that Representatives Boos, Stempien, Holbrook and Swallow, and Mr. Sanders, from the government of Michigan, rise and be recognized by our Chamber.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I would like to take this opportunity to report briefly to the House in connection with the dispute between the three Toronto newspapers and Local 91 of the International Typographical Union.

You will recall, sir, that on March 15 of this year, the hon. Prime Minister made a comprehensive statement to the House in connection with the dispute. At that time he asked me to call a meeting of the two parties to explore their current position with a view to reopening negotiations. This meeting was held on March 22. At the meeting I asked both the publishers and the union to prepare written statements of their respective positions to determine whether or not there was any reasonable basis upon which negotiations could be resumed.

After extensive analysis and study of these documents, my officials and I met with the union on April 6 and discussed its submission in an effort to clarify a number of points.

To ensure that every resource at our disposal was utilized, I met on April 9 with His Honour Judge Anderson of Belleville, Ontario. Judge Anderson, Mr. Speaker, had acted as the chairman of the board of conciliation earlier in the dispute, and needless to say he is widely respected in the field of industrial relations. I reviewed current developments with him, and he agreed to make himself available to attend all future meetings with the parties and to act in the capacity of a mediator should the opportunity arise.

I would like at this time to record my deep appreciation for the efforts that Judge Anderson so unsparingly gave to this undertaking.

On April 12, I, along with Judge Anderson and the deputy Minister of Labour, met with the publishers and members of their staffs. We discussed the publishers' position with respect to prior approval from the international headquarters of any proposal for a contract by the local union. We also discussed the question of return to work for strikers in the face of existing staff. The results of this meeting were communicated to the union representatives at a meeting with them on April 22. Several days later I met again with the union for a further discussion concerning the steps that it might take in the light of the publishers' decision.

In the interval between these meetings, I was in contact with Bishop Wilkinson of the Anglican Church, the Reverend Mr. Howse, the moderator of the United Church of Canada, and Bishop Morroco, the auxiliary bishop of the Toronto archdiocese of the Roman Catholic Church. These gentlemen had expressed concern over the situation that had developed during the last few months and I endeavoured to keep each of them informed as to the efforts that were being made to assist the parties in reaching a settlement. Naturally, the church leaders were interested in the effect that this dispute was having on the individual members of the union.

However, it must be acknowledged that individual hardships resulting from a lengthy dispute of this nature are difficult for government to deal with. First, as a government we are obliged to deal with the elected leaders and appointed representatives of the union who, we must assume, serve the best interests and majority wishes of the membership. As well, organized labour is firm in its opposition to government intervention in the internal management or supervision of union affairs. I should also mention, Mr. Speaker, that in view of the deep involvement of the International Typographical Union in this dispute, on April 27 I sent a telegram to Mr. Elmer Brown, the international president, asking him to meet with me in Toronto at his earliest convenience to discuss the international union's role in this dispute. However, I was subsequently informed that it was inconvenient for Mr. Brown to come to Toronto.

On April 30, the local union advised me that it had prepared a proposal which in its view embodied a basis for fruitful discussion. At its request, I scheduled a meeting for the union with the publishers, but before the meeting could take place I received a wire from the president of the local union asking me to cancel the meeting because of "certain developments." I later learned that these developments were in the form of a directive from the international headquarters, instructing the local union to refrain from making its proposal to the publishers under threat of suspension to the officers and members of the local union.

In a dispute of this character, there are two possible approaches to settlement as far as government is concerned. The first is to impose a solution by compulsory arbitration. The second is to employ the most forceful persuasion in an endeavour to bring the parties together so that they will settle their differences themselves. From the outset neither party has been in favour of compulsory arbitration as a means of settling this dispute, nor do management and labour as a whole endorse this principle as an accepted method of resolving industrial disputes.

Support for the union's position was illustrated recently when a resolution calling for compulsory arbitration to settle this strike was defeated at the meeting of the Ontario federation of printing trade unions.

Accordingly, the second method was utilized throughout this dispute. There is general agreement, even among the parties themselves, that the government has exhausted every means at its disposal to assist them in resolving this dispute. Under these circumstances, I cannot, at this time, see any further steps that can be taken by this government to effect a settlement. Nonetheless, we shall continue our efforts to this end and shall be available. The entire resources of The Department of Labour and, indeed, of the entire government, stand ready to assist in such undertakings.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

THE MEAT INSPECTION ACT (ONTARIO), 1962-1963

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture) moves second reading of Bill No. 138, An Act to amend The Meat Inspection Act (Ontario), 1962-1963.

Mr. M. Gaunt (Huron-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few comments on Bill No. 138, The Meat Inspection Act (Ontario), 1962-1963. The original intent of this Act was that the bill should provide for a joint provincial-federal agreement whereby the actual inspection would be done by the federal inspectors and these inspectors would be paid by the province. There were certain difficulties inherent in such an arrangement, one of them being the fact that the federal inspectors were used to enforcing very stringent and strict regulations. Even though in our province we would have our own regulations, the fear of many of us on this side of the House—and I believe on the government side as well—is in the fact that the interpretation of the regulations by the inspectors themselves would be rather strict, the enforcement of which would, perhaps, put many of the smaller operators, butchers and processors in this province out of business. So it was, and presumably this is so. The hon. Minister of Agriculture has taken it upon himself actually to do our own inspecting in this province with our own inspectors, and frankly I think this is the way we have to do it.

There are a few questions that I would ask in this respect. One of them is, will the entire province come under this Act all at one time, or will it be done on a regional basis? Second, will northern Ontario and perhaps the more remote parts of the province come under this Act as well? Third, are all the inspectors hired? Are they veterinarians or will there be some lay people involved in the actual inspecting of the meat across this province?

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member for Huron-Bruce, first of all I want to say I appreciate his support of the fact that the province of Ontario has introduced meat inspection on its own.

In reply to his questions: First of all, dealing with the entire province at one time, I think it would be impossible and impractical to declare the entire province under inspection at once. The proposal being carried out now is first of all to engage a group of inspectors who have had as much experience as possible, to start the inspection. This has now been done. The second group of inspectors is now being trained. They are not all veterinarians, although many of them are veterinarians, particularly in the first group. In the second group they are mostly all lay inspectors. We have tried, insofar as possible, to hire people who have had experience in the meat business. Many of them have had previous inspection experience. We would hope that as time goes on we would gradually expand the service right across the province.

As far as northern Ontario is concerned, this will be taken in. As a matter of fact, northern Ontario may be covered with meat inspection sooner than other parts of the province. We are trying to work out some details now as far as inspection in northern Ontario is concerned and I am hopeful that they will result in the early implementation of meat inspection in northern Ontario. Certainly it will be covered, and I would hope as expeditiously as possible.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE SEED POTATOES ACT

Hon. Mr. Stewart moves second reading of Bill No. 139, An Act to amend The Seed Potatoes Act.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE FARM PRODUCTS MARKETING ACT

Hon. Mr. Stewart moves second reading of Bill No. 140, An Act to amend The Farm Products Marketing Act.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Mr. Speaker, very briefly on Bill No. 140, there are two matters that I would like to mention to the House.

One of the principles in this bill removes from those who have the responsibility of operating a farm marketing board, the danger of suit on a personal basis, and the hon. Minister may be already aware that there is a suit before the court involving the tobacco marketing board.

When this was introduced on first reading, I mentioned this to the hon. Minister, and asked him if he felt that there would be a retroactive effect. I know that the people concerned would be very interested in the opinion of the hon. Minister, or his advisors, on what effect, if any, this bill would have on the suit that is at present before the courts.

As you know, the tobacco farmers involved—the freelancers, as they have come to be known during the months of their difficulties—have been trying every legal device open to them to test the legislation that has been passed by this House and have been unsuccessful to this point. Apparently this is a last attempt to make the officers of the tobacco marketing board personally responsible for refusing them the right to grow their crop.

Certainly this case would be of much interest, and I would hope that the hon. Minister might comment himself as to what effect, if any, this amendment might have on the case I have brought to his attention.

Second, the rest of the bill deals with means of appealing on behalf of certain farmers, or any farmer who would have some dealing with the marketing board set up under legislation that we in the farm community have become so familiar with. This question has come up two or three times in this very week in the Legislature and in the committees of the House, as to whether or not suitable appeal procedure has been built into the legislation or is proposed for other legislation of a similar nature that is before the House at the present time.

We were interested to hear the views of the attorneys advising the hon. Minister, who feel that without any specific inclusions, other than what are present in this Bill 140 and bills similar to it, a farmer has ample opportunity to appeal beyond the marketing board and through the legislation, and this would be available.

But he referred to the prerogative writs—which names I have difficulty with—the writ of mandamus, writ of prohibition and writ of certiorari, and evidently these have nothing whatsoever to do with facts in dispute. In the words of the hon. Minister's own advisers, natural justice—whatever that is—is available. However, this does not permit the farmer to appeal facts of the case to any higher authority. So often, I would submit to him, this is the frustrating aspect of a bill that according to the hon. Minister's advisers would have ample appeal built into it.

But there is some reason to doubt whether appeal in this respect is in fact sufficient, particularly when we realize that these bills when they become Acts have very far-reaching and sweeping authority, which is administered by those appointed by the hon. Minister of Agriculture and has economic life and death influence on the farmers that are subject to the rulings.

I would appeal again to the hon. Minister—and I know that he is very sensitive on this point, as all of us must be who would go back and talk of the farmers' concern—that appeal be made as broad and simple and easy and cheap and clear as possible.

With these few remarks, I would otherwise support the inclusion in The Farm Products Marketing Act, the safeguards set out in section 2 for those who have to take the responsibility of administering the Act and for the appeal procedures that have been included in this bill.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, may I make a few brief comments? As a layman, as I understand it, this problem of being able to appeal only certain features and not able to introduce new facts, is a general problem in appeals, not just regarding farm products marketing. Therefore I do not know, I just plead incompetence, as to how one solves that aspect of the problem my hon. friend has raised.

But on the other aspect of the problem, and I now go back to the discussion that we had on the similar issue in the standing committee on agriculture the other day, I must say now, Mr. Speaker, I am persuaded of the wisdom of the proposal that the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Kerr) made in the committee, and that is that no harm will be done and certainly some assurance will be given to spelling out in all of our marketing legislation, the fact that there is a right of appeal through writ of mandamus, prohibition or certiorari.

Now I was assured by the hon. Minister and by his solicitor that this power is there, and quite frankly, I think it is there. I am persuaded that it is there, but I think, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. Minister of Agriculture perhaps would agree with me, from the case that I cited in the House last night. And when we get to as high places as the chairman of one of these boards in the province of Ontario, himself a magistrate, expressing such serious doubts as to whether or not there is a right of appeal, and even exploring, as the record would indicate, half a dozen different ways to penalize this person and deny him his right to a writ of prohibition, I think that the time has come that we lay this down in the Act.

Now maybe I am beating the gun on Mr. McRuer's report. Conceivably this is going to be what he is going to report, but we are now dealing with legislation at the very moment and in light of what I presented to the House last night, I think the proposal in the standing committee of the hon. member for Halton has validity, and I wonder if the hon. Minister would not give some consideration to it here, as well as in The Milk Industry Act.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, the matter first of all that was raised by the hon. member for Brant in connection with the suit, as it is outlined here in section two of this bill, is I must confess, not retroactive. At the time I introduced the bill, the hon. member asked if there would be a retroactive feature in it and I believe at that time I replied that I assumed that it would have a retroactive effect; and really I felt it would have, and I still feel it would have, because to my knowledge there is only one suit now before the courts, and that is the one he mentioned pertaining to the freelance tobacco growers against the members of the flue cured tobacco growers marketing board and the members of the farm products marketing board, and I believe, some others.

Now, quite frankly, I cannot for the life of me, see the wisdom of pursuing this suit, because it has proceeded through every stage of appeal that is possible in the province of Ontario, right up to the Supreme Court of Canada and has been thrown out. In effect, the supreme court has said that they uphold the flue cured tobacco growers marketing board in the decision that they made, which decision was in turn referred for appeal to the farm products marketing board, from there to the Ontario Court of Appeal and from there to the Supreme Court of Canada.

This is why I said I would assume it would have the effect of being retroactive—but I must confess that in the legislation it is not retroactive.

Now, with regard to the means of appeal—and I would like to deal with what the hon. member for Brant has said, as well as what has been said by the hon. member for York South—I had not felt that we would get around to debating this matter quite so soon. I felt it would likely come up in debate in the committee of the whole House, in regard to The Milk Act. However, I am quite prepared to discuss it this morning.

I think the surest proof that the right of appeal protects the individual has happened in regard to the freelance tobacco growers in what I have just outlined. This has gone right through the whole process, not spelled out in The Farm Products Marketing Act, but taken as a natural action of common law. Now, I know that the hon. member for Halton made this suggestion in the committee the other day, of spelling this out in legislation. I would point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that I feel that the fact that in the bill, in the new milk bill—if I may refer to that as well as in The Farm Products Marketing Act—there is a responsibility lying to the Minister.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, this must imply the protection of the individual and the right of the individual to appeal on any decision that may pertain to that which might be decided to be only a point of law. This is really the point to which I think both hon. members were referring this morning. I think it is taken care of in that.

Were we to say to a commission or to a marketing board, "You are set over there as a completely independent authority to do as you see fit in every respect, without any regard or any responsibility to this House," then I think we could rightly so feel that perhaps sometimes, under some circumstances, some individual might feel that he had not received justice. But as the Act is worded, I feel that this is taken care of.

Now, I quite frankly feel that as this bill, and indeed, the milk bill, is drafted, all of these things are taken care of.

I would like to read just a brief paragraph here that has been provided for me by our solicitors in consultation with Mr. H. E. Harris, QC, and I would like to say that Mr. Harris, whom hon. members met the other day at the agriculture committee, is perhaps, as I said in the committee meeting, the most profound authority on marketing legislation in Canada that I know of—on farm products marketing legislation—and we value his opinion very highly. That is why we engaged him as a solicitor to assist us in the drafting of this legislation.

Now, under the laws of this province, I am advised that the courts, by means of orders known as mandamus, prohibition, and certiorari, may exercise control over the commission and every person has the right to apply to the courts for one of these orders. Now my understanding—and I asked what all of these things meant—is as follows:

First, by an order of mandamus, the court may require the commission to carry out its lawful duties. Second, by order of prohibition, the court may prevent the commission from taking some action which it is not empowered to take. And third, by an order of certiorari the court may remove a proceeding that was before the commission into the court, and if after a hearing the court is satisfied there has been a denial of justice it may quash the decision of the commission or may direct the commission to take or refrain from taking such action as the court directs.

It appears, therefore, that the right to obtain these orders preserves the right of every person to test in the courts any action or decision by the commission where (a) he believes that it was taken or made without lawful authority or was based upon a wrong interpretation of the law; or (b) he alleges that he has been denied a fair hearing or otherwise has been denied what is known as natural justice.

I would feel that with these precautions we have surely provided the individual with every right to protect his interest in so far as it is humanly possible to do so under British law. It is quite right that I am very sensitive about this; I feel there must be every right provided. But I would point out with respect to the people with whom this legislation may have to deal from time to time that we do not want to leave the legislation so open that every appeal of the marketing boards to the farm products marketing board, or in the case of milk from the milk marketing board to the milk commission, will always be open to dispute and the cases will be before the courts of this country.

I think all hon. members of this House would agree that this might be placing in jeopardy—I would not say in jeopardy—but certainly placing the administration of these respective Acts in the position of having constantly to be before the courts on matters of appeal. I feel that a responsible board or a responsible commission in turn, must surely express its responsibility for the administration of the legislation that is afforded it to carry out, whose responsibility it is to administer; and that surely we must respect their decisions and get on with the business for which they were originally set up, always bearing in mind, Mr. Speaker, that we have the guarantee of the rights of those individuals who feel that they have been aggrieved.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

Clerk of the House: The first order. Resuming the adjourned debate on the amendment to the motion that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair and that the House resolve itself into the committee on ways and means.

ON THE BUDGET

Mr. E. Sargent (Grey North): Mr. Speaker, before taking off, I would like to add to the rest of my colleagues in complimenting the government on the community colleges education, and to add that this is a mounting sign that the government, in spite of their lethargy, will have to do something about taking the education costs off real estate, which I plan to show shortly here.

Before the House is an Act to provide for the establishment and operation of commuter services. This legislation is good legislation, I believe, under which the Golden Horseshoe will spend a capital sum of $7 million out of consolidated revenue and a subsidy of $2 million a year thereafter. I do not think anyone can quarrel with the idea to give more mobility to this wonderful area and the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) has made the statement that this will project more revenues into other parts of the province for highway development. Now, this kind of thing we have heard before; going back to the $20 million subway grant from the province of Ontario to Toronto. I suggest to the hon. members that if we follow the same line of thinking, the hon. Prime Minister should in all fairness, to those of us not in this area—if he is going to give $7 million for commuter mobility, he should set aside a like sum of $14 million for the rest of the province and say, "We have allotted $14 million capital to subsidize your transit plans, your mobility"—

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): I understand there are a lot of commuters from Owen Sound to Chatsworth.

Mr. Sargent:—"and a $2 million maintenance fund every year along the same basis." The same line of thinking was suggested back to the $20 million we gave to Toronto; in other words $40 million should have been set aside to municipalities across Ontario and I suggest that this is not inequitable. It is inequitable to dig into the public purse at a time when we are talking about redistribution, when rural Ontario is losing its voting power through this Act, and to continue to discriminate because the government has the foresight to see that the most votes are in metropolitan areas.

An hon. member: On the contrary.

Mr. Sargent: And I think it is most unfair for the hon. Prime Minister to tell this House that this will project more revenue for highway development when he will not lay down the amounts he will set aside and make available to municipalities.

Along the same line, I think we are all conscious of decentralization, we all talk a lot in that regard, but we feel the $50 million development around this operation here, a $600 million nuclear plant in this area, $5 million for the centennial, $5 million for research, $5 million for adult training, and I am sorry to say that the hon. Minister of Education (Mr. Davis) did not ask me if I would like Mercer reformatory located around my riding. These things do not happen; they just place them where it fits the government policy.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): What does the hon. member think about Douglas Point?

Mr. Sargent: Not very much.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: It is Douglas Point he is talking about.

An hon. member: There is nobody up there who needs Mercer anyway.

Mr. Sargent: I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the decentralization scheme is very important to those of us in outlying Ontario. The fact is that the present government is ignoring the rest of the province for Toronto.

I have a great respect for the hon. Prime Minister. In my inaugural speech in this House I said that he was the average man but a bit smaller and I do not go back on that, but in this House yesterday, he had occasion to call the hon. member for Woodbine stupid. Well, I think—

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): I sometimes disagree with my hon. friend from Woodbine, but I certainly do not think he is stupid.

Mr. Sargent: All right, and last night the hon. Minister of Highways (Mr. Mac-Naughton) suggested that I had a corner on stupidity over here—

Mr. Bryden: He said the hon. member lost the chance to observe.

Mr. Sargent: I may go along with that, but I would say in a light vein, recalling the crime bill, if I ever saw a lesson in stupidity it was the hon. Prime Minister taking advice from his back benchers and trying to stick-handle that one, when all he needed was the intestinal fortitude to admit that he had goofed and made a mistake. I think from now on the hon. Prime Minister should think twice before he says anyone is stupid.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I would never make such a remark.

Mr. Sargent: As long as we know where we stand. The hon. Prime Minister should always look at his hole card.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I will take the hon. member's advice.

Mr. Sargent: Now we are going to build this $50 million development in the Metro area and these buildings will house many more civil servants. It is noteworthy that in Canada after the war there were 130,000 civil servants; I imagine the population then was about 17 or 18 million. Today, in Canada there are over 400,000 federal civil servants, not counting the provinces, and we have only three million more people. So we have tripled our civil servants with only three million people. So we are going to have a lot more civil servants housed here in Toronto.

And I am not questioning the need for these. But I do question the need that so many of them should work in Toronto. For instance, the Ontario water resources commission is supposed to supervise the water resources of this province, yet the only office is in Toronto. It would seem to me that the representatives and offices of such an organization should be located in the various centres throughout the province. This would place the services in the areas of the need and also distribute wage-earners to the small centres outside of Toronto. There are likely other government sections which could also be decentralized. I believe this should be a part of the government policy, to look for regional development of this great province.

Speaking of regional development, there is a prize editorial in the Cobourg newspaper and it calls this government the "game fixers." It says:

Why did the Ontario government appoint a select committee when Mr. Robarts was already there with his prediction?

It goes on to quote:

Hon. Mr. Robarts goes on to say:

"Our thinking tends toward the regional approach."

It is like fixing the hockey score, they say, before the game. The government agent cannot properly serve the town of Cobourg by running our affairs in Peterborough. The more regional a government, the more remote the control. Absentee ownership is the precursor of insolvency.

Now the government committee chairman, Hollis Beckett, PC, York East, in looking down his nose at every vulnerable municipality in Ontario, stated: "That local grassroots governments may eventually be left to deal with licensing dogs, building sidewalks and connecting sewers."

It goes on to say:

Do you remember when the Hon. Leslie Frost became astounded one memorable day when he suddenly learned that education was costing some million dollars more? The government was supposed to control the education dollar; it didn't, it ran out of money, and the taxpayers became the scapegoats again. They were charged a new three per cent sales tax to cover up the government's delinquency. Is that the way to run a business, Mr. Government Representative? Is your government competent to administer the affairs of every municipality in Ontario when it can't run its own show, when it has no clue where lavish expenditure is leading?

If every federal MP at Ottawa and every MPP at Toronto were made to serve an apprenticeship by operating a business in the black with one of two or ten employees for five or ten years before being permitted to go into Parliament, then we might hope to expect some form of economy in Canada. Until government can prove its own efficiency and get out of debt, every move it makes along this line should be challenged, as it seems every time government proposes some new deal, whether the proposition is regional government provincially or a new federal post office, we know it is going to cost each one of us more.

So when the government talks economy and regional development, it does not mean what it says. Its business is to run deeper and deeper in debt and you can take it from us that is one hell of a way to run a country.

That is a quotation from the Cobourg Sentinel. That expresses the views of a lot of people in rural Ontario on the plan for regional development.

In an issue, a week ago, of the Globe and Mail, the banner on the editorial page said, "Bankruptcy Feared." This article went on about Peel county and about the increase in education taxes. To sum it up, it said, and I quote from the second paragraph:

Bolton Reeve H. M. Allen says the increased education costs will deter new development. "No industry in its right mind would come into Bolton with the costs facing us," he said.

Last week in Owen Sound they said they had to have a new school of $1,200,000 and a new $1 million water plant, and the municipal board will not let them build them. We are talking about putting schools into used factories because we are at the point where the debenture debt is more than 25 per cent of the assessment. There are many, many municipalities within this province which are going to be bankrupt within five years unless this front bench gets off and moves along the line of taking the education costs off real estate.

Mr. Speaker, the mayor of Ottawa is planning a march on Queen's Park because he is getting, and I quote, "an unfair share of provincial revenues." We feel that there are so many people on fixed incomes paying 50 per cent education costs in their taxes that this is unfair, and it is unfair for this government in spite of this to launch the capital building programme it is doing.

The hon. Minister of Labour, I think, has been trying to do a job on automation in the settlement of the strike with the newspaper ITU local, and I think that this was the first test in which the government could have made a noble step forward. He related the steps available to settle the strike, but I think, Mr. Minister, that you could have made trail-breaking history by installing the Kaiser plan which is now in force in Kaiser Steel in the USA, and which I mentioned before. Somewhere along the line they are going to have to take a stand and make a decision because the government in general is well known for not doing anything until it has to.

The Kaiser plan gives workers a share of any cost saving and guarantees those with half a year or more service against any layoffs. It is working very well. The ship-owners are paying $5 million a year into the fund for the right to automate, which the newspapers here could have done. This money guarantees that every one of the 17,000 workers have full pay envelopes each week. To quote Mr. Harry Bridges:

There is a simple underlying philosophy to this agreement that workers have a proper right to their jobs. Our contract means that a man owns his job for life unless he is discharged for cause or bought off through disability or early retirement.

The same kind of basic philosophy is inherent in demands made by other unions for lifetime job security.

I suggest to you, Mr. Minister, that to date you have not been interested in job security in meeting this challenge, the first challenge you have had. Business leaders in both the United States and Canada face the fact that if private industry cannot provide full employment—and so far it has not—then government will have to play a stronger, more positive role.

International Business Machines president, Mr. Watson, recognizes this dilemma. He said:

I hate anything to do with government control of business, government control of my private life, of anything, but if you have to offer a choice between high unemployment or more government control, most people will choose more government control, within reason.

Jobs for our people is the responsibility of this dynamic province and the government in charge.

In my part of the province, we are basically a resort country and seeing the great exodus from Toronto on weekends brings me to suggest to the House for consideration that it deal briefly with recreational areas and how I hope that some day better use might be made of them.

It is particularly true of the metropolitan areas in Ontario that during the hot summer, and on weekends, our camping grounds, our parks, our beaches, our golf courses and public swimming pools are engulfed in a mass of people, and some areas are almost super-saturated with humanity. But this is a Saturday-Sunday thing. From Monday to Friday, these same recreational facilities are, by comparison, hardly patronized; they suffer for customers. It somehow strikes me that being unreasonable, full use should not be made of them during the week days. But on the weekends you have to elbow your way into them and the obvious answer is to stagger the Saturday-Sunday exodus over the whole of the week. If this could be brought about it would mean that employers of all sorts would have to adopt a seven-day schedule and every two days they would have to give a week-end off to two-sevenths of their employees.

Now, of course seven-day weeks with staggered days off are not uncommon in many districts, as you know—in service and transportation industries; in hospitals and restaurants; theatres and service stations, employees are used to time off during the middle of the week and I am sure many of them regard this as an advantage. I feel that if manufacturers, offices and shops were to adopt a seven-day week—that is, if the seven-day week were to become almost general, the weekend crush would be dissipated and recreational facilities would be more available for the greater enjoyment of all people.

Of course, this is a pipe dream. The seven-day week could hardly be legislated, although it is obvious that a relaxation of many government statutes could encourage it, and it is hardly something that could take place in Ontario alone.

There are a few disadvantages, particularly church and school, and I do not pretend to have the answers for these things, but I think it is an area where the hon. Minister of Labour and the hon. Minister of Tourism and Information (Mr. Auld) could sit down and kick it around and explore it because it has a great future.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: That idea is being explored right this moment in the current dispute, I think it is, with Anaconda Brass.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): He is kicking the ball to the hon. Minister.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I will take it.

Mr. Sargent: We in the Opposition can pass the buck and say "You do it," and the government finds the answer.

In a discussion with the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Stewart) he was very patient with our deputation, but he became very incensed with the fact that I asked him to set up capital funds for a project that would help agriculture. He is bound by the fact that he does not have any capital funds to support agricultural development in agricultural areas. Yet, Mr. Speaker, we can give money to the ODA for development of industry. If you have $100 million in the pot to further industrial development and the most serious problem in the agricultural industry is lack of capital funds to further this industry, I think, in strengthening the budget next year, it would be smart business to give this department a capital fund of X millions of dollars to further the needs for agriculture.

Along that line, we have been talking in the House about FAME, and with all its shortcomings, I sincerely say that if we allow the concept of FAME, to go down the drain, it will set agriculture back for many years.

We had no hesitation in giving $4 million last year to the ODA for nine or ten different projects and they lost a pot full of money, too, on that development, but the FAME concept will be the first step toward blocking vertical integration and supporting those principles. I firmly believe that this House, this hon. Minister and this government should take it upon themselves to see that FAME becomes a living organ and arm of agriculture in the future.

I have been watching this clock, but I would like to say that we are conscious about the needs of regional development of this province and surely it is our aim here to make the needs of Ontario all our needs. We must make the future of Ontario our future, too, and it means that first and foremost we recognize the very needs of this province and we have equal social and economic opportunities for all people. The present trend of this government today is not along those lines.

I thank the House, in the time that is left on the speech on the Budget, but I do want to get across the fact that more and more, we in the outlying parts are getting fed up to the teeth with the concentration of wealth in this province and particularly in this metropolitan area.

We have in Owen Sound an OPP office in an old house and there are 17 officers in that house. They use it as a divisional point for the 17 OPP officers. Before the election the owner of the adjacent property was told he could sell his garage because the government was going to buy it for the OPP set-up. Following the election, which the Conservatives lost by a very small majority, the owner of this property went to the police and he said, "Is the deal going to go through?" and they said, "No, the deal will not go through now because a Liberal was elected."

I do not suggest that is true or anything like that, but the fact is that I have spoken to the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Connell) about this matter and he gave me a sheepish grin and said that it was not on the estimates or in the projects for some time to come. He knows nothing about this. I can tell hon. members that the minute a Tory is elected in this riding there will be a lot of government spending there because it needs it badly.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree moves the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I would remind the House that Monday being May 24 there will be no sitting in this Legislature, and on Tuesday, May 25, having in mind the state dinner that evening, I submit that it would be desirable that the House start at 2 o'clock, with a view to a somewhat earlier rising than 6 o'clock, in view of the events of that evening. Accordingly, I move that when this House adjourns the present sitting thereof, we stand adjourned until 2 o'clock on Tuesday afternoon, May 25.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday it is proposed that we will sit in the evening, and I would put the hon. members on notice and also remind the hon. members that the debate on Tuesday, May 25, will deal with Medicare, or as it is more officially known, Bill No. 136, An Act respecting medical services insurance. After that debate, we will continue with the estimates.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 12:55 o'clock, p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

TUESDAY, MAY 25, 1965

The House met at 2 o'clock, p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: We are pleased to have as visitors to the Legislature today guests from the following schools: in the west gallery, Anna Melick public school, Dunnville, and West Nissouri central public school, Thornedale; in the east gallery, Hillcrest public school, Hamilton.

Presenting petitions.

Presenting reports by committees.

Motions.

Introduction of bills.

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary and Minister of Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I should like to make an announcement which I think will be of some interest to the hon. members.

A new and more effective approach to language teaching has been developed by the citizenship division of The Department of the Provincial Secretary and Citizenship. At present, daytime English-language classes for newcomers are conducted by the department in Toronto at the international institute of Metropolitan Toronto, at COSTI, and at the education centre at the West End YMCA.

The department has been aware for some time of certain weaknesses in the traditional system of teaching English to adult newcomers. Traditionally, classes were started each fall and progressed into the school term. New registrants often found they did not fit into the class level, finding it either too advanced or too easy for their needs.

By having classes at different levels and a promotion test every three weeks, a flexible situation was created in which some students could advance at their own speed and others who were prevented from attending regularly could always find a class at a convenient level for them. This new approach to language teaching is known as the escalator system of language teaching because the teachers teach at the same level all the time and the students are able to step into classes at any level and continue on up. It has become a continuing programme in order to take care of continuous registration.

This sort of flexible continuing programme is necessary to meet the needs of adult newcomers who find many normal hindrances to regular attendance. For the escalator system to be workable, there must be enough students to make up a sufficient number of classes. However, the growth of the department's English-language teaching programme in daytime classes in the past three years, from seven teachers and 200 students at peak enrolment to 21 teachers and 800 students this year, is proof of its appeal to students. Attendance has been better than that of past programmes. The morale of the students is excellent and student progress has been beyond expectation.

Our objective is always to devise ways and means of encouraging more and more of our newcomers to enrol in English-language classes so that the newcomers may be quickly and more completely integrated into the social and economic life of our province. The results of the escalator system of language teaching have so far been very encouraging.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

MEDICAL INSURANCE

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health) moves second reading of Bill No. 136, An Act respecting medical insurance.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I might as well start by being completely frank about this bill, in terms of myself and my party. We think it is a completely inadequate bill to present to the people of Ontario.

I can look at a copy, for example, of a pamphlet sent out by the Ontario federation of labour and I think the federation describes it most effectively. It suggests the bill is a dud, and gives reasons. Perhaps I will just state these reasons at the start, Mr. Speaker, and then elaborate on them. The federation suggests these are the reasons why this bill is a dud:

1. It does not recommend coverage for everybody at rates based on ability to pay. Apart from the poorest people, low-income, middle-income and the high-income families will have to pay the same rate.

2. While the poorest people will be subsidized, the subsidies suggested are too low. Even the poorest could have a heavy burden of sickness costs.

3. There will have to be a means test to separate the poor from everybody else. Organized labour has always opposed the means test as degrading.

4. The recommendations cover only medical care. All other essential services, such as dentists and drugs, are ignored.

5. The suggestions therefore are of more advantage to the doctors and insurance companies than to the general public.

6. The insurance companies are in business for profit. The plan is made to order for insurance companies and thus introduces the profit motive into social welfare legislation.

7. The suggested advisory committee will have a majority of doctors and insurance company representatives. The public will be in the permanent minority.

8. Very little attention is paid in the report to necessary expansion of personnel and services and none to group practice.

I want to elaborate on a number of these points, Mr. Speaker. Before I do, I would like to get into focus the fact that today in this province we have probably been more fortunate than many parts of the world, in that we have great advances in medical science. In fact I recall visiting someone two weeks ago who was dying, and being told that in another few years they may have an answer to his problem. I think all of us know of situations of relatives and of others, who today are able to live because of these medical advances.

I think we should recognize, and I want to get this point across, that the reason why we have these medical advances is because collectively we have taken the responsibility to pay for the very costly research that they entail. Collectively—through government; that is what I mean by collectively—we have been financing and assisting in the finances of hospitals, of doctors' training, of laboratories, and so on, right down the line. I want to emphasize this, because for some reason, it seems to me that the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond) has a nervousness about government helping in finances. I think I may be unfair to him in this, but I notice in his introduction of the bill he talked about compulsion and how in philosophy his party was against compulsion. The only kind of compulsion that would be suggested in a comprehensive government-sponsored scheme would be the compulsion of people paying taxes in order to support it. The only kind of compulsion would be similar to that of the hospital insurance scheme. This would be the approach that would be taken, and yet for some reason that I cannot understand he has never considered this kind of approach. He believes that this area of health should still be left up to profit-making organizations, such as the insurance companies.

I suggest, sir, that medicine and health are entirely different from other free-enterprise endeavours. First, because collectively we all together are helping to produce the doctors through the schools, through the hospitals, through the teachers, and so on. I would suggest that there is no comparison between this and a factory, where someone producing in the free-enterprise system has a factory where he trains his men and they produce some kind of product which they hope to sell.

The doctors and health services in this province, and indeed in the most of the civilized world, have their factories—if I could call hospitals that—provided for them because of the enormous costs of many of the needs which they have in a hospital. They have this provided collectively.

We really have moved, to an extent, into the area of government-sponsored health services and our question is why we have not moved further in this to provide a universality of service to all the people of this province.

It seemed to me that there were contradictions in the hon. Minister of Health's introduction. He started off by telling us that the government had been taking part in a number of areas of health. He referred to mental hospitals; public health; tuberculosis prevention and treatment; school health programmes; maternal and new-born care; general hospital construction grants, and hospital-care insurance.

The debate today is really whether we should have universal coverage for everyone in this province, whether we should have everyone paying for the opportunity of getting medical care when they need it—and by medical care, I am thinking of more than just a physician's care. I find, sir, that the government has come out in favour of a compromise; it is suggesting that it will set up a government department for almost a million people who are below a certain income bracket; the others will have to go through whatever carrier they wish but they will not go through the government department.

I suggest that this government, in the compromise, is showing a consistency which is unusual in its affairs. It is showing a consistency to emphasize the worst features, the most expensive characteristics of both alternatives, and it has done it in such a way as to add operational chaos to excessive costs. It managed, with remarkable ingenuity, to provide a framework in Bill 136, which will offer the least possible health care at the highest possible expense.

How has the government managed this? Bill 136 provides, as we all know, for a complete administrative system for public health care services within The Department of Health for persons without taxable income. In this way, the government has contrived to propose a system which will operate a complete health services programme for a minority of our population—or in fact, about 15 per cent of our people.

It should be obvious to everyone, even the government, that the more people involved in a particular programme, the lower the per capita overhead and administrative costs will be, but here we find the government setting up a system which could provide the framework for universal health services for all the people of Ontario, but which, in the wisdom of the government, will serve only a minority of the people. Then, on the other hand, we find the government leaving everyone with more than $1,000 taxable income, to select or find their own medical services coverage from among the handful of non-profit, prepaid carriers in this province, or from among the multitude of private profit-making insurance companies—very close to 200 of them, I believe.

The Hall commission presented some figures on the administrative costs involved; the retention factor, to give it its proper name. In health insurance plans offered by private insurance companies, according to the commission's figures, the retention factor for private, profit-making health insurance plans, runs to more than 25 cents on the dollar. What this means, of course, is that for every dollar collected in premiums by the company, less than 75 cents is paid out in benefits. Not all of this is profit, as any insurance official will tell you—in fact, health care insurance has proved to be comparatively unprofitable for the insurance industry—thus that 27 per cent retention factor, the Hall commission figures reveal, comprises only a small profit. It also includes sales commissions, taxes, administrative costs of all kinds and reserves for unsatisfied claims.

The Hall commission figures also indicate that a universal, public health care plan can operate with an administrative cost of around five per cent. In Saskatchewan, I think it is about 5.7 per cent today—and there we see an example in reality right now, not a matter of academic talk. Thus with public medicare, 95 cents out of every dollar committed is actually paid out for health benefits while under private health insurance plans, only 70 cents to 75 cents is paid out.

Bill 136, of course, leaves 4,500,000 of our people with no alternative but to see 25 cents of their health care dollar spent on administration and other factors not contributing to the paying of their medical bills. Taking the public course for lower income groups, it adopts a system which can be administratively much more economical, but does it in such a way, for a minority of the population, that there is no possibility of realizing the potential economics of universal public health care insurance. That is why I say that the government has chosen the high-cost road for most of the population; they have corrupted the administrative principles of low-cost public health care insurance.

And that is not all; earlier I called Bill 136 a "patchwork" and an "administrative nightmare." Just how nightmarish it is will only be apparent to the people affected, if and when it is adopted. But in the meantime, it is possible to sketch in the sort of bureaucratic atrocities which this bill can perpetuate. Let me take a hypothetical example—before I do, may I say that we still have very few facts about this bill while we are debating it. The hon. Minister of Health said that he studied it carefully for six years and yet, as we saw in an article in the Globe and Mail, during that six years he has, it seems, not been able to come up with certain answers. I think the hon. Minister himself must have read this article which lists pertinent aspects to this bill, including the rate of premium. We do not have any answer to that when we are asked to debate this very important measure in this House, and I suggest that shows either a nervousness, or an ignorance on the part of the hon. Minister. Either he has not done his homework or else he has a premium, that is so high in comparison, for example, with Saskatchewan, that he does not want to bring it in during this debate. However, let me go ahead on the kind of situation that we envisage with this bill from the little facts that we have in connection with it.

Let me take a hypothetical but typical case. Consider an ordinary Ontario family, husband, wife and two children. The husband is a breadwinner and provides the family income. Now Bill 136 says that this family will receive free public health care if they have no taxable income, and subsidized premiums for health care if their taxable income is under $1,000. Bill 136 is scheduled to come into effect on June 1, 1966, so let us follow this typical family in and out of government offices for a year or so after June 1, 1966.

The head of the family is earning $53 a week on June 1. Since his income tax deductions amount to $2,700—$1,000 for himself, $1,000 for his wife and $300 for each of his two children and $100 charitable—and his income is $51 a week, which amounts to $2,652 a year, then this family qualifies for the public medicare plan which the hon. Minister proposes to establish within The Department of Health. So, being good managers and good citizens, this family enrolls. And you will notice their coverage is not automatic, even under the hon. Minister of Health's system within The Department of Health. This family goes down on June 2 and it wends its way through a maze of bureaucrats to enrol in the plan.

Then, on June 3, 1966, let us assume that disaster strikes this unfortunate family—the breadwinner is called into his boss's office and he is told he has been doing a good job and deserves a raise. The boss will say, "You deserve better than you are getting, I am putting you up to $52 a week." Now, usually a raise is welcome to a working man but consider the situation that this fellow is in—we will call him "Charlie." His gross income has gone up to $2,704 a year and his tax deductions are only $2,700, thus he now has taxable income, and thus he now is expected to pay part of his health care premiums.

It is not clear yet, Mr. Speaker, from what the hon. Minister of Health has seen fit to divulge, whether Charlie must now seek out a private carrier, buy a plan from the private carrier, pay his own premiums and seek a rebate from the government, or whether alternatively Charlie will still obtain his health insurance coverage from The Department of Health, and be required to pay an as-yet-unannounced portion of the cost of his coverage. In either case, he is in difficulty. His taxable income is only $4 but this is enough to deprive him of free medicare. And I suspect that however small a proportion of his subsidized premium Charlie is now required to pay, it will be more than $4. Thus, his raise really means that it has put him out of pocket. It has also led him directly into another round of negotiation with the bureaucrats, either of the public service or of the private insurance industry. His status has changed, so the whole administrative machinery must go to work and create a new health-care programme for him. From now on he is paying premiums.

Let us have another look at this situation. Charlie's troubles are not yet over. On June 4, let us say, his wife goes to hospital and adds a third child to Charlie's family. What does the new baby mean? Another $300 in income tax deductible. Charlie's tax exemptions have gone up to $3,000 from $2,700. Once again, he has no taxable income; once again his health-care programme changes. He is back under the hon. Minister of Health's wing with no premiums to pay. Charlie, hon. members will note, has been in and out of a medicare plan three times in three days. Hon. members may think this is a frivolous example, but I suggest that this whole patchwork of approaches that the government is taking is going to cause consternation and worry and confusion throughout this province.

We believe in, and we are firmly committed to, the principle that if government is to move at all in the medical-care field, and move it must, then it must act in such a way as to provide equal service for all citizens. Government-sponsored medical care must be universal. And what do we see when we apply the plan outlined in Bill 136 to Charlie and the hundreds and thousands of other citizens of Ontario who will be in comparative positions? We see that if their incomes are below a certain amount, then they are receiving charity at the discretion of the state, they are separated through no fault of their own from the mainstream of our society, and I presume they will be singled out to carry a special card, a card which will identify them as having a certain low income, a card which is really saying "poor."

Not only does this bill create an administrative nightmare, not only does it create an incredible hodgepodge of public and private and half-public and half-private ways and means of coping with medical bills, but it also is a means barrier between 1,000,000 and 2,000,000 of our citizens. All the people who will receive subsidies for health-care premiums and all the people who will be enrolled through The Department of Health are stigmatized by the government. I think that is an unpleasant approach at the best of times, but when, as in the present case, it walks hand in hand with built-in administrative inefficiencies and intolerable high costs, then it is an unforgiveable imposition on the people of Ontario, an imposition which has no logic behind it, no humanity and no common sense, an imposition which could only have arisen from the kind of internal wrangling within Conservative ranks which must have been taking place within the last few months.

Mr. Speaker, we are debating the principle of the hon. Minister's bill, so let me turn now to the matter of principle. I want to make it perfectly clear that we are opposed to Bill 136 not exclusively because it is such an absurdly unworkable piece of legislation, and not only because it saddles the people of Ontario with excessive costs and excessive bureaucratic red tape. We are opposed to Bill 136 because it denies every principle of social justice and every principle of economic progress that is the objective of the thoughtful citizen in a modern society. We are opposed to Bill 136 because it does not provide universal medical-care coverage for our citizens.

The hon. members opposite have defended their bill's voluntary features by announcing that they are opposed, on a high and ancient principle, to compulsion; they seem to emphasize that word steadily. But where do they actually stand? They take pride in their hospital services plan or I assume they do—a plan created by the present government, a plan which is compulsory in all but name, a plan which covers 99 per cent of the people of the province as the hon. Minister has pridefully informed us.

We are firmly committed to a universality in the Medicare plan for Ontario and we are disturbed, even shocked, at the government's hypocritical inconsistency in introducing a health services bill into this House which will not reach as many citizens of this province as are covered by our hospital plan. We are opposed to Bill 136 because it is a minimum-effort bill.

It is almost incomprehensible that the government would have the nerve to bring in a dead-end bill like this one in the face of all the evidence on every front. It is as though the government had turned its back on the experience of virtually every other advanced nation of the world; turned its back on a host of nations which have neither our wealth nor our medical resources, but which have produced and are operating comprehensive medicare plans. It is as though it had turned its back on the findings of the Hall commission; turned its back on one of the most thorough, best documented and researched studies ever undertaken in Canada; turned its back, too, on human suffering and on the economic cost such suffering entails.

Bill 136 is administratively inadequate, but even if it were rewritten to eliminate the bureaucratic never-never land it embodies now, it would still be inadequate. It would be inadequate because it does not go anywhere. It does not lead to dental and optical care for children. It does not embody any preventive medicine. It speaks vaguely on the annual checkups, which the medical profession tells us are so important. It ignores well-baby care. It is silent on such matters as mental health, home nursing, chiropractic care and other therapeutic measures that are all part of a health services spectrum.

It ignores the whole field of prescription drugs. It makes no provision for the elimination of the inadequacies of medical and health services available in different areas of the province. It is silent on the subject of medical- and health-care research. It makes no allowance for the rapidly changing pattern of health-care services. It makes no allowance for the incredibly, rapidly changing technology of health care. It says nothing about the kind of paramedical personnel who can do so much to support the inevitably limited resources of fully professional health-care workers.

Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, this bill effectively blocks the possibility that we will one day have universal and comprehensive medical care for Canadians, available from coast to coast. And I want to clarify this point and go into it more fully.

The Hall commission looked forward to the day when Canadians would be assured of at least a minimum amount of health-care protection, no matter where they happened to live in this country, no matter how or when they chanced to move from one province to another. There is no doubt in my mind that the Hall commission correctly anticipated federal financial participation in such coast-to-coast medicare. Where does Bill 136 leave that dream? This bill encourages the private insurance industry to operate a multitude of different health-care plans, plans that will offer certain services, to certain groups, at a certain price; other services to other groups at other prices; plans that will give the citizens of Ontario such a welter of alternative health-care plans, it will never be possible for order to be made from a government-sponsored chaos. It will never be possible to find the uniform base which is essential if we are to have an equalization of services and benefits from coast to coast.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that Ontario should be providing leadership to the rest of Canada in the field of social progress. We have the resources to do so, but this government practised and still practises followship and not leadership in the matter, as they did in the Canada Pension Plan. On the evidence, their behaviour in the health-care field is going to be even worse.

Bill 136 will effectively block the possibility of any sort of meaningful national health-care plan. Bill 136 is therefore not only an outrage, perpetrated on the people of Ontario, it is an outrage that is perpetrated on the whole Canadian nation. If all the deficiencies of this bill could be excused on the grounds of economy, then the government would have an argument. Not a good argument, but an argument, nonetheless. The truth of the matter is that the health services plan embodied in Bill 136, is just about as expensive as it could be.

If the hon. gentlemen had sat down and drafted this bill with the clear purpose of providing as little health-care protection as possible, for as large an expenditure of funds as possible, minimum medicare at maximum cost, I do not think they could have come up with a higher cost programme. In Bill 136, they have done a truly masterful job of wasting public money and of encouraging private citizens to waste their own money. How have they done this? I have already mentioned the waste in administrative costs, the fact that the cost of health insurance from private carriers is more than five times as great as the cost of public health insurance. This wastage alone, I estimate, will amount to somewhere in the neighbourhood of $40 million to $50 million a year and this money could stay in the pockets of the citizens of this province.

Alternatively—and frankly my party finds this alternative attractive—the saving on administrative costs in a public, universal and comprehensive plan, would be sufficient to provide dental and optical care for every child in Ontario up to 18 years of age. You ask the average citizen of Ontario what his opinion is between these choices and I think you would get a very clear answer. Ask him whether he wants to see 25 cents on his health dollar going for sales commissions, head office overhead and other retention factors, or would he rather see that 25 cents spent on getting his children good teeth and good eyes. Put that question to the average citizen and you will see how far out of step with public opinion and progressive legislation Bill 136 is.

Mr. Speaker, the amendment which I am proposing to introduce will call for the establishment of universal and comprehensive, publicly operated Medicare for all the citizens of Ontario. No doubt the government, in defending Bill 136, will attempt to undermine the logic of our position. I think that this debate will not be cluttered up with efforts from the other side of this House to attack the principle of universal comprehensive Medicare, but in order to avoid this possibility, I think I should say something about our own plan, the plan embodied in our amendment.

We believe that it is unnecessary to set up a whole new administrative framework for public Medicare. We believe that automatic enrolment in the Medicare plan of all persons now covered by hospital insurance would be simple, economical and very much in the public interest. We believe that the handling of payments—and we would pay doctors, I want to emphasize this, on a fee-for-service basis—would be facilitated by having the pool of highly skilled personnel that are now working for the prepaid carriers and the private plans. We know that Ontario could have universal Medicare right now, for an expenditure in the neighbourhood of approximately $200 million. We know that this sum will provide not only complete physicians' services for all the people of Ontario, but dental services for children, optical services for children and people in receipt of public assistance.

I have tried to think why this government has brought in the kind of plan that they have. I have wondered if the government has done it because it felt that we could not afford a universal coverage and it decided therefore, that it would not go ahead in this. And yet, Mr. Speaker, if you will read this most comprehensive study made by Chief Justice Hall, he clearly states that we can afford to pay for a comprehensive universal programme all across Canada, not just in Ontario. He points out—and I am repeating myself in this, just to emphasize it—he points out that the private insurance companies are a more costly way for the average citizen to receive health coverage, that the private insurance companies are interested in the one area in which they are giving service, such as physicians' service—and it is not on a broad base, looking at the need for more personnel, seeing that it is related to hospitals and the need for prevention, and so on.

In the past I have respected the hon. Minister of Health for his forward-looking approach—I am afraid I do not any longer. When we look at the new barriers that have been broken in Saskatchewan and we see the kind of approach that has been taken by the hon. Minister, I try to think of other reasons. He kept talking about compulsion and this seems to be preying on his mind—that any other scheme would be compulsory. Surely, in this 20th century he recognizes that education is the right of every person. Surely he does not feel that the people of Ontario grumble about having to pay taxes for their education; but for some reason as the Minister of Health and as a doctor, he down-grades health below education. Otherwise, he would feel that we all should have a right to universal comprehensive coverage. He would not be arguing about compulsion; he is far too intelligent a man, in my opinion, to—

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): That is flattery!

Mr. Thompson: Well, the hon. Minister's argument just does not hold water. He raises this bogey about compulsion and he is suggesting that it would be wrong to have a government department looking after the health needs. I suspect that he brings up the bogeys about doctor-patient relationship and says that this will be undermined—

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Try me out.

Mr. Thompson: I suggest that if he does bring it up again, all he has to do is look at studies in Britain and Norway and Sweden, to show that it has not deteriorated. He can raise all the bogeys he wants about that, but let him look at objective studies with respect to it. Surely the doctor knows—and I refer to the hon. Minister as a doctor; I am forgetting his Scottish background—that the manner in which a bill is paid and the signature on it does not have any particular therapeutic effect with respect to the patient, and that is what we are talking about—to be able to have a collective system by which we take responsibility for each individual so that he can get proper health coverage.

Does the hon. Minister believe in the principle of workmen's compensation whereby we know the individual working man cannot afford to pay for injuries which will take place and therefore collectively we all get together to help him? Why does he not apply that in connection with this medical-insurance approach?

The other point that worries me is this, because it shows to me that the hon. Minister may have a sort of Marie Antoinette approach; he has this nervousness apparently, with respect to a government-run insurance programme, but that does not matter to 1,000,000 people who are in a lower income group.

The hon. Minister does not see any inefficiencies or inadequacies that are going to take place with them getting health services, so if he really believes that a government-run medical programme is bad, a great difficulty for doctor-patient relationship and all the other aspects and bogeys that he brings up, then surely he is not going to inject an approach in setting up a department, a government-run approach for 1,000,000 of the citizens. If he does not believe it, and he believes it provides good service, then why is it not extended to all the citizens of the province?

I suggest to anyone in this House from the other side who gets up and starts talking about compulsion, that if he has a government-run programme that it really gives inadequate service and those other things, that he just recognizes that with his bills. He is inflicting that—if he thinks it is bad—on 1,000,000 of the people. If he thinks that it is bad, it shows again a kind of class consciousness which he has, that he really does not give a rap, provided that they are at a lower income—so do not let us hear that argument!

An hon. member: How is it being inflicted?

Mr. Thompson: What about the situation of universality? The hon. Minister says this opportunity is going to be given to all the citizens of Ontario and yet we look at this situation: We have seen his plan in operation; we have seen it in Alberta. What is the latest report? In Alberta, 15 per cent of the people have not applied for the coverage and they are the 15 per cent of the people who most need it, apparently. Surely, that should make him shake a little before he starts introducing this thing. But has it? Not at all, and yet right in his speech of introduction, he refers to the aspect of universality while in Alberta, where they have a similar plan, 15 per cent of the people who do most need to be in, are not in.

What about the "grey" area? The people who are just over the deductible group? I want to speak very strongly on this because to me, one of the reasons that I am in public life and one of the objectives which I have in Ontario, and I speak personally about this, is to have universal comprehensive coverage. I have stood for this since I first ran; it was in my first pamphlet I had when I first ran in Dovercourt, and I fought for this and I fought for personal reasons as well. I speak because I come from a family which would be considered to be in this "grey" area, a family which I like to think has a certain dignity of wanting to pay its own way, for wanting to look after itself. I saw my father having to pay out money steadily for health services for treatment for my mother because he was over a bracket, until finally he could not. I think there are many of us in that situation throughout this province.

We are aware that a universal programme has been done in many other countries; we are aware that Saskatchewan has shown that this can be done in one of the provinces of Canada.

One may say, for example, that the doctors would leave. Well, we heard all the cries in connection with Saskatchewan; the simple point is that it is working in Saskatchewan and has not been changed by any government. The simple point is that in Britain, for all the hon. Minister's great abhorrence of it, he will not see changes in that system, either. As a Conservative, I would think he would take some pride that the Conservative government in Britain had written a White Paper in connection with comprehensive coverage; and as a Conservative, I think, he should take some pride in his hospital insurance commission and the fact that there is free hospital service, even though I know that he fought it down to the last ditch when it was being introduced—not him personally, but some of those with an antiquated philosophy who were in that government when this thing was being introduced.

Why is he fighting this? Why is he coming up with this kind of half-baked approach? Economic grounds; it is costing us more; it is a most elaborate thing. He, with his Scottish background, I think would be the most concerned about this waste of money. Surely as a man of humanity, he does not want to have people channelled and processed one way to get help, while some others go another way. On philosophical grounds, he is not against a government-sponsored scheme, because I do not think that he would suggest that we give a bad kind of scheme to 1,000,000 people. So that as a politician and a humanitarian he believes that they would get the best of care—those 1,000,000 people who will be getting service through a government-sponsored scheme.

What is the reason? For the life of me, I cannot think of why he has not followed the Hall commission. I debated last week with the chairman of the Hagey commission—a very fine and dedicated man. My only point to him was that he had got himself involved in horse-and-buggy terms of reference when he took on that commission. There has been an enlightened, thorough study made by the Hall commission, and the Hall commission has denounced, in every way it can, the programme that the hon. Minister is suggesting. It has denounced this approach of grading people, this approach based on taxable income. It has argued for universality and a comprehensive approach; it has urged the hon. Minister to take a broad look at the whole health field, not only at the physicians' services but also the research or the need for new schools for doctors.

One of the thoughts that came to my mind was that he will say, "Well, we haven't got enough staff, we haven't got enough doctors so if we had it on the universal basis we would not be able to service it." I imagine some hon. members of the government will say that and I would ask why have they not enough doctors if they do not think they have enough, because they are the people responsible for getting doctors? I noticed in the paper, during the weekend, that there are people dying because there are not enough doctors. We had the situation last year where we read of people dying because they could not get into hospitals. I suggest that we remedy this, for the government is responsible and it is clear that the government is responsible for having to provide services around this province.

We will put the heat on the government to see that it gets going on this, if it is responsible, the way we are putting the heat on about hospital beds. I would suggest if we had not had a hospital insurance commission looking after the needs of hospitals, that possibly we would have a greater shortage of hospital beds; there would be no one person who would be responsible to whom we in this Legislature could point a finger and say, "Get going on it." Similarly with a shortage of doctors. If there is a shortage of doctors, I say the hon. Minister is to blame for that, he and his government. But I suggest even though there may be a shortage of doctors and he puts on a crash programme now with the medical schools, you still have more doctors per capita than they have in Norway or Sweden or England, and they have a comprehensive universal programme. And the Hall commission says, "Do not be carried away by that kind of weary talk from people who say, 'Look, let's wait longer on this thing till we get more.'" The Hall commission said, "You can start in Canada, you can start today." Well, we can certainly start in Ontario. So that must not be the reason why the government has not implemented a universal coverage.

Is it because the government thinks that people are covered? I notice that it has claimed previously that people have insurance coverage and I think a figure was quoted that about 73 per cent of the population of Ontario has coverage. Yet surely it would have asked the further question: What kind of coverage have they got? Just taking PSI—and that is one of the better policies—PSI pays only 23.5 per cent of the average total health care; and in doctors' bills PSI pays 58.7 per cent of the doctors' bills, so that to suggest that people have got coverage, that 73 per cent have it—what kind of coverage have they?

I say I cannot understand in this province, when the government has had the opportunity to bring in a health charter, when it has had a most comprehensive study done by the Hall commission to give the facts, to tell it that it can afford it, to tell it that it should go ahead—I find it deplorable that this government, in this year of the 20th century, in this wealthy province is bringing in this half-baked approach, muddled, confused, administratively costly and offering it to the people of Ontario. For this reason, I move, seconded by Mr. Oliver, that the motion be amended by striking out all the words after the word "that," and the following be substituted:

this bill be referred to the standing committee on education, health and welfare at which representatives of farmers, trade unions, the business community, the medical profession, and the public should be invited; with instructions to make recommendations to the government and the House in accordance with the recommendations of the Royal commission on health services, chaired by the Honourable Mr. Justice Emmett Hall, in order that the bill should provide a health charter for the citizens of Ontario and without limiting the generality of the foregoing the bill shall include and be based upon the following principles:

(a) A comprehensive government-operated universal health care programme.

(b) The patient shall have the right to be treated by a doctor of his choice.

(c) Doctors shall be paid on a fee-for-services basis and shall be free to practise within or without the plan.

(d) There shall be no means test.

(e) Mental illness shall be treated on the same basis as other illnesses.

(f) Dental and optical services for children up to 18 years of age shall be included.

(g) Other ancillary medical and health care services such as home nursing or orthopaedic appliances, chiropractic services, etc., shall be phased into the programme as independent health services, in order that the programme shall be fully comprehensive by 1971.

(h) The bill in its final form shall be of such a nature that the programme can be readily integrated into a national health-care programme for all Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Thompson moves, seconded by Mr. Oliver, that the motion be amended by striking out all the words after the word "that" and the following be substituted:

The debate now will proceed upon the amendment just read.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. Minister of Health introduced this bill, on first reading he made a comment which I would like to read to the House. It is to be found on page 2758 of Hansard. He said:

Mr. Speaker, I fully anticipate that there will be argument that everyone should be compelled to come under our standard plan, and that this is the only equitable and workable way in which complete and adequate medical services coverage can be attained.

This really boils down to a difference in basic philosophies. Some believe that government should regiment the people, deciding what is best for them and imposing that decision upon them by compulsion. Others, and we subscribe to this, believe the same objective can be attained without compulsion.

We believe we have proven this in our experience with hospital care insurance—

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me begin right at that point. I find it a little difficult that a Scotsman, with a Scotsman's normal intellectual integrity in terms of facing the fact, would say on one hand, "we subscribe to this, we believe the same objective can be attained without compulsion," and then in the very next breath say, "we believe we have proven this in our experience with hospital care insurance."

Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister of Health must know—I do not know where he has been if he does not know—that over 60 per cent of the people in hospital insurance in the province of Ontario are under it compulsorily. They are the people who are in employee groups of over 15, whose employer must enrol them in the plan. He has no alternative. This is the base which establishes the hospital insurance plan as a viable economic unit. It is idle for the hon. Minister of Health to talk about non-compulsion in a plan, when 60 per cent of the people in that plan are compelled to be in it under the law. Their employer must enrol them. And that in itself, Mr. Speaker, reveals on just what a phoney kind of philosophical concept the hon. Minister is trying to base this bill, and then set up the battle with the Opposition.

The hon. Minister says there is a difference in basic philosophy. I agree there is a difference in basic philosophy. If the hon. Minister had been consistent in his philosophy, both within this bill and within the acts of this government down through the years, I would have some respect for his stand on a basic difference in philosophy. But the fact of the matter is that the philosophy on which he is basing this bill is a mish-mash philosophy, in fact, and what he is trying to present to the public is a myth, an outworn myth, an old Tory concept, in terms of meeting the needs of the people in this day. Indeed it was underlined by the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) very shortly after the bill was introduced. The hon. Prime Minister was speaking to the North York Progressive-Conservative association at their annual meeting and in the Globe and Mail of May 13, he is quoted as saying: "We believe as a party in individual responsibility."

Well, may I say, Mr. Speaker, he has no monopoly on that. The New Democratic Party believes in individual responsibility, but we also have come to the conclusion, because we live in the 20th century—and on this bill I have come to the conclusion the government does not live in the 20th century—that experience has proved conclusively that on some things the individual cannot cope with the cost, and therefore society generally throughout the western world has recognized that a collective solution to meet these individual needs is the superior one. Indeed, the Hall commission came to the same conclusion. But the hon. Prime Minister proceeded: "We must be prepared to come to the aid of those who need it."

There is the good old 19th century paternalism: We should come to the aid of those who are not fortunate enough to have shared in the benefits that we have achieved, by whatever means we have achieved them. But we must not force these things on those who do not need them. The dignity of the individual must be considered. Here is the hon. Prime Minister accurately reflecting the philosophy of a government, which says that the dignity of the individual must be considered. What he is thinking about is the dignity of somebody at the upper end of the income bracket, who is now buying his health insurance, and upon whom it would be an imposition and a violation of his individual rights, if he should have to believe he was his brother's keeper and become part of an overall plan. But he forgets the dignity of the 1,800,000 people in this province who are going to have to come to this government with their TD-1 forms in their hands, as a means test, to be separated out from the rest of the population, to be treated as second-class citizens who have to be helped to meet these basic needs. And if they do not do it themselves, what was the hon. Minister's comment, as another indication of this good Tory basic philosophy? He was quoted in the papers and the press conference after he had introduced this bill as saying, True there will be some people who will not buy the insurance, even when we have assisted them and indicated that we will assist them to buy it, but these are the people who have "a slackness of character."

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Speaker, I must protest that I have never at any time in discussing this bill, used those words.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, if the hon. Minister did not use them, he was quoted in the newspapers.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: I have never spoken in such derogatory fashion about any of the citizens of Ontario.

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. Minister was quoted in the press as referring to people as having slackness of character, the people who did not have what was required to look after their own needs.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: I have already stated to the hon. member that I did not use those words. I think in respect to a member's word, he should withdraw this statement.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Minister has stated that he did not use those words. In the House, the member for York South has to accept his word.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, I will certainly accept it. But I will take a look at my files. This debate will go on for some time and perhaps we will have the hon. Minister take a look at what was reported in the press on his behalf.

In short, Mr. Speaker, the basic philosophy that underlines this bill—and both the hon. Minister and the hon. Prime Minister have been quite clear and explicit in stating it to the public—is out of tune with the times. It is not part and parcel of the 20th century.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to take the House back to an incident that was etched forever on my memory at a meeting of the standing committee on health that was held here at Queen's Park, back about the year 1957. The committee at that time was considering the introduction of hospital insurance. The government had been giving consideration to whether or not it would be a private plan or a public plan and I think it would be accurate to say that in the first instance, the then Prime Minister, Mr. Frost, was disposed to favour a private plan. But the more we examined the facts and the realities of private coverage, the more it was evident that the Prime Minister of the day became dubious. For example, the standing committee on health was informed that of the four major carriers that were providing hospital coverage at that time, the best one had a record of paying back on the premium dollar, 61 cents in claims. The next best record was one that was paying 56 cents in claims. The third best record was one that was paying 47 cents back in claims. The fourth one was paying 39 cents, on the premium dollar, back in claims.

In other words, very close to a half, on an average, of the premium dollar, was being frittered away in administrative costs, on high overhead, and was not being spent for what the citizen of the province of Ontario had originally bought the policy, namely, to cover his health needs. And the more the Prime Minister of the day looked at the situation, the more he came to the conclusion that, with the high costs of hospitals as they are now, to establish a private coverage with this built-in overhead, would be more costly than the public purse should have to sustain—certainly that the people of the province of Ontario, in an overall plan, should have to sustain.

Now I come to that incident, which I recall so distinctly. A couple of young, somewhat brash, certainly very aggressive spokesmen on behalf of the insurance underwriters' association, in a very informal give and take in the committee, turned to Prime Minister Frost on one occasion and said to him: "You cover those who cannot pay for their own policies and we will look after the rest"; and Prime Minister Frost looked at him and, with mild embarrassment and a slight squirming, he said: "Well, that sounds like a good deal for you. We will underwrite the high risks. We will cover those in the lower income brackets, and you will go ahead and cover all those who will provide a sure profit for the insurance companies." And to his everlasting credit, Mr. Speaker, he did not buy that kind of a deal.

Now, to this government's everlasting discredit, this is precisely the kind of deal that this government has bought. I want to analyze it, to show to what extent this is the case. The government has divided the people of the province of Ontario into three groups. The first group, who come with their means test, indicating that they have so little income that they pay no income tax at all, numbering one million people in the province of Ontario, are going to have their premiums paid by the state in total. If I may just interject as an aside, we have had many back-benchers on the government side argue that there were no pockets of poverty in this province and it is interesting within the same session, when statements like that have been made, to have a government bring in a bill that reveals that a cool one million people in this province have incomes that are such that they pay no tax at all. There is a pretty sizeable pocket of poverty, scattered across the whole province; the government acknowledges it and they are going to pay for them.

There is a second group—800,000 people—whose taxable income is something less than $1,000, and the government here is going to pay an escalated or a graded subsidy that ranges from nothing up to, presumably, the total premium.

Now, we are still left, as the hon. leader of the Opposition stated, speculating after years of study on the part of this government as to exactly what the premiums are going to be—I can think of nothing that is a more solid condemnation of this government floundering in its approach to health insurance than that they should finally bring in a bill after all these years of study and not yet be able to present to the public, and particularly to us who have to debate this bill, some indication as to what the premiums are going to be. But if one takes the table that the hon. Minister of Health included in his speech, when he introduced this bill into the House, one will find that it grades up. Up to $100 there are subsidies paid, so that all that is left to be paid by the individual is $14. If he has a taxable income of $200, he has to pay $29; if there is a taxable income of $300, he has to pay $44 premium; if there is a taxable income of $400, he has to pay $59 premium, and interestingly enough, Mr. Speaker, the table was cut off—nothing more was included. There is a footnote at the bottom which says:

So on up the scale until taxable income of $500 is reached for a single person and $1,000 is reached for a married couple. Support for a family will extend to a taxable income of $1,200 approximately, annually.

So let us go up the table, let us follow it up. Hon. members will see that the difference, for example, in the amount of premium that has to be paid for the individual is $15 for each $100 increase in taxable income. It rose from $14 to $29, between $100 and $200 taxable income; it rose from $29 to $44, between $200 and $300 taxable income; it rose from $44 to $59, between $300 and $400 taxable income—$15 upward with each bracket of $100 taxable income. So let us follow it up the scale; let us do as they suggested and “so on up the scale.”

At $500, the premium being paid would be $74; at $600 the premium being paid would be $89; at $700 the premium being paid would be $104; at $800 the premium being paid would be $119—and just pause for a moment, Mr. Speaker, $800 taxable income for the average family—father, mother and two children—means an income of $3,500, because their exemption will be $2,700 on $800 taxable income taken from the $3,500. So at $3,500 they would pay $119; with $900 taxable income, they would pay $134; with $1,000, $149; with $1,100 taxable income on a family, it would be left to pay $164; with $1,200 taxable income, it would be up in the range of $179.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, the premium that this government is going to fix as a maximum is a premium that was indicated in the Hagey commission report—approximately $175.

Mr. L. M. Reilly (Eglinton): What is wrong with that?

Mr. MacDonald: All I am saying is, if there is nothing wrong with it why is the government trying to hide it? Why, after six years of study does the government bring in the bill and not indicate the premium? One has to go through a devious calculation to discover exactly what it is going to be.

Well, there it is.

Now, as the hon. leader of the Opposition pointed out, Mr. Speaker, if your premiums are going to be in the range of $175, which is some $13 or $14 more than the premium in the province of Alberta, and you are going to leave it on a voluntary basis, it follows, as night follows day, that we in the province of Ontario will have somewhat the same experience as they had in the province of Alberta, namely, that a good many people in these lower income brackets, who are still left with this size of a premium to be paid, whether or not—and I now use the term—they have “slackness” of character, or whether they just say, “At the end of the week when I have paid for the groceries and the rent and I bought little Johnny a pair of trousers and little Susie a new pair of shoes, and I have not got enough to pay for the premium, I will gamble.” Because all life is a gamble when you are living on that kind of income. They do not buy it, and when they are hit with illness they are uncovered, of course.

Therefore, the whole plan does not fulfill the objective that a medical insurance plan should seek to fulfill, namely, coverage of everybody.

The net effect of this kind of a situation will be that a significant number of people who are left on a voluntary basis, simply will not have the financial means to do it and we in the province of Ontario will share, to some degree, the kind of experience they have had in Alberta where 15 per cent of the people—and most of them in the lower income groups, it has been acknowledged in Alberta—remain today uncovered.

However, Mr. Speaker, what disturbs me even more, is when I begin to analyze—with the limited amount of information that this government has deigned to give the Opposition as we seek to debate this important bill—exactly what the cost is going to be to provide coverage for this bottom 25 per cent in our income scale in the province of Ontario.

The hon. Minister, in introducing the bill, indicated that the cost will be some $70 million out of the public Treasury to cover the 1,800,000 people. Now, as I was reflecting on this a few days ago, Mr. Speaker, I was suddenly intrigued by a little bit of calculation that I became engaged in. Seventy million dollars for 1,800,000 people, is a per capita cost of $38.88, not taking into account the fact that 800,000 of that 1,800,000 are going to be contributing premiums—partial premiums. Now, it is impossible to predict at this point, how much they will be contributing. I have tried to figure if one could intelligently guess what amount of money would be contributed in partial premiums along with this $70 million of public moneys to cover this bottom 1,800,000 people.

Let me give you an example: Suppose that they were paying half the premium across the board on those who are in the zero-to-$1,000 taxable income, then that would mean that there would be an additional $13 million in partial premiums from this group. But it does mean this, Mr. Speaker, that the per capita cost for covering the bottom 25 per cent out of the public Treasury, plus the partial premiums that come in, will be somewhere between $45 and $50. I wonder if the House for one moment realizes the enormity of that figure. The Hall commission—and I want to come back to these national averages a little bit later—the Hall commission estimated in its report that the national per capita, for establishing a complete medical insurance plan in this country in the year 1966, would be $24.91; and here is a government bringing in a plan which says that for the bottom one-quarter, the cost is going to be almost precisely double that amount—somewhere in the range of $45 to $50 per capita.

Now, in the first place, I am a little astounded as to why it is to be that high. I will concede that if you are covering people who are on allowances, on pensions, like disability pensions and old age pensions, or if you are covering low-income groups—because studies have indicated that there is a greater incidence of ill health in lower income groups—that this will be your high-risk group. But I am very curious as to why even in the high-risk group, you are going to come up with a figure which is twice the national average laid down by the Hall commission.

However, Mr. Speaker, let us for a moment accept the fact that this is a valid figure to cover the high-risk 25 per cent, the lower income scale, then this simply means, Mr. Speaker, that the per capita cost for the rest is going to be relatively low. The per capita cost for the rest of the people in the province of Ontario might well be in the range of $18 to $20, if one bears in mind the Hall commission national average of $24.91.

So what in effect, Mr. Speaker, this government has done is that they have taken the high-risk group out and they are going to cover it partially or wholly out of the public Treasury which means that all of the people of Ontario are going to have to share in that cost. And then, too, the rest of the province of Ontario, who are going to have to seek their coverage from the private carriers, the insurance companies or the doctor-sponsored plans, are going to have to pay not a relatively low cost rate in the range of $18 or $20; they are going to have to pay more than they have to pay at the present time, because the fact of the matter is that if we are going to end up, as it looks as though we are ending up, with a maximum premium of $175, this is higher than is now charged, for example, on the Blue Cross blue plan, on a group basis.

So the people of the province of Ontario who fall into the 75 per cent who are going to have to look after themselves, are going to pay doubly through the nose: they are going to have to share the cost from the public purse for this high-risk coverage on the bottom 25 per cent, and they themselves are going to have to put in a larger contribution to the premium that they purchase for their own coverage, $175, for something less than the kind of coverage that PSI offers at the present time.

The result, Mr. Speaker, is that we are going to have a high-cost low-value coverage. That is what this bill offers: a high-cost low-value coverage. We are going to pay more and we are going to get less. This is something that I think the people of the province of Ontario have to take a good solid look at. I would suggest, incidentally, that some of those on the government backbenches who I know have some doubts with regard to this kind of policy, should take a solid look at. Why should you pay more to get less? Why at this stage in the game we should be presented with a high-cost low-value coverage I do not know.

Let us take a look at the cost and why it is going to be a high cost, in addition to the reasons I have already spelled out. It is going to be costly, Mr. Speaker, for three reasons: 1. Because we are going to have a multiplicity of policies. There will be dozens of policies offered in this province of Ontario.

Mr. H. Worton (Wellington South): Cheaper by the dozen!

Mr. MacDonald: It will not be cheaper by the dozen. My hon. friend to the right here interjects, "Cheaper by the dozen." It will not be, that is the point. If it were cheaper by the dozen it might be fine, but it is going to be more expensive. The government is going to bring in a bill which will obligate every carrier—with some exceptions; I note they now have permission to give exceptions—to give standard coverage, either standard coverage paid from the first dollar or standard coverage on the deductible and co-insurance plan, that darling of the insurance industry that it has been trying to promote for years.

In other words, each company is going to be competing, not to provide complete health coverage, they are going to be competing with the plan which will lure people into buying what they are offering and what they are offering will be less than complete coverage at what looks like a fancy price, a low price. They will discover after they have bought it that the very thing that they need coverage for is not going to be there.

Alternatively, if it is going to be a standard plan like the one that the government is putting its seal of approval on, this deductible and co-insurance plan, let us examine for a moment the cost for an average family again. Suppose they were to sign up in this deductible and co-insurance plan. They have to pay the first $50 deductible if they are a family. Beyond that the policy will cover 80 per cent, but they have to cover 20 per cent. Suppose, for example, this average family of father, mother and two children, should happen to have during the course of the year $200 in doctor bills, which is not impossible, not out of the ordinary at all. This would mean they would have to pay the first $50, and they would have to pay 20 per cent or one-fifth of the remaining $150, or an additional $50, so that their total is going to be $100. So here, on an incomplete coverage, they are going to have a total bill of $100.

An hon. member: Eighty dollars!

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. member is right. One fifth of $150 is $30 and $30 on the original deductible of $50 is $80. They are going to have to pay $80 even though they had coverage.

It is going to be costly for a second reason, Mr. Speaker, and that is that there is just no doubt in the wide world that the overhead cost for private insurance companies is in the range of 25 to 28 cents, what is referred to euphemistically in the trade as the retention amount.

The hon. leader of the Opposition was referring to it. It is somewhat less than it was in the case of hospital insurance where we had payments out by the top four companies of only 61, 56, 47 and 39 cents. Here the average is approximately 72 cents. So 28 cents is going to be used for overhead and administrative costs and profits.

The fact of the matter is that on the plans that have been operating for some years, and therefore on which we have some incontrovertible evidence, it has been found that under a public plan coverage can be provided for everybody with an administrative cost which is not in excess of five per cent.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, we have found our hospital insurance in the province of Ontario is in that range, and I suggest if we were to establish the right kind of medical insurance in the province of Ontario, and combine it with hospital insurance, that the administrative costs could be reduced to distinctly below the five per cent figure. But we are going to have these high costs.

It is going to be costly for another reason, Mr. Speaker. Even though the medical association has indicated some unhappiness with the present government bill because it at least opens the door to the kind of public coverage which it regards as anathema—the establishment of this division within The Department of Health to cover that bottom 1,000,000 or 1,800,000 people partially or wholly—the medical profession has, generally speaking, indicated considerable support for this. Why would it not support this bill, Mr.

Speaker! Because the fact of the matter is, Mr. Speaker, that this, already the highest paid profession in the province of Ontario, in Canada, will get immediately an increase to its incomes of something in the range of $20 million overnight.

The reason for that is this: This bill stipulates that the doctors will be paid on 100 per cent of the OMA's schedule of fees. At the present time the doctors are being paid only 85 per cent if they are enrolled in PSI. I happen to have here the 1963 annual report of Physician Services Incorporated and I find on here that the expenditures from PSI in 1963 for physician services and for extended health benefit services were $52,214,385. In other words, Mr. Speaker, the doctors received on a payment of 85 per cent of the fee schedule, something in excess of $52 million. When this bill goes through, automatically they will get something over $61 million, because they will be paid 100 per cent of the OMA schedule of fees, an increase in excess of $9 million for doing exactly the same work.

Second, Mr. Speaker, in the province of Ontario there are something approximating 250,000 people who have enrolled with The Department of Public Welfare and have been placed on the health welfare plan, a plan which has been worked out between The Department of Public Welfare and the Ontario medical association, whereby these people who are indigents, or near-indigents, are covered for, I believe, $1.25 a month or something like $15 a year, and this is prorated among the doctors. I have had a little difficulty in getting an exact figure for the amount that is paid each year. I have been told that the amount that was paid in some years past is in excess of $3 million. When I checked in the Department of Public Welfare estimates for this year, I believe the figure there is in the range of $2 million, which is going to be put into the pot for doctors, to cover this 250,000 people who are on this welfare plan.

But under this proposal, this bill that the government has just brought in—as was the case in the Hagey commission report—automatically these people will be enrolled and their premiums will be paid and the doctors will be getting a full schedule of fees, so that instead of receiving $2 million or $3 million, the Hagey commission report indicates that they will receive $12.8 million or $12.9 million—in round figures, some $13 million. In other words, there will be an increase in the doctors' incomes of something approximating $10 million there, as well as an increase of something in excess of $9 million for the full payment of schedules within the PSI structure. From these two sources alone, Mr. Speaker, the medical profession will immediately be in receipt of some $20 million or more income, and this is the profession which today is the highest paid profession in this country, the highest paid profession in the province of Ontario.

Indeed, the latest figures, which I have here from the 1964 taxation statistics, published by The Department of National Revenue, indicates that in Ontario in that year, 5,456 medical doctors and surgeons received total net incomes—this is net income and the gross will be about one-third higher than this—of $106,173,000, for an average of $19,460. So that next year you can add to the doctors' gross income another $20 million directly out of the public Treasury, for a full payment of schedules on the PSI and on the welfare plan. That is why the plan is so costly. That is why, for example, the hon. Minister of Health has to come in here and tell us that for covering this bottom 25 per cent, it is going to cost the public Treasury some $70 million. That is why the figure is so extraordinarily high. It has got this kind of featherbedding in it, for what is already the highest paid profession.

Now, I have no objection to the doctors being the highest paid profession. I have said it before and I say it again, that if there is any profession that is going to be the highest paid one, I know of no profession that deserves it more than the doctors, in terms of the time they put in, and in terms of their service to humanity. But I think that within any democratic society, if a profession is already the highest paid profession, that one has to look a second time at the proposition, that when a government brings in a bill, they should bring in a bill that immediately hands over another $20 million out of the public Treasury, to those already high salaries.

When a government intervenes in the fashion that this government has finally intervened, I think the only justification for their intervention is that they should do so to make certain that everybody in the province of Ontario is going to be covered and that secondly, there will be no fat in the system. There will be none of these excessive costs that can be ironed out—the kind of thing for example, that Prime Minister Frost back in 1957 took a look at, when he considered private coverage and said "I will have nothing of that at all. We have got to give it at the lowest possible figure." And obviously this can be done only under a public plan.

Now, Mr. Speaker, by way of another approach to the weaknesses and questions that should be asked in this government plan, I would like to turn to an editorial that appeared in the Globe and Mail a few days ago, after the government introduced its bill. The plea from the Globe and Mail editorial writers was to the Opposition. They said it was an opportunity for a constructive debate and they asked that the Opposition should rise to this, rather than take refuge in doctrinaire approaches to medical-care insurance. For example, let me read this and a few of the questions which I would like to have the House take a look at along with me for a moment.

The medical insurance legislation proposed by the Ontario government offers much fertile ground for exploration and challenge by the Opposition parties. Are the benefits sufficient for a healthful start in this field?

A very good question. It does not give on the standard plans as complete coverage as it does at the present time under PSI blue plans. So it is a very good question. It rules out pregnancies under certain conditions that are spelled out in the Act, if enrolment has not taken place early enough. It rules out eye refraction; so it is a very good question as to whether or not this plan is providing a healthful start on the kind of benefits that the people of the province of Ontario want.

"Have reasonable priorities been observed?"

Well, I do not know exactly what the Globe and Mail means by "priorities," but if they are talking about the fact that in building a complete health coverage it is generally conceded that the first priority was hospital coverage and the second one is medical coverage, what should be beyond that?

And here, incidentally, I would say that our Liberals, with the kind of limited study that they put into this kind of plan, have gone off at a tangent that I personally would not support. Not that I do not want complete coverage for everybody on dental and optical immediately, but if you are going to be responsible in facing up to the costs and the staging of the implementation of this kind of programme, I would suggest that the third priority—indeed it is so close to being the second, that I think it should be integrated with the second—is the coverage of drugs.

In fact, a very strong case can be made for the fact that if one does not have coverage of drugs, in a family with limited financial means, that is idle to have coverage for the doctor's bills, because if a person goes to the doctor and his problem gets diagnosed and he is given a prescription and he has not the money to buy the prescription, what good has it all done him?

And, therefore, a case for drug coverage—at least in certain urgent areas, if not for the whole of the people of the province of Ontario—should be an integrated part of medical coverage and I personally would say without any hesitancy that this is the next priority. Beyond that, of course, there is dentistry and beyond that there is optical; priorities might be a matter of argument. Indeed, once we get this groundwork laid in hospital and medical and drugs, I think we should move as quickly as the facilities enable us. I say as quickly as the facilities enable us, because in the instance of dentistry, we simply have not got the facilities to provide the kind of complete coverage that was envisioned in the Hall commission report.

Mr. J. H. White (London South): The hon. member likes this approach then, does he?

Mr. MacDonald: Pardon?

Mr. White: The hon. member likes this approach, phasing these benefits in?

Mr. MacDonald: Oh, I like phasing it, but I do not like dragging my feet and phasing it the wrong way; and the government is doing both.

An hon. member: That is what you think.

Another hon. member: Next question?

Mr. MacDonald: Next question, right!

"Will the cost be excessive for the poor who are not quite poor enough to be entitled to assistance?" The answer to that question is in many instances beyond any shadow of doubt: Yes, it will be too great for them.

"Can a case be made for an extension of graded premiums?" Of course it can be; of greater subsidies and extension of premiums, because I repeat, as I said earlier, that we have the experience of the province of Alberta, which indicates clearly that these lower income groups are going to be precisely the groups who, left to buy health insurance voluntarily, are not going to have the means to buy it, even though the government says it is going to assist to some degree. Next question:

Should some part of the premium burden be borne out of the general revenue as in the case of Saskatchewan and British Columbia, or with hospital insurance in Ontario?

Well, I will come to that a little later, because I think that there is merit in some of the burden being carried by a basic premium and the rest of it being borne out of the general revenue with specific taxes that are designed to raise the need.

Now, continuing with the Globe and Mail questions:

How does the government propose to make sure that all citizens will be aware of the opportunities for coverage available for them? Advertising these, even on a mass scale, will not reach some of those who need protection most. Will welfare and health workers be alerted to convey the message?

Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not know; it depends on the vigour with which this government is going to try to get the message across to the people of the province of Ontario, but one of the added high administrative costs in it is undoubtedly going to be caused by the fact that they are going to do a sizeable amount of advertising to be able to get those who should be aware of it to come voluntarily into the plan. This will be an added administrative cost in the kind of plan that we are talking about.

What is to be done about the low-income worker, who would be entitled to a government subsidy but is already a member of a group plan to which his employer contributed? Will he be required to forfeit assistance either from the government or his employer? What does the government propose to do about such persons? And they could be many, who do not pay for coverage and then suffer illness or injury, for those who have no money to buy medical attention.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, there are many, many questions in the untidy, piecemeal, fragmented kind of approach that the Globe and Mail has very rightly raised and we have had no answer from this government as to how they are going to cope with it.

What about the persons who, for example—and there are lots of them in the province of Ontario, indeed there are thousands among the 35 per cent of the civil servants of this province—who are living on something less than $1,000 taxable income? What are they going to be under the government plan, or are they going to come out and handle it on their own? This is the kind of thing that the government has given no answer on.

My only comment, finally, on this Globe and Mail editorial is that although it asks all these questions, on February 27, editorially it took a look at the Hagey report and with a very commendable enlightened reaction stated that “in the context of these events the Hagey proposals are an anachronism—an anachronism designed to serve the insurance companies and the doctors more than the people of the province of Ontario.”

Now the government, two months later, brings in a plan which is patterned on the Hagey report with the exception of this slight move toward public coverage, which is going to be very, very costly and represents a handover to the medical profession and to the insurance companies by taking out the high-risk group—when the government brings in this kind of plan, why does the Globe and Mail throw in the towel and accept the plan and say: “We will start with this and we will try to improve it”?

Obviously the plan is so bad in the terms of the Globe and Mail's own premises, which it laid down two months ago, that I trust the Globe and Mail has now become persuaded that it appreciates the Opposition fighting this plan and fighting it tooth and nail because of its inadequacies. We only took our lead from the Globe and Mail and I hope the Globe and Mail is not like the Liberals who change their policy every couple of months or so on this issue.

Mr. White: That is the first true thing the hon. member has said.

Mr. MacDonald: Let me go back for one moment, Mr. Speaker, to the genesis of the plan.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): The hon. member was doing well; remember the day he voted against the third reading of a bill when he voted for second reading?

Mr. MacDonald: Let me get back to the genesis. The hon. member should not get too excited because he may get more excited before I am finished.

An hon. member: Is that right?

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): The Globe and Mail is more progressive than George Hogan.

Mr. MacDonald: My considered view would be that at least it is in touch with reality sometimes, and not lost in the maze of its own philosophic concepts.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is well for the House to recall the genesis of this plan, because there are a lot of people in the province of Ontario who think that this bill that has been brought before the House is a bill that has been shaped by the Hagey report, and this simply is not the case. As I spelled out in this House and documented solidly some couple of months ago during the Budget debate, the genesis rests right with this government; it does not need to blame anybody else. It laid down the principles of this bill back in 1962, and then it sought an advisory committee to give it some ideas of the implementation of those principles. I have dubbed this "the Dymond advisory committee." When I was debating this and the hon. Minister of Health interjected and was unhappy with some of the things I was saying, I pointed out that the committee was a rather select one—that he had not invited everybody who was interested. I was just trying to see if I could not find his exact words because I am getting into trouble in trying to quote him this afternoon. I have found them in Hansard of March 10:

Mr. MacDonald: And furthermore, many of the people interested in Medicare were excluded from it [the hon. Minister's committee]. They were never invited.

And what was the hon. Minister's reply?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: I invited them; the groups that I thought could do the most good.

And whom did he invite, Mr. Speaker? He invited 24 doctors and 11 representatives of the insurance companies; nobody else.

I have no objection to doctors being in the organization of a Medicare programme; indeed, when we worked out our Medicare programme we sought and we had the benefit of a meeting with the OMA executive to find out its views, although we knew that in basic principle there was quite a cleavage between us. I have no objection to doctors being there. Indeed, I have no objection, if one wants to have insurance company people in there to get some of the benefit of their experience in this field. But it is a preposterous suggestion that a Minister of Health who is presuming to shape the plan on behalf of the people of the province of Ontario, and not the vested interests in the field, should call together a group of people which he, in his own words, said "could do the most good"—and include only the medical profession and the insurance companies.

This government laid down the principles and then the hon. Minister brought in these people, who accepted those principles completely, and then he said to them, "You implement those principles, you give us the machinery." And the committee suggested the machinery in a complete confidential report, which I read in good part into the record in Hansard of March 10, 1965.

I wonder when we are going to get to the day, Mr. Speaker—if I may just interrupt myself here for just a moment—of recognizing that Medicare is not just for the doctors. Medicare is not just for the insurance companies. Medicare is for the people—the people whose needs we are trying to fulfill and meet more fully, not those who have a vested interest in the field at the present time.

But they got the proposals from these people who dominated the existing setup—the status quo in true Tory fashion—and the government brought in its Bill 163 before the last provincial election. Then, by way of the inevitable procrastination that old parties deal in trying to implement this urgent social need, they then set up the Hagey committee to study the matter.

While the hon. Prime Minister was going around the province and ticking off Medicare as being "done," nothing was being done about it. The Hagey commission was wasting another couple of years, because the fact of the matter is that when the Hagey commission brought in its report, when it was tabled in February, 1965, that report was very little more than a rehash of the narrow select committee that the hon. Minister established in 1962. There were a few variations, but in basic principle it was identically the same, it was just a little elaboration of the machinery.

So, Mr. Speaker, it was a waste of time, it was a waste of money, and the bill that we have now is a bill that this government had decided on back in 1962. Unfortunately, the tragedy of it, Mr. Speaker, is that times have moved on and that bill and that approach has become an anachronism—to quote the Globe and Mail. Indeed, I suspect that there are many in the back benches of the government today who recognize that this is the case but this government is stuck with it. That is point one.

Point two—which we cannot ignore and forget is this context as we examine the genesis of this bill, Mr. Speaker—is that in the critical period of 1962 when the mould was being set, so to speak, on what this government's policy was going to be with regard to medical insurance—belated in the day, after most of the countries in the western world—the government was given a major assist by the Liberal Party, which had three medical insurance policies within a 12-month period. It started out in favour of private insurance, it switched for a three-month period to public insurance, and it switched and carried through until the last provincial election on a doctor-oriented plan that, presumably, it had worked out with the doctors. Yet in the midst of the election, one of the doctors who was on the executive of the OMA said that they had never discussed the matter at all.

Mr. Speaker, why do the Liberals need the Hall commission to remind them of what has been their policy since 1919? I was very interested to hear the hon. leader of the Opposition in his battle against this government on this issue. He was really punching the pillow and the feathers were flying in all directions. For example, he said, "I find it incomprehensible that the government has moved to bring in this kind of bill." Mr. Speaker, why should he, particularly, find it incomprehensible, when his own party was supporting this kind of a bill three years ago—in 1962?

Mr. Thompson: We like to have facts—

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, this is a fact and it cannot be denied. No idle interjection at this point can dismiss what I am saying.

Furthermore, when the hon. leader of the Opposition gets up and says that from the first time he ran in politics in 1959, he had it in his literature that he was in favour of a public Medicare programme, why did he sit in the back benches like a rubber stamp and not have the intestinal fortitude to fight within his own party, when his own party forsook that public policy? All he did was to hoodwink the people when he sought the votes. Indeed, the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Trotter) was in the same category. I concede that these two hon. gentlemen are in favour of public Medicare; I am even persuaded that they have always been in favour of public Medicare, but they share the responsibility for their party's wavering because they did not have the intestinal fortitude to fight it when their last leader brought in the wrong policy. And tragically, Mr. Speaker, we are stuck with a bad kind of Medicare in the province of Ontario, because this government in 1962, decided on a policy at a time when the Liberal Party was assisting them on that decision and the Liberals cannot now just slough all that off and thrash away at the government.

Indeed, after all that we have heard, what we need from the Liberal Party on this issue is a little bit more evidence of conviction on the issue after they have played politics with it since 1919, both federally and provincially.

The hon. leader of the Opposition, in characteristic confusion, in which his amendment almost got lost, concluded his debate by saying that this government has brought in a half-baked approach—muddled and confused. I will agree, but I can think of nothing that is a more accurate description of what Liberal policy has been on this issue down through the years, and that is the reason why the province is stuck with this kind of a Medicare policy.

An hon. member: Everybody is out of step—

Mr. MacDonald: No, we are not out of step. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, not that I want to do anything other than to get this government to change its mind and bring in the right kind of Medicare. I now turn to an alternative in which I will indicate just how right we have been all along.

I have no objection to this government proceeding with a medical insurance bill, if it were the right kind of medical insurance. After waiting for some 46 years for the Liberals at Ottawa to do something, I can quite understand the government being exasperated, impatient and wanting to meet the needs of the people, if it were really going to meet the needs of the people.

Let us take a look at the alternative, Mr. Speaker. We can have in the province of Ontario at the present time, universal coverage.

We can have that coverage through a basic premium, plus contributions from the Treasury that will be met through taxes and I want to indicate one way in which this can be met. Otherwise, we would have no objection to the kind of policy, the kind of medicare that the government is establishing in basic principle. We would agree, for example, that the doctor should have the right to choose his patients and the patient should have the right to choose his doctor.

We will agree on the proposition that we should operate on a fee-for-service basis which has become traditional on the North American continent; we will agree, for example, that medical decisions should be made by the doctors—anybody else who is not a doctor who issues a medical decision would need to have his head read. But we also say that if you are going to have this kind of a plan it should be under the administrative direction of a health insurance commission on which everybody who is involved would have representation—including the doctors—the kind of concept, though more broadly applied—that we have at the present time under the Ontario hospital services commission.

Those are the basic principles. Now, when you come to costs, Mr. Speaker, just let me remind the House—because here I am proud, as a member of the Opposition, to get up in this House and to repeat in essence what I put on the record in December of 1962 and what has now been vindicated completely from the authoritative and authentic studies of the Hall commission report.

On December 5 or 6, 1962, when we announced the kind of Medicare programme that the New Democratic Party had been fighting for—and, indeed, when they were elected they put it into effect; they did not talk about it and change their policies, like the Liberals—we pointed out that you could establish in the province of Ontario, complete coverage in 1962, for approximately $165 million. And we came to this figure, Mr. Speaker, by following the same cost calculating procedures that the Thompson committee—the author of that book that the hon. leader of the Opposition has on his desk but which he has not completely absorbed yet—the kind of cost calculations that were used in the province of Saskatchewan to find out what overall coverage would cost. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, we went one step further; you can double-check these costs by taking a look at the amount of money that is now being spent in the province of Ontario, because, let us face it, Mr. Speaker, what you and I spend for Medicare, ultimately comes out in The Department of National Revenue statistics as doctors' income. So if you want to find out how much is being spent on medical services in the province of Ontario at the present time, take a look at doctors' income.

Mr. Sopha: Gross income!

Mr. MacDonald: Gross income, right—and back in 1962, the doctors' net income was in the range of about $90 million. The gross income—since about one-quarter of it, by rule of thumb, I find accepted in the profession, for expenses—would take it up in the range of about $125 million. In other words, you could establish in the province of Ontario, a plan for $165 million on a per capita cost of $26.25, and of that figure, Mr. Speaker, $125 million of it would not be new money—$125 million would be a redirection of existing expenditures that you and I are spending directly in doctor bills, or indirectly through some sort of a plan. Into that there would have to be new money to the extent of, perhaps, $40 million, to provide complete coverage. But the whole of the people of the province of Ontario would be in—universal coverage, with complete medical services not plans that had deductibles or fine print in the contract.

Now, when we calculated that figure back in 1962, it immediately was attacked by government benches and particularly by the hon. Minister of Health in speeches all across the province of Ontario, saying that our figures were a gross underestimate of what it would have to be. Our retort was that this was a calculation that might not be completely accurate, but to the extent that it was not accurate we were convinced that it was an overestimate, not an underestimate, and the Hall commission report, I suggest to you, has confirmed that this is the case.

The Hall commission report indicates that the per capita cost nationally to establish full medical insurance in this country in 1961 would have been $21.01; in 1966 it will be $24.91. In other words, next year it will be $24.91. By 1971 it will be $28.72.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, the per capita cost that we calculated in 1962 was so much of an overestimate that I suggest to this House that it is still valid in the year 1965. Because the per capita cost in Ontario of $26.25 is sufficiently above the national average of the Hall report, $24.91, I suggest to you it is still valid. In other words, Mr. Speaker, we could still establish in the province of Ontario full medical coverage for everybody, for $165 million, and at least $125 million of that, perhaps more, would be a redirection of existing expenditure, not new money. You would have at the most, something like $40 million in new money to provide complete coverage for everybody—not the $70 million that the hon. Minister of Health is talking about, out of the public Treasury, to cover only the high-risk group at the bottom, the bottom 25 per cent.

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): The hon. member should come and keep my books if that is the way he figures.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, instead of that idle kind of interruption, I would suggest the hon. Minister of Mines just take a look at what I have said and I invite him to indicate to me either personally or in writing where I am wrong in my calculation.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: I will do that.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, the hon. Minister should do that.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): He will not be able to find anything wrong.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: The hon. members are not in Saskatchewan now.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, just a minute now. Let us just pause for a moment. This idle, unknowledgeable interruption on the part of the hon. Minister of Mines—I thought he would have learned by now that perhaps not talking so freely will keep him from getting into trouble.

The fact of the matter is, Mr. Speaker, that out in Saskatchewan when the Thompson commission made a study of what the costs would be—on precisely the same basis as we have done for Ontario and have been vindicated as correct by the Hall commission report—experience proved that even in the first year it was high. In the first year of operation in the province of Saskatchewan they were something less than one dollar below what the estimated per capita cost would be, so the hon. Minister should not interrupt on something that apparently does not come within his purview; he knows nothing about it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if we can provide complete coverage in the province of Ontario for $165 million, I want to suggest to this House once again how this could be met. And I want to spell it out to the House because it indicates just how more equitably one could share the complete burdens financially of health insurance and cover everybody, instead of this half-baked fragmented kind of approach the government is making in bringing in Bill No. 136.

Our proposal is that the $165 million for medical insurance should be covered by revenue being raised from each of the following three sources: One-third of it would come from a basic premium, and that basic premium would be set low enough that any person or family that was earning, that was not unemployed, was not living on a pension, would be in a position to pay it. In other words, 30 cents a week for a single person, $15.60 a year, or 60 cents a week for a family, $31.20 a year. And that, Mr. Speaker, would raise approximately one-third, indeed in the range of $57 million. Second, any further contribution that was made by the individual or by the family would be in accordance with his ability to pay, and that would be reflected by his income tax, he would pay a six per cent surcharge on the income tax he is now paying.

Mr. G. H. Peck (Scarborough Centre): Would the hon. member not call that a means test?

Mr. MacDonald: This is not a means test. It is a basic premium for which you get a complete coverage, it will be the same for everybody. Thirty or 60 cents a week; $31.20 for a family. Anything further paid would be a six per cent surcharge on his income tax and it would go up with his income; it would be progressive, it would be in accordance with his ability to pay. That would raise approximately one-third in the range of $56 million to $58 million, in 1962.

The third source of revenue we proposed was that there should be a three per cent corporation tax. On something that is as fundamental to the economy and to the society of the whole of the province of Ontario as health insurance, I suggest that in any equitable distribution of the burden, the great and growing amount of the wealth of the province of Ontario that is to be found in corporate income should share in the cost and a three per cent corporation tax in 1962 would have brought approximately $50 million.

Now, there is the way in which the government could raise the revenue.

And I want now, Mr. Speaker, to turn and indicate to the House in the concluding portion of my remarks, what the contrast would be in that kind of a plan—I am not wedded to the exact details of the financing of it—as compared to what the government is proposing to offer us at the present time. For those who were unemployed or living on a pension or an allowance, under both plans—the government's plan and our plan—their premiums would be met by the government—

Mr. Reilly: This would be different from Saskatchewan then?

Mr. MacDonald: No, no, in Saskatchewan persons who are unemployed and living on an allowance, are covered.

Mr. Reilly: Do they not pay a premium?

Mr. MacDonald: No, if they are unemployed or living on an allowance. If they are unemployed and are getting relief, their premium will be paid by the agency that is making the relief payment, to keep them covered so that those persons will have protection.

Mr. Reilly: For those people on pension and those with no income?

Mr. MacDonald: Right!

Second, Mr. Speaker, for those whose incomes are so small that they pay no income tax, the government proposes to provide coverage, but on a means-test basis. Now, under the NDP plan, if a person was earning but paying no income tax, he would pay the basic minimum premium of 30 cents a week single or 60 cents a week for a family and then he would be entitled to full coverage with no means test, no further payment. All citizens with an earned income could be treated on the same basis. Those on low incomes would not be left with the impression that they were getting something for nothing. I am interested in this government, for example, after years of saying that no one wants to kid the people into claiming that they were getting something for nothing, now, in effect, brings in a programme which is going to kid people into believing that they are going to get something for nothing.

Here, perhaps, is where there is a healthy manifestation of our different philosophies. We would agree that a person who is in the low-income bracket should be charged a low amount and that is why our basic premium is as low as 30 cents per person per week or 60 cents per family per week. We contend that any person who is earning, no matter how small his income, is going to be able to meet that and when he meets it he can hold his head high and say, "I have met my share of the burden of the cost of Medicare and I am entitled to full coverage, I am not on a means-test basis, I am not going to be categorized by a government into a sort of second-class citizen, I am not going to have to come with my TD-1 form as my means-test indication to the government as I seek a subsidy because I happen to be on a lower income." You get rid of all of the iniquitous aspects of the various means-test approaches. But beyond this no-income-tax group, the following table contrasts the Medicare costs for an average family of four, father and mother and two children under the NDP and the government plans.

A person earning $3,000, Mr. Speaker, under the NDP plan would pay a basic premium of $31.20. His income tax is $33, the six per cent surcharge on that is $1.98, which, along with the $31.20, means his total payment will be $33.18. Under this government's programme he would have to pay $44.

At $3,500, under the NDP plan, they would have a basic premium of $31.20. Since their income tax is $88, the six per cent surcharge will be $5.28, so that their total premium would be $36.48.

Mr. W. D. McKeough (Kent West): What is he going to pay through corporation taxes—

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. member should not interrupt for a moment; I will deal with that question.

Mr. McKeough: That doesn't matter!

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. MacDonald: The government is going to charge $119 for the person who is in the $3,500 bracket and has an $800 taxable income.

At $4,000 the NDP plan would be $31.20 for the basic premium, an income tax of $152, a six per cent surcharge on that is $9.12, so that his total premium is $40.26. Under this government's plan, it is likely going to be $175. At $5,000—I will not read the whole table now, from this point forward—at $5,000 under the NDP plan, it will be $49.26. The government's charge will be $175.

At $7,000, the NDP plan will be $71.76. This government's will be $175. At $9,000, the NDP plan will be $98.88. This government's will be $175. At $11,000, the NDP plan will be $130.80. This government's charge will be $175. At $13,000—and just let me detail this calculation to show how it comes: At $13,000, a family would pay a basic premium of $31.20, their income tax would be $2,275. A six per cent surcharge on that is $136.50, which along with the basic premium means $167.70, for his total Medicare premium.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, in this kind of a plan, which would require less new money than the government proposes to put in out of the public Treasury to meet only the bottom 25 per cent, we could provide coverage for everybody in the province of Ontario, and at a cost so that everybody who is earning less than $13,000 would pay less than this government is going to fix as approximately a maximum premium in its programme. For better coverage. And for anybody who wants to dispute the figures, I will sit down and detail them.

Now, there is one final point, Mr. Speaker, that I would like to deal with and that is that, as I indicated earlier, one of the major deficiencies in the government's programme which I think can be met immediately, without any more procrastination, without any more study, is a move towards the coverage of at least the most urgent need for drugs.

Now, if I may go back to the costing of the New Democratic plan, I said that when we figured our costs in 1962, that it was $165 million to cover everybody in the province of Ontario. I indicated because of the studies of the Hall commission report and the average cost there, that that $165 million would still cover everybody in the province of Ontario. But the interesting thing is that these three sources of revenue that I have just spelled out—a basic premium of 30 cents for an individual or 60 cents a family per week; a three-per-cent corporation tax, and a six-per-cent surcharge on personal income—raised $161 million in 1962. This year, in 1965, they would raise approximately $200 million—exactly the same taxes. In other words, the kind of experience that the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) has had is that by keeping his tax level the same in a buoyant economy, his revenues go up each year. In short, we could cover a complete medical-insurance plan for everybody in the province of Ontario, and still have $35 million left over, or some portion thereof, to move toward the coverage of drugs.

Much as I am interested in the proposition the hon. leader of the Opposition has thrown in, in his rather grab-bag approach to coverage of children's dentistry and opticians and things of this nature, my proposal is that we should move toward the coverage of drugs, insofar as that $35 million would cover it, and I suggest that we should start with three groups whose need is urgent. The first group is people who are on pensions or allowances, usually older people or sick people, and who therefore have a great need for drugs. Second, as long as the doctor indicates it is required, the people who have been discharged from hospitals should be able to get drugs. Third, those who are in chronic need of drugs, people who are afflicted with arthritis and ailments of this nature for which there is a chronic need for drugs, should be supplied.

I think we can cover at least those three in a staging programme in drugs, and do it within the framework of the costs that we have spelled out here. We are not talking idly about general plans. I am presenting to this government and I am presenting to the people of the province of Ontario, an alternative plan whose financing has been vindicated by the Hall commission report in terms of the estimated costs. If one wants a variation in terms of raising the revenue, anybody will be willing to entertain it, because our proposal is illustrative, but we would like it to be equitable in terms of capacity to pay. With that kind of a plan, with less dipping into the public Treasury, with less expenditure of money, we could cover everybody in the province of Ontario, instead of having this atrociously expensive proposition that this government is putting before the House, of covering the bottom quarter of high risks by dipping into the public Treasury to the extent of $70 million a year. Then after it has taken the high risks out, it leaves the relatively low risks to the private treasury and the rest of us who will have to buy our own insurance will have to pay through the nose, with higher premiums to the insurance companies, and indeed, through the doctor-sponsored plans, too.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, this bill is bad in principle. To a considerable extent it will be a roadblock on the way of establishing the right kind of medical insurance in this country and therefore anybody who analyzes it rationally, bearing in mind the needs of the people of the province of Ontario, has no alternative but to oppose it on second reading.

Mr. T. L. Wells (Scarborough North): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on the principle of this bill, I was going to start out with a few laudatory remarks about the bill, but I think I have to leave them for a minute, having listened in the last 15 or 20 minutes to what the hon. member for York South has said. As he was speaking, a couple of lines from Gilbert and Sullivan came to my mind. I cannot remember where they are from, or just how they go exactly, but they go something like: "This looks like cream, but really it is just a lot of skim milk." That, I would submit, is just about what those figures are, that the hon. member just read to this House. He says he will sit down and prove these to anyone.

Mr. MacDonald: Deal with the facts instead of generalities.

Mr. Wells: Let me give the hon. member the facts then. Let me give him the facts, just in regard to this one specific thing—the per capita cost here in the province of Ontario.

Both the hon. member for York South and the hon. leader of the Opposition have made a lot about figures in the Hall commission report. They talk about this per capita cost being $21.01 in 1961, and in 1966, $24.91. In other words, the cost of medical services per capita in Canada, would be that.

The hon. member for York South has based his whole argument and his whole table of premiums on what he says is a per capita cost of $26.25. What are the true facts?

Physicians' Services Incorporated is a representative non-profit carrier in this province. It offers a plan very similar to our standard plan. It insures people of all classes in all groups over this province, and has well over 1,000,000 people in its plans. What, Mr. Speaker, was its per capita costs for medical services last year? They were $32.48. A far cry from $26.25. In other words, Mr. Speaker, if we take the population of Ontario at about 6,500,000, instead of costing $165 million for a plan, we get $214 million.

It should be remembered that this per capita cost for PSI was on payment of doctors' fees at 90 per cent of the OMA schedule, whereas under our bill doctors will be paid at 100 per cent of the schedule. A much more realistic figure is somewhere around $35 per capita for medical services in this province—just doctors' services—and this comes to $227.5 million. Again I say, Mr. Speaker, it is a far cry from the $165 million that we have been told about.

If that premise and that base is wrong, the whole table of premiums and amounts to be paid by the people of this province is wrong. I submit that the hon. member for York South has grossly underestimated what the cost of health services in this province really would be.

Mr. White: He cooked the books.

Mr. MacDonald: Take a look at the aggregate.

Mr. Wells: Having dealt with that point, I would like to make some general statements.

Another hon. member of the New Democratic Party, I think, a short while ago said that this would be a month called "a May of madness," and I think that history so far has shown that this really has been a May of magnificence. We have had more progressive legislation introduced in this month than in a long time in this House. We started with commuter services; we have had the colleges of applied arts and technology—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order! The member should stick to the principle of the bill before the House.

Mr. Wells: Mr. Speaker, in my enthusiasm for this bill I am merely trying to show that this is one of a group of bills that stamp this government with the true term "Progressive-Conservative."

Mr. MacDonald: It needs some—

Several hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Wells: I can assure the hon. members of this House—although I am certainly not speaking for the executive branch of government, but—

An hon. member: The hon. member is speaking for the cause.

Mr. Wells:—from my knowledge, the bill before us today was not conceived back in 1962, it was conceived right now in 1965 and is in tune with the times and the year in which we now find ourselves.

Mr. MacDonald: There were a few changes—

Mr. Wells: Now, what really are the principles of this bill, the bill we are debating today? The principles are quite simple: This bill makes available a standard contract for medical services insurance. We all recognize that there are other facets of the health field that will and perhaps must be covered in the future, but, for the time being, this bill is a bill for medical services insurance. That offered by physicians. This bill sets out a standard contract and makes this contract available to every person in this province regardless of their age, their state or condition of health, and it makes this contract non-cancellable. In other words, everyone can obtain a good health insurance contract. This is to be done on a voluntary basis.

The second principle of the bill is that provision is made to make insurance available for those who cannot pay for it, with government assistance.

I think that these principles of this bill will meet the needs of the people of this province and are, in fact, what the people of this province want in this year 1965. That is why this bill has been brought before us, because we believe this is what the people want and further, Mr. Speaker, we believe that this bill really is following what the Hall commission has outlined.

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): Oh, come now. What a ridiculous statement.

Mr. Wells: And I will enlarge on that in a few minutes. The hon. leader of the Opposition read a few quotations from various groups in this province. I would like to say that in my talks with most people around this province, I have found that they are satisfied with this bill.

Mr. G. Bukator (Niagara Falls): Has the hon. member talked to most people?

Mr. Wells: And most people—the opinions of a lot of people we find reflected by the newspapers in this province. I would like to read into the record, bits from some editorial comment in some of the newspapers of this province, because I think that they more than anything have really captured what the real feeling of the people is toward this legislation.

An hon. member: Likely all Tory papers.

Mr. Wells: The Ottawa Journal on May 13, said that:

Even though Health Minister Dymond has emphasized that this is only one step in the developing health programme of the provincial government, it is a momentous step. The government of Ontario has been careful to recognize from the start that a successful medical insurance programme should have the co-operation of the medical profession. It has taken care to achieve this without subordinating the general public interests to narrow professional advantage.

The Woodstock Sentinel Review, on May 14, said:

It is rather surprising that leaders of both Opposition parties in the Ontario Legislature have been so outspoken on their attack on the medical-care insurance programme which has been introduced by the government. It is the right and the duty of the Opposition to point out what it calls "the bill's inadequacies" just as it is the duty of the government to explain why some things are not included now. But do not let anything interfere with the passage of progressive legislation just because, in its initial stages, it may not appear to go as far as some would wish. As a pilot project, the current project seems like a good beginning.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that perhaps some of the out-of-province comment has been the most interesting and I would just like to quote two of these, one from the Montreal Gazette, which says:

The plan is being attacked on the grounds that it is not universal and compulsory, but in several ways Ontario appears to be proceeding wisely. Some of the critics of the Ontario plan have called it timid, perhaps the plan might better be called prudent. There is much to be said for doing first things first, step by step.

But I think, Mr. Speaker, the most interesting editorial is from that most often quoted place and one to which some look for all their guidance on medical health insurance, and that is in Saskatchewan. This very interesting editorial appeared in the Regina Leader Post on May 14, and I would like to read this:

The Ontario plan goes somewhat further than the Saskatchewan scheme in recognizing lack of ability to pay as an obstacle to obtaining medical attention. In Saskatchewan every family and every individual was compelled to pay a medical premium irrespective of the state of their finances. Until the legislation was amended at the last session, delinquents could be jailed for non-payment of the premiums.

Mr. Reilly: Shame, shame!

Mr. Wells: And I might add, Mr. Speaker, six or seven people actually were sent to jail for nonpayment of premiums.

Several hon. members: Shame, shame!

Mr. Reilly: A Liberal government changed that.

Mr. Thompson: What about 1900 in Alberta?

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Wells: To continue with the quotation, Mr. Speaker:

Since the municipalities are responsible for medical bills of indigents not covered by the medical-care plan, in their self-defence they have been paying the premiums for the known indigents. Under the Ontario plan the municipalities of that province [meaning Ontario] are to be spared such concern. The day will come in Saskatchewan when the pressure of public opinion will force acceptance by the province of responsibility for medical and hospitalization for indigents.

To the people of Saskatchewan, the estimated $70 million first-year cost of the Ontario plan appears to be somewhat staggering. Ontario's population is approximately seven times Saskatchewan's. With medical care costing approximately $25 million in Saskatchewan this year, the total cost of a similar plan in Ontario would be around $175 million.

Of course, as I have already said, they too have underestimated what it would really cost in this plan.

I think I should mention, Mr. Speaker—and perhaps this again is something many are unaware of—the cost of medical services in the province of Ontario is 40 per cent greater than in the province of Saskatchewan; 40 per cent greater, and this is an actual figure that can be substantiated, the per capita cost here.

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Why?

Mr. White: Higher standard of living, higher levels of income.

Mr. Wells: This is because of the facilities and services available, the specialties of doctors available, the different services available in this province; the cost of medical care is 40 per cent greater.

Mr. McKeough: All the good doctors are leaving!

Mr. Wells: To continue:

Or looking at it from the opposite direction, a plan similar to Ontario's would cost approximately $10 million in Saskatchewan. Undeniably, there are financial advantages offered by the Ontario plan along with a more positive guarantee of "free medical care for persons in the low-income group."

The lack of uniformity among medical care plans being inaugurated by the province is not to be deplored, rather this is a development to be welcomed and encouraged. From the diversity of programmes will emerge through trial and error and experience, a specific form of medical care which appears to be best suited to Canadian conditions.

Saskatchewan will watch the Ontario experiment, as it is watching those of other provinces for indications of ways and means of improving our plan. Saskatchewan may have been the first to adopt medical care on a provincial basis, but strange to relate, none of the other provinces has copied our scheme.

Now that, Mr. Speaker, I think, is a very interesting comment on our plan from a newspaper situated right in the middle of the Saskatchewan situation, and a newspaper which lived through all the travail and wars that went on through the very difficult inauguration of that programme in Saskatchewan.

Now, what I would like to talk about, Mr. Speaker, are the statements by those who say that this is not really in the spirit of the Hall commission. Now, the Hall commission said that Canada should have a compulsory government-run national health programme. They did not tell us how we should have this; they said this would be a problem for the provinces and the federal government to get together and plan this out—"We think you should have this; now you get together and decide how it should be done." They did tell us, however, that it probably would not be feasible in Canada until 1971, and the plan we are talking about now is coming into being June 1, 1966. And really, Mr. Speaker, in fact, Ontario has taken progressive steps in the field of health care, and these we all well know.

Now, the point is that this bill we now have had introduced before us is another one of these steps, but all the steps are related, one to the other, and I think the Hall commission recommended this, because they talked a lot about medical training and medical education and, of course, the hon. Prime Minister introduced a massive programme to give a shot in the arm to the training of doctors, dentists, paramedical personnel, hospital facilities, teaching hospital facilities, and so forth, last October. This, Mr. Speaker, is an important step in this whole programme because we must have the personnel to carry out a plan. This plan we now have—this bill—is a further step in a continuing programme of furthering the health needs of this province, and I submit in that light it is in the spirit of what the Hall commission has suggested.

While talking about the Hall commission, I think that it is well, perhaps, to look at another point that it talks about, because so many of the arguments that are put forward by our hon. friends here, rest on figures and statistics that are found in the Hall commission report. I think that it is as well for us to know that a lot of these figures and statistics are open to question by very seriously minded people and accountants. They are open to question because they feel that some of the conclusions arrived at are not accurate.

I would like to read something about this retention figure. It has been bandied around here that the retention figure, if private plans are allowed to continue to operate in Canada, will be 25 per cent, 26 per cent or 27 per cent—or 25 cents on the dollar. This figure is arrived at because the Hall commission has said something about this, but how did they work this out, and what are the true facts? As I have stated, I told you what the per capita cost of Physicians' Services Incorporated was, and it has well over 1,000,000 or 1.5 million people insured in this province. Its administration costs, or retention figure, is six per cent. This is exactly what the Hall commission says would be an ideal figure for the government-run plan. We have many plans operating at this figure now, and yet the Hall commission in some way twisted the facts slightly, to present another picture. I will read something on this:

These specific comments relate purely to some of the figures used in the Hall commission report in computing the cost of a government-implemented plan. By what would appear to be undue inflation of the cost attributed to the voluntary plan, the commission on page 745 has suggested that in 1971, such costs would be $1,020 million, whereas if the same were true under the government plan, the cost for health services would be $837 million, a total of $183 million less.

The commission arrived at this figure by using the figure of $797 million in 1971 as the actual cost for medical care at that time, and to this figure, $797 million, it has added an average of 28 per cent, as the retention ratio—28 per cent for administrative costs—and this was computed, supposedly, by the research staff.

In the case of the government's plan, however, the commission has taken this same $797 million and used a five-per-cent retention ratio, or cost figure, so that it has the $797 million, and in one case has added 28 per cent and in another case, five per cent. That is, in the first case it arrived at, the figure is $1,020 million, and in the second case, $837 million. Then it stated:

The decision which Canadians have to make is whether they wish to pay $1,020 million for physicians' services in 1971 for a programme administered by the insurance industry, or $837 million for a programme administered by government agencies.

In taking a look at these figures—because many of the non-profit plans such as PSI and their counterparts across the country operate at very close to the five per cent retention figure. Many carriers were very concerned with these figures. They took a close look at them and came to the conclusion that their performance refutes this statement, because they could show that they were operating very close to the retention ratio recommended by the Hall commission.

Mr. R. Gisborn (Wentworth East): What is the difference in coverage?

Mr. Wells: The difference in coverage? PSI and the non-profit plans offer a coverage equal pretty well to any government coverage. Through the non-profit plan, they felt that costs would perhaps be even lower than through a government carrier. In the case of the commercial insurance carriers, I feel that the Hall commission has used modifying factors which have increased the retention ratio above what it would actually be.

In speaking about some of the figures in the report generally, I would like to tell hon. members—there is a table on page 734. This table shows a figure of $159 per year per family and states that this is based upon costs in Alberta. Actually, the prevailing cost in Alberta at the time this study was done, in 1961, was $125 per family, and that $159 was the maximum premium. Again, the amount was paid only by those in the high-risk category who were in the pooling arrangement.

This whole changing of figures throughout the report tends to create distortions in the relative costs in the two systems, and because of this fact, I think that we cannot accept completely as valid, those figures which are quoted from the Hall commission report. I think that when one reads through the sections of the Hall commission report, he will find that there is a complete non-understanding of the principle of group coverage, as we know it in this province.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to talk for a minute about this maximum premium that has been mentioned. The impression has been given that this premium, no matter what it will be—say $175, as Hagey has mentioned—will be the premium that everyone will pay who is not in the assisted category. Let us take a look at this and see just exactly what the picture is in Ontario today.

Some of my hon. friends' arguments would perhaps be valid if we were talking about a climate in which no one had any insurance and we were going to introduce into this province a completely new principle of medical health insurance, when, in fact, we have a situation where medical health insurance has been here a long time, has been pioneered by non-profit and insurance companies, has been born and has grown to maturity and served the people of this province well. What is actually being suggested by the Opposition is a disruption of this whole system that has served a great number of our people very well.

How many has it served? The total coverage of people insured in this province was about 4.6 million in 1962, and in 1963, 4,996,000—nearly 5,000,000 people. From this 1963 figure one can take away those who have only surgical insurance, those who have only medical insurance, those who have in-hospital insurance, and those who have the PSI brown plan—in other words all those plans that my hon. friends might refer to as having inadequate coverage. This comes to about 700,000. We find in 1963 we had about 4,297,000 people in this province with existing medical health insurance plans.

The percentage increase in adequate coverage in Ontario from 1962 to 1963 was 16.5 per cent. If we apply this rate of increase—and I have no reason to believe that perhaps it is not a legitimate thing to do—we find that by the end of 1965, we would have 5,800,000 people covered in this province with adequate health insurance. Now, what we are trying to do here is calculate this sort of nebulous thing, the insurance gap. In trying to do this, we take at the end of 1965 the projected population of Ontario, 6,800,000 people. Deduct from it the people who I estimated will be adequately covered, 5,832,000, those who have government and special coverage, 500,000, and you get a total covered population of 6,332,000; and we find that the insurance gap is 468,000.

Mr. S. Lewis: Did you have 16.5 per cent increase every year, steadily over—

Mr. Wells: No, we have 16.5 through in the last year and—

Mr. S. Lewis: In one year—and on that the government is—

Mr. Wells: —this is a trend that comes along. Well, what my hon. friend is saying—this is exactly the same kind of thing that the Hall commission did, perhaps—but I am suggesting that these figures—

Mr. S. Lewis: The hon. member discredited the Hall commission.

Mr. Wells: —show a trend. And I say that in the year 1965 we will have covered by the voluntary system well over 5,000,000 people, in fact more like 5.5 million people in this province.

Now, what I am saying, Mr. Speaker, is that you find that the insurance gap is really a half a million people and yet we are presenting a programme that makes provision for assistance, or partial assistance, to 1,800,000 people, so really there are many in this group who already have insurance. And there are many in this group who will not want to switch their insurance, because they have adequate insurance and because they are not paying too much.

Now, I say they are not paying too much. Why do I say this? Because, Mr. Speaker, I find that from some statistics that I got in 1959, 1,497 firms were surveyed and they were asked if they were providing group medical and surgical coverage—this group coverage we are talking about—and 1,227 firms replied in the affirmative, 82 per cent said “Yes, we are providing this.” Of the 1,227 that replied, over 1,000—1,075—said that they were contributing to the cost of medical and surgical coverage. And all but 76 firms paid anywhere from 50 per cent to 100 per cent. Three hundred and sixteen firms paid 100 per cent of the premium.

Now, what this really means, you see, Mr. Speaker, is that at the present time in Ontario we have a lot of people working for firms who have group coverage. While the ultimate premium is probably—take the PSI premium—around $159 per family, their firms are paying 50 per cent or more and all they really see going from their take-home pay is somewhere between $75 and $80. And to the average man on the street in the great mass that are covered now, this is what they are paying for their insurance. We agree that this is not what they are really paying but this is what they think they are paying and at this time it is being suggested that we scrap all this and we institute all these new taxes and disrupt this whole great mass of money from the private sector to the public sector in order to provide coverage for those who cannot pay for it themselves.

Now, I submit that this just does not seem right to me. I think we have arrived at a plan that presents the best of both worlds, if one wants. We are keeping and providing through the institution of the standard contract which will be available to anyone, adequate medical insurance coverage. We are not disrupting a great mass of people who right now feel that they are only paying about $75 to $80 a year premium. We are not disrupting them, we are not causing a massive disruption in our provincial economy and yet we are providing everyone with the opportunity to assist the needy, Mr. Speaker, not with a means test but with a simple needs test, a simple needs test: “Take your T-1 form, take a simple application form, fill it out, send it in and you have a standard insurance contract, giving you adequate coverage and looking after your needs.”

I might point out that the T-1 form basis—while this has not been worked out, I hope it will be worked out this way—if you take the taxable income figure on the T-1 form, Mr. Speaker, you are allowing not only the family deductions, but you are allowing deductions for labour union fees and deductions for medical expenses that might have been allowed the year before and so forth. I am suggesting this might be one way of doing it and I hope that perhaps it is the way that it will be done.

Now, I would like, in concluding this, as I assume we probably do not want to go on too long this evening, Mr. Speaker, I would like to take an example of just how this disruption of existing plans could work, and this may not be too easy-going for some of our friends in the NDP. But the hon. member for York South outlined his plan to us.

Let us take the example of the General Motors Corporation in Oshawa. This firm employs 23,500 employees. General Motors has a PSI blue plan, complete coverage. The rates for this group are $156 a year. But General Motors pays 100 per cent of the cost. It is a fringe benefit, nothing comes out of the take-home pay of the workers at General Motors. Using the yearly figure of $156, which is completely paid by the company with no contribution from the employee—if we use this as a basis and took the “MacDonald plan” as introduced, we take $31.20 as the premium. This is what he said—$31.20 per year. That is what he said and that is what the NDP booklet passed around at the last election, said. Now if you use $5,000 as the average income—and this is probably low for the workers at General Motors—this would mean that we would deduct the $31.20 from the $156 that General Motors pays. This would mean that the minute this plan came into effect, General Motors would be saving $106.74 per family per year. In other words, the “MacDonald plan” would be saving General Motors $2.5 million.

That is a rather odd sort of thing. As I have said, on this, the hon. member for York South has indicated that they would impose a six per cent levy on personal income tax. Now, once again on the basis of $5,000 income this means that the six per cent tax would amount to another $18.06, and this the company, of course, would not pay. Therefore the employee at General Motors, instead of paying nothing, would now be paying an extra $18.06.

Now, in addition to this, it has been suggested—

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. member is going to shock the hon. Minister of Mines. That has really got him confused.

Mr. Wells: In addition to this, the hon. member for York South has indicated that they would impose a three per cent increase on corporation tax. Certainly it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that at this time, nothing could be more detrimental than this type of taxation. The whole basis of the growth of this province is on industrial expansion. Our industrial base and our taxing base must expand and we cannot stifle it by adding another three per cent to the corporation tax.

The hon. Provincial Treasurer will tell you that we have not had to have any tax increases this year, because of the economic expansion of this province. We get more money with existing taxes, without any increase in the tax rates, and this is the kind of thing we are expecting in the future. And a step like an increase of three per cent on the corporation tax, I say, would be a retrograde step and would be to the detriment of the people of this province.

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Minister of Highways): Nothing confuses them more than facts.

Mr. Wells: Now, Mr. Speaker, in these few rambling remarks I have tried to counter a few of the arguments which have been put forward. I will say “put forward” perhaps forcefully by the hon. member for York South, but very timidly by the hon. leader of the Opposition, because I think he has got the message. I think the message has filtered through, as it has filtered through to me from my hon. Liberal friends is that they really like what we are doing, and they support this.

Mr. Trotter: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I want him to take that remark back or—

Mr. Speaker: Order! Will the member kindly sit down.

Mr. Trotter: I am asking him to take that back.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: If the member has a point of order, please state it!

Mr. Trotter: Mr. Speaker, I am asking him to take that back. That is utterly false. He is misleading this House. I detest this kind of thing. I want him to take it back.

Mr. Wells: Mr. Speaker, if my rather excited hon. friend from Parkdale would like me to bring down the five or ten Liberal friends I have who have told me this, I will sit them in the gallery here and let him meet them all.

Mr. Speaker: Order, order! I would suggest that the member adhere to the principle of the bill if he can, in his concluding remarks.

Mr. Wells: Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, one point has been mentioned, that in this plan the people will not be represented. I would draw all hon. members' attention to clause three of the bill, which states that the public will be in the majority on the medical services insurance council, which will give the general direction and advisory authority to the hon. Minister on this bill. The public, in conjunction with the doctors and the carriers will have a chance to make this plan work.

I think that the principle of this bill is sound. It is right for these times. It is a prudent measure. It in no way hampers anything that the federal government may do. In effect, it lays plans that could be enlarged if needed. It is a progressive measure and I think that this House should pass it unanimously.

Mr. Trotter: Mr. Speaker, it is now five o'clock. I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow afternoon we will resume this debate.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, could I say that on Friday I announced there would be a night sitting tomorrow night. If some of the hon. members were not here, they might not have known that.

The House adjourned at 5 o'clock, p.m.

Introduction of bills.

Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: Resuming the adjourned debate on the amendment to the motion for second reading of Bill No. 136, An Act respecting medical services insurance.

MEDICAL SERVICES INSURANCE

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, a famous Tory leader of 100 years ago, Benjamin Disraeli, once said that the world is for the few and for the very few. I hear from the Tory government the words: "Hear, hear." The bill that we have before us today shows that in the course of 100 years the Tories have learned nothing; despite all the knowledge, despite their growth of wealth, we find that the Tories, as they have inherited what they have in England, have learned nothing.

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the member that he must discuss the principle of the bill only, and not get on to some other dissertation that has to do with partisanship.

Mr. Trotter: I again point out that it is a principle, a Tory principle that was announced by Disraeli. I want to point out to this House that, once again, this government, under the principle of this bill, perhaps think they are defending the rights of a minority, because the few are the wealthy.

This has been a bill more for the benefit of insurance companies and the Ontario medical association than it has been for the people of the province of Ontario. So that noxious Tory principle is still in this bill, Mr. Speaker, that the world is for the few and for the very few. It is time that we in this province woke up in other things, as well as in health care, that there are more people than just this very few.

The hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond), when he introduced this bill, told us that he had worked for six years on the bill. Well, he has laboured a lot and brought forth very little. Despite his six years of labour, so he tells us, the hon. Minister still comes out and says that we still need to know a good deal about the adequacy of insurance contracts now in force. Or, still flying away in his ignorance, again he says: "We have scant knowledge of how much care is provided for those who have no insurance and cannot pay for their health care."

Mr. Speaker, in Europe since approximately 1880, health insurance has been in existence in various provinces and various countries throughout the world. Minute studies have been made by people in our own country of what is needed and what is required; we even have the much-debated Hall report which has come before us, and still the hon. Minister does not know. I think the truth of it is, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. Minister really does not want to know, nor does the government want to know. When this present Minister of Health went before the Hall commission, he gave a dissertation on how important the private plans were. He set forth a lot of facts about the private insurance plans in Canada and Ontario, and then he summed up his remarks by saying this:

Not only does the foregoing—that is the facts on private plans:

—reflect the tremendous increase in the demand for voluntary health insurance, it might well be considered to indicate that people have confidence in private enterprise in the existing insurance plans.

Mr. Speaker, what choice do the people have when there is no government plan? Obviously they have to turn to a private plan, either the non-profit plan, or those run by the insurance companies.

I wonder if the government, when it seems so anxious to support the principle of private enterprise in health insurance, is aware of all the loopholes in the numerous insurance policies that exist? For example, not so long ago there was a case where the man was injured. He was insured. He was in a wheelchair and he was wheeled around the block, but the policy read that he must be confined to his home. So because he was wheeled around the block in a wheelchair, the plan was cancelled. This is one of the many loopholes.

Or again, you buy a policy to protect yourself for accident insurance, and if you are on a motor cycle and injured, you expect to collect. But you have to read the small print of these so-called free enterprise policies to find that in so many of them, motor cycles are not covered.

So you can go on down the line. The private insurance companies have relatively little interest in health insurance as it is, to say nothing of the loopholes that they have put in their policies over the years.

We might ask why do the insurance companies through their lobby—and believe me it is the most powerful lobby in the province of Ontario and the Dominion of Canada today—why do they insist upon seeking to have the government father such a bill as we have here today? I think it is obvious—it has been mentioned before—for two reasons.

First of all, the insurance companies use these policies—the health insurance policies—as a loss leader. Even though they might not make a profit on them, they want to make sure that nobody else does. In doing this, they are denying the people of the province of Ontario, and the people of Canada, of proper health insurance, and, of course, they are also anxious to keep government out of the insurance business.

Again, one of the major principles that should be in an insurance bill, is that there should be no profit in health insurance. I know the last speaker for the government had the gall to say that Mr. Justice Emmett Hall had twisted the facts on the retention factor. In other words, only the insurance company keeps 28 per cent of the premium dollar. Well, the facts speak well and loud, both in Alberta, and certainly through the investigations of Mr. Justice Hall.

Mr. W. D. McKeough (Kent West): He did not say that facts had been twisted.

Mr. Trotter: He certainly did. He accused him of twisting the facts. The people who are doing the twisting are the Tory government, here in the province of Ontario.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trotter: Why should the people of the province of Ontario be burdened with giving a pay-off to the insurance companies of 28 per cent of their insurance dollar? There is no justification, either in fairness to the people or in honesty, in handling public funds. It is squandering public funds to pay that 28 per cent to the insurance companies. I say that the government is doing a tremendous disservice to the people of this province when they defend this minority, this group of insurance companies, in order that they may make 28 per cent out of the people of the province of Ontario who can least afford to pay it.

In the plan they have brought in, and despite those people the government is going to assist—those in the lower brackets—the insurance companies are going to get some price in the area of $15 million to $25 million extra to start with. I believe that the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. MacDonald) said $20 million.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Trotter: Well, it is somewhere in that range.

I am sorry; the doctors are getting $20 million. The government itself has not told us how much the premium will be so we do not know exactly, but we do know that it is a bonanza of millions of dollars. As this plan expands, as the population expands, it means that the insurance companies are going to get a bigger cut of the pie; money, at 28 per cent, that could be used to buy drugs, that could be used to buy dental services for children—to buy many things. The people who need it least in the province of Ontario are the insurance companies.

All one has to do is look at the big chunks of real estate in the main centres of our large cities to know that they are not suffering one little bit.

Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, we here in the Liberal Party are speaking up for those people who are suffering, and that is the little man who is going to pay his bills and who is making a very small wage. These are the people that we are here to serve and these are the people that the government should be serving, not helping those who already have.

So, Mr. Speaker, although you may object to my phrasing, "the world is for the few, and for the very few," again I point out that they are sticking to their old, hoary, worn, hundred-year-old principle. When the government covers the poor risks—takes them out of the plan—again they help the insurance companies; because any plan should be balanced. It is obvious that the older people are going to join any plan because they are going to need it the most, but any plan should balance the risk across the board and across all our people. In this essential principle, the government again ignores what should be most obvious. What in essence has happened is that the people of the province of Ontario have become pawns in a game of power politics, a game of power politics that is for the benefit of the insurance companies.

Let us take a look at the doctors. Heaven only knows, Mr. Speaker, that we on this side of the House have said that we do not wish to interfere with the practice of medicine in the province of Ontario. We have preached on a fee-for-service basis; we have talked about every man entitled to his own life, his own toothbrush and his own doctor. We have no intention of interfering with that principle, but I cannot understand the narrow mindedness of the Ontario medical association in dealing with this problem of medical coverage.

It has obviously worked in so many countries. Only two years ago the Ontario medical association took a survey among its own members, and I often wonder what the survey said because the OMA has not dared to publish the results. I will venture the suggestion that a very large proportion of the doctors themselves were agreeable to a medical insurance plan, because the average general practitioner knows that so many people like the small wage earner—whether he pays taxes or not—is faced with a real problem when his children, he or his wife are struck with illness and must try to cope with the cost of drugs and the cost of dental bills.

All these things add up. Suppose a man is earning $4,000 a year and he has two or three children, it is ridiculous to say that he can pay $175 for medical bills, his hospital premiums, his dental bills, his drug bills. We in this province are ignoring a basic principle in this bill—that is, the government is ignoring it—and it is this: Our greatest single resource is our people and it is a public responsibility to see to it that our people receive good health; and if they do not have it, they get it as quickly and as cheaply as possible. In an affluent society such as ours—and we are affluent compared to the rest of the world—it is a disgrace that the province of Ontario comes along and says $175 premium, while a much poorer province like Saskatchewan can say $24. Now, why?

Let us be pragmatic about it. Obviously they are making it work and I think we should take a look at what is going on in the rest of Canada. Let us get our head out of the sand, because it is inevitable, in an age of great social reform, that it will roar in like a sea eventually. Yet we have the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) and the hon. Minister of Health, like little boys with their pails and shovels building sand fortresses trying to stop an inevitable tide that will sweep their sand fortresses away. In the meantime the government is wasting the money of the people of this province, and what is even worse, causing untold financial hardship upon thousands of people in the province of Ontario.

We in this province have a tremendous opportunity because we are standing at the crossroads of a great social reform. We have the means in this province to carry out that reform. We have the will and the wish of most of the people; but not the government.

If the government of the province said that they would bring in a universal comprehensive programme, it could be done and we could become literally what we like to call ourselves, the banner province. If Ontario could carry off such a plan, it would be an example not only to the rest of Canada but it would certainly be an example to the world.

This to me is a tragic situation, that we come out with the half-baked bill that we have before this House.

The legislation, again I say, is the result of a well lobbied bill. Certainly the Ontario medical association had a built-in lobby in the present hon. Minister of Health. He has by his utterances over the years shown his opposition to almost any kind of a government-supported programme and no medical insurance programme is going to succeed, Mr. Speaker, in giving the people what they need unless it is supported by government and heavily subsidized by government.

The best plans available today are probably those put out by PSI. Not so long ago, about three years ago, they opened the plan to everybody who needed it regardless of their age. The obvious happened—and this is the difference between voluntary and compulsory—those who needed medical insurance joined, those who did not, the younger people, stayed out. Just look at what happened to PSI when they undertook what was a real good social reform. It shows even the non-profit organizations cannot carry it off successfully without government help.

If we look at PSI over the past two or three years it becomes apparent that private non-profit plans are in serious trouble. PSI made their health plan public and carried on a public enrolment period and offered health insurance without a medical not too long ago. What was the result? All the poor rich signed up, the chronically ill and the aged; and as a result of this PSI's final report for 1964 states:

It has been a year of important decisions, especially regarding the subscription rates, because during the first six months of 1964 there had been $1,800,000 more paid out for medical care than received from subscription income.

I am certain, Mr. Speaker, that all hon. members here must be aware that the rates obviously had to go up. I think they are around $204 for family protection now. They are going to continue to rise as long as you have a system where the sick can join if they want to, and the others can join. It has happened, for example, in British Columbia. British Columbia pioneered hospitalization. They said: "You can join if you like." And what happens? The old and the sick joined, and the healthy stayed out of it. So they had to change the plan. Of course, along came the federal government and all that was wiped out. But they began hospitalization there and showed it did not work. I do not see how you can expect a plan to work when that balance is utterly and completely destroyed.

Let the sick come, naturally; let the healthy stay out. The risk must be spread. It must be comprehensive, or all you are going to do is run into a financial disaster. Even the way in which you administer this bill, trying to determine who you are going to subsidize, is a fantastic web that will eventually choke the plan, because a man's income varies from year to year. What right have we to examine income tax returns? Alberta goes on the honour system—

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Who said we did?

Mr. Trotter: Alberta is having a great deal of difficulty. How are you going to tell? You have no right to, and Alberta has not. Alberta estimates that one per cent cheats, but they depend on the honour system.

Why cannot you have a proper health system, instead of this ridiculous administrative monstrosity that you have forced upon us?

I think, too, that it is regrettable, as I have said before, that the doctors have taken the position they have. I used to think, Mr. Speaker, that they were the most conservative of all the professions—and, let us face it, all professions are very cautious to protect their interest; the doctors are, the lawyers are. I consider the lawyers the most conservative, yet when they have been faced with legal care I have not been impressed with the fact that they have brought forth a good scheme because they realize, as in health and in law, that this business of equality is a lot of nonsense; it is humbug, unless you have the money. There is no doubt in my mind, from what experience I have seen in health or law, that if you have the money you get far better services. I know the doctors like to deny this, and I know there are many doctors who go out of their way, just like many lawyers, to take cases and defend them if it happens to be a case which interests them, or something a bit different. I have seen it happen. I know there are many outstanding doctors. Yet prominent doctors have criticized their own profession—for example, Sir William Osler, who is probably, next to Sir Frederick Banting, the greatest medical man that this country has ever produced. I know the hon. Minister of Health would be aware of the great work of Sir William Osler. Here is a quote from him. No politician said this, but this is what Sir William Osler said: "When a doctor starts talking about principles, you know he is nearly always talking about money."

That comes from one of the men perhaps even greater than Sir Frederick Banting; I do not know. But this is a problem that has hurt the public image of the medical profession, which is a shame. It is true that the average person trusts his own doctor, but of the profession as a whole the public has a distrust. It is unfortunate—it is a calamity, really—that in the province of Ontario at this stage in our history the doctors have allowed the most conservative and most narrow of their men now heading the Ontario medical association to virtually dictate policy. I think they have done a disservice to Ontario.

Mr. Speaker, I just want to dwell a bit more on this retention factor of the insurance companies, because it is not obvious that a company that has heavy operating costs, that is paying commissions, that is competing for business and that has expense accounts, is going to spend far more money than a non-profit plan?

Mr. J. H. White (London South): Is that true of all industries? Should we socialize all industry?

Mr. Trotter: My hon. friend from London, a good insurance town, is maybe a bit concerned about it. But all you have to do is read the Hall report. An example is in hospital insurance, where there is a tremendous amount of research done. The same principle applies to medical insurance. The Blue Cross—

Mr. White: Does the hon. member want to nationalize all types of insurance?

Mr. Trotter: —for hospital insurance returned 95 cents of every premium dollar to the public, while some insurance companies—the worst—returned 41 per cent of the insurance dollar. No wonder we have government hospitalization; no wonder that once government hospitalization came in 99 per cent of the people of Ontario are now in it. Obviously, they are getting their dollar's worth. This is all that we on this side of the House are asking—that the people of the province get a dollar's worth out of any government or any insurance scheme that comes in.

Again, I say that the government, in introducing the bill in the way it is, is squandering the public money to a disgusting extent when they allow private insurance companies to mulct the people of the province of Ontario of 28 cents on every premium dollar.

The present bill before us brings in the means test. We are making second-class citizens of a large proportion of our citizens. The Hall report emphasized that we should subsidize an insurance scheme, not individuals. In subsidizing the scheme, you avoid this business of the means test. So, again, they have ignored all the studies that have gone on for a period of time. When you look at the Hall report, you cannot say it was loaded with radicals or Liberals, when we see Mr. Justice Emmett Hall, Conservative; certainly Senator McCutcheon cannot be called a radical, yet these are the men that have brought out this report.

I remember once reading about Senator McCutcheon, where he was asked how he succeeded in business and he said it was organization, and in looking at the lower right-hand corner of a balance sheet to make sure it was in black.

So a good business man helps come forward with the Hall report. It made economic sense.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: He had nothing to do with its preparation.

Mr. Trotter: Nor has he protested about it. He has never protested about it.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Trotter: So when you get down to creating this type of scheme, where it creates second-class citizens, where we have this administrative monstrosity of trying to decide who is paying taxes, they throw one more thing into this bill, and that is co-insurance. Why this government wants to push co-insurance when, even in Alberta, they have shown that those people who have had an opportunity—

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): What does the hon. member mean, even in Alberta?

Mr. Trotter: Six times the people have preferred the comprehensive scheme to the co-insurance scheme. Three are many studies to show that it is the rich people that use the medical services more than the poor. In fact, the sickness survey made in Canada in the early 1950s, and a survey made not so long ago in the United States, showed that the poor were twice as ill as the rich, and yet those who were better off used medical service twice as much as those who were less well off. In other words, everything was reversed, so that if the hon. Minister and his experts ever took the time to look into these things, they would find that co-insurance is something that will not serve the general public here in the province of Ontario.

The cost is going to fall on the average wage earner, because today, people on welfare are taken care of. The very rich really need not worry, but it is that large segment, literally the backbone of the people in the province of Ontario, and in the Dominion of Canada, that are not protected by this type of insurance bill. These are the people that I feel, through their taxes, are going to have to subsidize the lower 25 per cent and yet get nothing for themselves. As usual, the fellow who is paying his way is left entirely on his own, and this is the shocking weakness in this bill.

This bill, in essence, is a political compromise. It is, more or less, giving a great deal of money to a favoured few—millions to the doctors and the insurance companies, and a few paltry alms more or less thrown to the people who are regarded as peasants. This is, in essence, what the bill is, and this is why it is unjust and unfair.

This bill does not set up an administration that can expand. It is narrow in its outlook, and it does not allow for what inevitably is going to be needed—rehabilitative services and more services for prevention in the field of health services. These things are ignored, and again I emphasize what a tragedy it is for the people of this province, and for the cause of health services in general, that the government has not come to grips with the problem we are faced with in the province of Ontario.

I would like, in summing up, Mr. Speaker, to point out the four weaknesses that I would say are in this bill. It puts real control in the hands of the insurance companies and the doctors, which, when considered that this is really a public operation, is unfair to the people of the province of Ontario.

2. The way we have set up our payments, we are going to squander the public money.

3. The administrative cost—where we have been shown in the Hall report that in some areas you can operate a plan at five cents on the dollar, we now are going to take over a plan that is going to cost 28 cents on the dollar. It is improvident and unfair.

Finally, there is no equality and this is the main thing, because more than just dealing with principle, Mr. Speaker, we are dealing with people, and we are not treating our people equally.

I remember—and this came home to me about three years ago—when I was on a drug committee and we were going through the facilities for treating public patients at the Toronto general hospital. The great argument at that time was the question of drugs, whether to use generic drugs or brand drugs. Most people in the medical profession consider the generic of poorer quality, and it is best to have the brand drugs. I can remember being a 12-year-old over in the public section, waiting to get some treatment—I think I had tonsilitis. Unfortunately, I do not like getting in line, and I do not like charity, the same as anybody else. But at that time, things were at that point. Maybe having a bit of Scottish shrewdness, I hit on a deal with the doctor who examined me and said, “I want to pay for it. Will you take $25?”

Well, he operated on me for $25, so I was not a charity patient. But most of those people in that long line were charity patients, and I was never back there until I was on that drug committee, and we were going through the dispensary, very close to where the patients were sitting. I remember the hon. member for Woodbine (Mr. Bryden) making inquiries of one of the men getting the drugs together, and he pointed out the different drugs they get and said, these are the generic. I remember the smile on his face and the rather cynical shrug of the shoulders. He said, “We give those to those people out there.”

In other words, the people out there who cannot afford to pay, get the cheap stuff. This is what the situation is today, and to me, that incident brings home the need to treat our people in this province as the individual human beings that they are. It is not a question of how much money have they got, or who can pay their bills, but are they getting good health.

And do not let any hon. member in this House, Mr. Speaker, go away believing that there is equality in this province, because there is not. This is why I think it is a tragedy that at a time we have the opportunity to do something, I am disappointed in the hon. Minister of Health. He has been Minister of Health at a time in the history of this province when he could really do something. But instead of that, he has become a political paraplegic, and cannot stand on his legs. They are waving firmly in the breeze at all times on these great principles of health.

The hon. Minister made a great speech way back in 1959 about all he was going to do. If you read that speech today, it seems he has pretty well forgotten about it. He is strictly an apologist for the Tory government. But we on this side of the House are not going to rest until we see the people of this province get the medical and health treatment they deserve; that it is universal, comprehensive treatment, regardless of their state of health and regardless of their means. I hope that hon. members of this House will support the amendment of the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Thompson).

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, this bill has been represented rather differently by its Tory supporters as a step in the right direction. Apparently they themselves do not regard it as an adequate solution to the problem of financing medical care. It has been suggested in other quarters that it is in the nature of half a loaf; that everybody should be prepared to accept it as a step in the right direction on the principle that half a loaf is better than no bread.

I will say, Mr. Speaker, that I am often convinced by that type of argument. I am prepared to settle for something that I think is a step in the right direction, even though it may not go as far as I would like to see it go, and I have done that many times in this House.

I would point out, however, that it is impossible for anyone to do that in this case. This bill is not a step in the right direction, it is a step in the wrong direction. It will close the door to future progress.

It is not half a loaf of bread in place of a whole loaf—which is the most, I suppose, that one could ever hope for from Tories—it is a dried-up crust that the hon. Minister rescued from some unused cupboard in The Department of Health. It offers nothing to the people of the province of Ontario except futility. It represents a tremendous bonanza—as my hon. leader (Mr. MacDonald) pointed out yesterday—for the medical profession and insurance companies, but for the vast majority of the people of Ontario it offers nothing at all.

We do not support that sort of proposition and we will certainly not vote for this bill; we will vote for the amendment.

We will, however, continue to press the government to face the clear facts of the situation. It is possible to withdraw this bill and bring in one that adequately meets the need and is in line with modern thinking as to medical care insurance.

If that should fail—and I hope it will not—we will have many suggestions, I can assure hon. members, to try to make at least half a loaf out of this crust of bread that is now before us. I am not sure that it is possible to do that, but if we are reduced to that necessity we will do our best. We will try first of all to persuade the government to accept a proper bill, and if that fails we will do our best to try to make this into a partially adequate bill, which it is not at present.

I may say, Mr. Speaker, that I am an optimistic soul. I realize that the hon. Minister of Health is normally impervious to logic and common sense, and he may continue to be so in this case. With his dour Scottish nature he may dig his heels in, and the more wrong he is shown to be the further he may dig his heels in. I do not know, but it is possible.

On the other hand, I am a great believer in the educational process. I was encouraged in that belief this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, as I listened to my friend, the hon. member for Parkdale who preceded me in this debate. I think all of us were impressed by his eloquent plea for a complete, comprehensive public medical care insurance programme. There is no doubt as to his conviction on the matter and I think that his speech today shows the value of education. Because only a few years ago, in 1960 to be precise, he proposed in this House a resolution that, “the government establish a province-wide system of comprehensive, prepaid health insurance, including medical and drug expenses.”

Now, Mr. Speaker, it seemed to us in this group that that resolution was a little vague.

So just to make sure that there could be no misunderstanding, my hon. leader moved, seconded by myself, that we make one small amendment in the resolution, namely, to insert the words “government operated.”

Well, that really provoked a storm from the benches to my right. The upshot of it was, without getting into the whole story again, Mr. Speaker, that after blasting us from stem to gudgeon for suggesting a public, comprehensive health insurance programme, they then voted in favour of adjournment of the debate so that the whole thing could be swept under the table and forgotten, and indeed, they voted to have their own resolution shelved by that vote.

As you can see, Mr. Speaker, in the space of five years the educational process has worked quite significantly with my hon. friend from Parkdale.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Stop bickering! Let us stand together on principle, shall we?

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, I am even happy to welcome the hon. member for Sudbury into the ranks of the converted. Those two have finally seen the light on this matter. I look forward to the day when I can also rejoice at the conversion of the hon. Minister of Health. Unfortunately, it would appear that that day may still be some distance removed; but when one considers the progress that our hon. friends on the Liberal benches have made in this matter in the last five years, I think we can hold out hope for the hon. Minister of Health as well.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister of Health did not vouchsafe to this House a speech in moving second reading of the bill. He did, however, make a rather extended statement when he moved first reading. I would suggest that in his statement on first reading he stretched the rules of the House more than a little. He went, I would say, beyond what the rule book describes as “a short explanation of the purport of the bill.”

Mr. A. F. Lawrence (St. George): The hon. member is breaking a rule right now!

Mr. Bryden: Not that I know of.

I would say, Mr. Speaker, that one would have been prepared to tolerate a rather extended statement by the hon. Minister on first reading of so important a bill as this. The only trouble is that there was no explanation given in his statement at all, as others in this debate have already pointed out. He did not explain the purport of the bill. He did not take advantage of the opportunity, as I think we would have all been prepared to concede he might have done whether the rules permitted it or not, to give the factual basis, the results of the research on which his bill was drawn. There was none of that.

On all the critical points, he said that although he had been studying this matter for some years he still had not found the answer. He was bringing forward the bill, he said, without knowing exactly what the factual basis for it was. In particular, he did not even have the courtesy to give to the House—and he still has not given to the House, even though we are now debating the principle of the bill—the scale of subsidy that will be involved for the group whose taxable income is between zero and $1,000. He gave us a table that he said was illustrative of how the subsidization of premiums will work. It was just illustrative. Surely, he could now, he should by now, he ought to be able to by now, to give us the precise facts on this.

Has he not even studied the matter? It is rather interesting, Mr. Speaker, that he cut the table off at a taxable income of $400, he did not extend it beyond that point. I think it is obvious why he did not, even if the table was just tentative. Once he got up around $900 or $1,000, we would have discovered that the amount that the individual will have to pay under this bill, if this table is even close to right, is about $170 a year.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): A piece of deception.

Mr. Bryden: He was quite happy when he was talking about people with taxable incomes of between nothing and $70, who will have to pay only $10 with the government paying the rest. But he was not prepared to put in cold print the fact that a person with, shall we say, between $900 and $1,000 in taxable income, will have to pay something like $165 to $175 in medical insurance premiums.

Now, I am suggesting to the hon. Minister, Mr. Speaker—and I will have more to say about this on other occasions—that he should reconsider this whole proposition. A person with a taxable income of $1,000 a year or $900 a year simply cannot afford to pay $165, $170 or $175 a year for medical insurance; particularly for the incomplete medical insurance offered in this bill. He cannot afford to do it.

The hon. Minister, if he is going to stick by this bill, should at least reconsider the whole basis of subsidization. He should think in terms of subsidization up to, I would say, a taxable income of $3,000 a year.

Take a person's taxable income as $1,000 a year. Now, just who would that be? A family of a husband and wife and two children would have a taxable income of $1,000 if they were earning a miserable $3,700 a year. Now, a family in that situation simply cannot afford medical care insurance at the sort of prices the hon. Minister has in mind. Those people will be excluded completely from medical care insurance by the sheer fact that they will not be able to afford it.

However, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to dwell particularly on the information the hon. Minister did not give us. Frankly, it would fill volumes. But I would like to spend a little time on some of the things he did say.

He did not give any information to speak of at all. It was not the type of speech that was appropriate on first reading. It was, indeed, factious and tendentious from beginning to end. It was the sort of speech that should have been made on second reading.

I regret the tendency that the Ministers of the Crown seem to have developed, of not making speeches introducing their bills on second reading, they make their whole speech, mostly out of order, on first reading. I think that they should follow the rules and get into the debate along with the rest of us, and make their statements at the proper time.

At any rate, this was an argumentative type of statement, not based on sound arguments, that could appropriately have been made on second reading and was completely out of order on first reading. It is significant, however, Mr. Speaker, in that it indicates the line of Tory propaganda, not the arguments. There is no argument here at all, only propaganda. It is the line the Tories followed during the last election campaign, when they had another inadequate bill halfway through the House, one that even they discarded. It is the same line they are now following, and it is a line that is not designed to throw light on the subject, but deliberately to confuse the issue, and to divert attention from the issues that are really at stake.

For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I think it is worth exploding some of the mythology that the hon. Minister tried to put forward in his introductory statement while we have the opportunity. Therefore, I am going to refer to some of the main points he made in that introductory statement.

He said, first of all, that the greatest single step with regard to health care was taken by the government of this province on January 1, 1959, when the Ontario hospital care insurance programme came into operation. He said: "This programme was founded on certain principles which have proved sound, workable and successful, principles from which we have never departed." That is a quote from the hon. Minister.

He then went on to say, as he tried to indicate when that other ill-fated bill was before the House a few years ago, that this new bill on medical care insurance is based on the same principles as the hospital care insurance programme. That was the burden of a good part of his introductory statement: He is following exactly the same principles as were followed in the hospital care insurance programme. Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that an hon. Minister of the Crown would make a statement that is so clearly wrong. This bill that is now before us is not, in any sense of the word, based on the principles of the hospital care insurance programme.

Let us just take the principles of the hospital programme. The hon. Minister said, by a very quick twist of the tongue, that the hospital programme was based on the principle of voluntary coverage, just as this bill he now has before us is so based. He knows as well as I do that that is not true, and I am surprised that he made such a statement in the House.

The hospital insurance programme involved compulsory coverage for more than half of the population. The recent reports of the hospital services commission do not segregate the compulsorily covered groups, so it is impossible to say at this stage how many of the people now covered by the hospital plan are in the compulsory groups. But looking at the figures, it would appear that at least 60 per cent are in the compulsory groups.

The hon. Minister glossed over that point, trippingly shall we say, when he said, speaking of the hospital plan:

Coverage is non-compulsory except for employee groups and this was done to ensure continuity of protection for those who over the years had had hospital care insurance in their wage and salary contracts.

The hon. Minister knows perfectly well that that was not why it was done at all. If that was the reason, then why does he not do the same thing in the medical bill? There are even more now covered by medical insurance in their wage and salary contracts than were covered by hospital insurance in those days.

The reason there was compulsory coverage for about 60 per cent of the population in the hospital insurance plan was in order to diversify risks, and to provide a base which would prevent adverse selection and thus make the plan unworkable. That is why it was done.

We in this group—I was not in the House at the time—but this party objected to it being made compulsory for some people and not for others. There is no question that the reason it was made compulsory for a large percentage of the population was in order to diversify risks and make a workable plan.

So let us end this nonsense that the hospital plan is a voluntary plan. It is no such thing. It was a compulsory plan from the beginning for a majority of the population, a large enough group to make it workable.

The hon. Minister also said that this bill is similar to the hospital insurance plan, in that it is a public plan available to everyone. Well, I will agree with him in his description of the hospital plan—it is and was a public plan operated by a public commission, and protection is available to everyone. It is compulsory for 60 per cent of the people and available on a voluntary basis for the remaining 40 per cent, most of whom have now seen the value of the plan and have enrolled in it.

But what is proposed in this bill is not available to anybody except the very poor—the 1,800,000 in this province who are so poor that they do not pay any income tax at all or have a taxable income of not more than $1,000. It is not available to anyone else. If the hon. Minister really believes in the principles of the hospital insurance plan, why does he not follow those principles? Why does he not make his plan available to anyone who wants to take it? Why does he not consider providing a solid base to diversify risks, so that coverage can be provided cheaply, rather than in a very expensive form, as is now proposed here? Why does he not open this up?

I venture to suggest that if he did, in fact, follow the principles of the hospital insurance legislation, there would, within five or ten years, be practically one hundred per cent coverage, just as there is practically one hundred per cent coverage under the hospital plan. But that is not true under this bill, because unless one is in a deprived group, with so little income that he pays little or no income tax, he cannot get under the public aspect of the plan at all. What is particularly regrettable, we cannot bring in people with lower morbidity rates than those in the lower income groups, so as to reduce the costs of the plan.

Related to this phony argument that the hon. Minister presented in his introductory statement, is a further one that he set forth on page five of the mimeographed version of his statement, in which he said, and I am now quoting:

We have provided in this bill that medical services insurance will be:

1. Available to all, regardless of age, state of past or present health or financial status.

Now that statement is completely false, Mr. Speaker. He has not ensured that medical insurance services will be available to all at all. He has ensured that it will be available to the very poor, one million who pay no income tax and 800,000—not all of the 800,000 but a certain number—who pay very little income tax.

Mr. L. M. Reilly (Eglinton): Anybody can buy it.

Mr. Bryden: As my hon. friend from Eglinton says, anybody can buy it. But just as I said in relation to the hon. Minister's previous bill, Cadillacs are available to everybody in this province; anybody can buy them. I am sure that the Addison dealership over on Bay Street or wherever it is would be tickled to death to provide you with a Cadillac if you gave it $7,000 or $10,000, or whatever the amount may be.

Under the hon. Minister's bill, medical services insurance will be available to everyone in exactly the same way as Cadillacs are available to everyone, except for the very poor. It will be available to the very poor, and even though the hon. Minister has chosen the most costly method possible for achieving that purpose, I am glad he has achieved that, at least. In his earlier legislation, the hon. Minister had not even achieved that much, but once we get beyond the people in dire poverty, it is simply not available to the majority of the people, because it will cost too much. They will continue to be priced out of the market. Unless they are in employee groups, where the employer pays all or part of the cost, they will continue to have no coverage. And yet, Mr. Speaker, they will contribute, through their taxes, to provide coverage for other people.

I think the taxation system should be used, as an instrument for redistribution of wealth, but I do not think it should be used to make certain people pay for benefits for other people that they cannot afford to buy for themselves. If the hon. Minister said that we should all chip in and help to provide coverage for everyone, I would be for it. But that means coverage for everyone, not just for a few privileged groups at the bottom and the top of the income scale.

The hon. Minister then went on to say a little later in the same statement that Ontario is the province with the highest ratio of voluntary medical insurance in Canada. He said "some 76.5 per cent are already covered, and a further 7.3 per cent have special coverage, so that some 83.8 per cent of the people of Ontario are covered at the present time."

The hon. Minister did not do any research to arrive at those figures; he just produced, holus bolus, without any criticism at all, the figures presented by the Canadian health insurance association. That is the type of figure it has been palming off on the public for years, and it is a most misleading figure. I think that the hon. Minister should do what he admitted in his statement he has not done—that is, study the adequacy of the coverage that this 76.5 to 83.8 per cent is getting. Because without some analysis of that, the figures are completely meaningless.

Other people have undertaken some analysis of these claims, and I think it is worth referring to, at least, some studies that have been made on this subject. I would certainly not go into all of them, because there are many, and it would take a long time to deal with them all. But I will deal with some of them. For example, I would like to refer to some portions of the brief that the Ontario federation of labour presented to the Hagey commission a year ago January. They took the claim of the health insurance association that a large percentage—the figure was not exactly the same as here—of the people are now covered under private plans, and went into some detail as to what that meant. I want to read a portion from the brief they presented to the Hagey commission. Apparently the hon. Minister did not read that brief, because he does not show that he has been affected by it at all. But this is what the federation discovered by an analysis of these claims:

The following case histories were selected by the Canadian health insurance association in its submission to the Royal commission on health services—that is the Hall commission:

—in 1962. Therefore they can safely be assumed to reflect the insurance industry in its best light.

I think that it is a fair assumption that the cases that the Canadian health insurance association itself selected were representative of the kind of coverage it was providing.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: What are you reading from?

Mr. MacDonald: The OFL brief to the Hagey commission.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Is he reading something from the brief?

Mr. Bryden: I read a paragraph from the brief, and now I am making some comments of my own. I always want to make sure that the hon. Prime Minister is enlightened, so I will be happy to stop at any time.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, I can only say I am very interested, and that is why I really want to know what he is saying.

Mr. Bryden: I will read it very slowly, then, because it is interesting.

As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, I think it is fair to assume, as the federation did, that the cases that the health insurance association itself selected do not reflect unfavourably on the insurance industry. Here are some of them, as summarized by the federation of labour:

In claim number four of company "A", the patient was left to cover $198 out of a bill of $599.80, or almost one third of the total.

In claim number six, of the same company, the subscriber was required to pay $2,664 out of a total bill of $8,950, or almost 30 per cent of the total.

And if I may interject, Mr. Speaker, enough to break most people.

Mr. Reilly: That is co-insurance, though.

Mr. Bryden: These were the policies these people were selling. They were taken as representative by the companies themselves.

Another instance in company "C", example one, is an illness of long duration. The insured had to pay $2,483 out of a total of $10,621, or slightly in excess of 23 per cent of the total bill.

Claim number two required that the insured pay out $1,517 of a bill for $5,832, or 26 per cent.

A tabulation of all the cases cited by the association reveals the extent to which a subscriber up to this moment may be financially liable. Of the 45 examples provided by the association, in only four cases did the carrier cover the total cost incurred. In 21 cases, the insured was left to pay more than 20 per cent of the total cost and in another eight cases between 10 and 20 per cent of the cost.

They give further details, but I think that illustrates my point, Mr. Chairman. The significant figure is not the one the hon. Minister persistently cites, namely, the number of people or the percentage of people who might have some sort of coverage.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Do you not think anybody should pay anything?

Mr. Bryden: The significant fact, I believe, in a health insurance plan under which people should—

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Nobody should pay anything.

Mr. Bryden: I do not believe that a man should have to pay—

Hon. Mr. Roberts: That is what the hon. member is saying.

Mr. Bryden: I do not believe a man should have to pay $2,600 for medical bills after he has paid a high premium, presumably to give him protection. I would think, if the hon. Prime Minister would stop and think about it, he would consider that it would be a good idea to provide, as we do in our hospital plan, that after a person pays a certain premium—and we can discuss on other occasions the nature of the premium—his bills should be covered in toto, and not—

Mr. MacDonald: The same principle—

Mr. Bryden: I would object violently to the hospital plan, if a man with a long illness who incurred a hospital bill of $10,000 was then presented with a personal bill of $2,500. I am happy, even though I believe there are some defects in our current hospital plan, that at least that vicious principle is not included in it. But this is what is involved in the 76.5 to 83.8 per cent that the hon. Minister refers to as being covered. I may say that there is probably a substantial amount of double counting in those figures, too, but I will not go into it. I have studied the reports issued by the association, and there is no indication that any effort has been made to eliminate double counting. How much it is impossible to say; one would have to study the actual records to find out. Undoubtedly there is some. But what is even more important is that all the hon. Minister means is that a certain percentage of the people get some coverage. I think it would be wise to take a look at what the Hall commission had to say about this.

At the time it made its study, it noted that, taking the whole country: "10,675,000 Canadians had some form of medical insurance or prepayment coverage"—the sort of figures the health insurance association loves to cite.

"But," said the Hall commission a few pages later, "of these the coverage held by nearly three million is totally inadequate."

It made an analysis in Table 18-2, on page 731 of volume 1 of the report, of the amount of protection that these so-called "covered" people got. It found this in the overall picture, although we talk about the large percentage of the people who are covered by some sort of medical insurance contract, the Hall commission's estimate was that the claims actually paid, which is surely a more meaningful figure, represented only a little more than 40 per cent of the liabilities for medical expenses incurred by the people of Canada. And that was probably an underestimate. I will admit that this figure is a couple of years out-of-date now; it is also a Canadian average, it does not apply specifically to Ontario. I will admit that, but we have been given no figures along this line—the really significant point—by the hon. Minister. The best we can do is to work on the basis of the partial figures that have been worked out by other people investigating the field. These other figures indicate that the claim the hon. Minister has made, and that he loves to repeat, about the percentage who have some sort of medical insurance coverage is grossly misleading, to say the least; it does not represent the true picture at all.

Mr. Speaker, we come to the pièce de résistance of the hon. Minister's statement, the good old moss-backed Toryism of our friend, the hon. Minister of Health, the diversion, the attempt to create a duststorm so as to confuse the issue and conceal from as many people as possible what the real issue is.

An hon. member: But not from you.

Mr. Bryden: He says in his most resounding period on page 10 of his mimeographed statement:

Some believe that governments should regiment the people, deciding what is best for them and imposing the decision upon them by compulsion. Others, and we subscribe to this [that means the government] believe the same objective can be obtained without compulsion.

This is the old worn out Tory red herring—

Hon. Mr. Roberts: We want some disposable income left.

Mr. Bryden: This is the old red herring that smells to high heaven that has been dragged back and forth across the path so many times it is a mystery that they have the gall to drag it across once again. I may say that it was the same old red herring that for 15 years was dragged across the path with regard to hospital insurance. Now we get it again.

Is the hon. Minister suggesting that, to take one example, Chief Justice Emmett Hall, of the Supreme Court of Saskatchewan, believes that governments should regiment the people? Does he seriously believe that? Does he believe that any of the people who served on the Royal commission on health services, appointed by the Diefenbaker administration in Ottawa, really believe in regimenting the people? I do not think the hon. Minister of Health believes such a thing at all. If he does, he is even further beyond hope than I had thought.

Does he believe it is regimentation to have compulsory school attendance laws?

Mr. White: That is a foolish analogy.

Mr. Bryden: This is a very sound analogy. We say that education is a basic matter, and I say that health is a basic matter. I can agree that there is a basis for argument as to whether education and health are analogous; obviously, they are not completely analogous. I say that they are sufficiently analogous that the same sort of principle should apply in this field.

Mr. White: The hon. member wants to force everybody into the mould shaped by his own biases.

Mr. Bryden: But, you see, if we try to argue the case, which I think is at least arguable, that there is a clear analogy between health and education in their basic importance to the community—

Mr. White: Is the hon. member going to force everybody to go to church?

Mr. Bryden: You see, we get the old Tory red herring that some people believe in regimentation; that we are trying to regiment everybody. Every time we try to drag these fellows one step more into the 20th century they scream "regimentation!" Of course, they have been doing it for a long time and I suppose they will continue to do it. There is nothing that hurts a Tory more than a new idea. They have been resisting this new idea for as long as I can remember—

Mr. White: This session disproves that idea.

Mr. Bryden: But I have observed in the past that in time they can learn to bear their hurt. They did finally go along with—

Mr. White: There's more to come.

Mr. Bryden: Even Strachan went along with the idea of public education ultimately. They went along with the idea of public hospital insurance, but they are still kicking and screaming against the logical extension of that principle. They claim that anybody who argues this principle wants to regiment the people; they are not willing to consider it on its merits. No, they have to attack the people making the argument. Well, let it be borne in mind, Mr. Speaker, that they are now attacking such people as Chief Justice Emmett Hall.

I may say, and it is public knowledge, that prior to his appointment to the bench, Chief Justice Hall, when he was a practising lawyer, was a well-known and prominent Conservative, one of the leading Conservatives in the province of Saskatchewan.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Very good judgment.

Mr. Bryden: He is an extremely good judge, and he was, according to my amateur assessment, an extremely good lawyer before he was appointed to the bench.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Good judgment, I said.

Mr. Bryden: He was certainly regarded as one of the best in the province of Saskatchewan. He is a man of intelligence and common sense. Naturally, now that he is on the bench he has no association with party politics, but I think we can still say that he is a man of conservative temperament, using a small "c" on that word. I think that would be a fair description of him; I suspect it is one that he himself would agree with. He was appointed, as we all know, by a Conservative government at Ottawa to head a commission to investigate this whole matter. Unfortunately, the government of Ontario never did bother to investigate the matter. If they had, they might have been persuaded by the logic of the facts, just as Chief Justice Hall and his associates were, because once they got into the facts and began to study what the true situation was, they changed their own minds. They said that they have done that. They found that they could not support the sort of nonsense that the hon. Minister has put forward in this bill on the basis of any comprehensive and impartial analysis of the facts.

I think it is worth putting into the record just what the commission did say on this point. I will try to avoid reading more than is necessary, but I think there are some points that should be made. Remember that this is a commission appointed by a Tory government, and most of them are Tories. I know that hurts the hon. Prime Minister quite a lot—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: It does not hurt me a bit—

Mr. Bryden: You have been deserted by the only—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, I think that it is one of the hon. member's red herrings, that is all. It is a red herring if he calls this a Tory report.

Mr. Bryden: I can sympathize with him; he is being deserted by more and more people. He is standing in splendid isolation advocating an out-of-date idea that even Tories cannot support when they study the matter. Here is what the commission had to say on page 742 of volume 1 of its report:

The commissioners were basically sympathetic to the views of those who believe full-scale government action to be unnecessary in the health services field. Like most Canadians, we suspect, we are opposed to change simply for the sake of change.

There is a good Tory statement to begin with.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Does the hon. member not agree with it?

Mr. Bryden: I do not agree with the first sentence but I agree with the second. I am opposed to change simply for the sake of change. I disagree with the original assessment that full-scale government action is unnecessary, but they frankly admitted that that was the predilection with which the commission started. Then they went on to say:

Accordingly, we examined hopefully—Hopefully!

—the central feature in the health insurance association and Canadian medical association proposals—

They do not mention the proposal made by the hon. Minister of Health of this province, but he was in the same company:

—we examined hopefully the central feature in these proposals . . . that the great majority of Canadians could, and would, become insured through their own means, and that the government would need to assist only a relatively small number.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the House if it has heard statements like that anywhere else, besides in the briefs presented to the Hall commission. This is the line the government has been palming off—I think with declining conviction—for as long as it has discussed this matter. It is the old line of the Canadian medical association and the Canadian health insurance association. But returning to the Hall report:

The health insurance association, for example, states that the borderline for determining who will need subsidy should be drawn where the income tax legislation draws it now. That is, anyone now paying income tax is deemed able to pay his full premiums, and only those who do not pay income tax fall in the "medically indigent" category and therefore require subsidy.

This, with one modification, is exactly the principle of the bill that is now before us and, as the Hall commission said:

Unfortunately the problem is not that simple. The main reason, as we have said, is that the Canadian people are concerned, not with paying for physicians' services alone, but with meeting the cost of the full range of services necessary for comprehensive health care. That is, in ascertaining ability to pay without subsidy, we must consider not only the premium for medical and surgical care as proposed in the two submissions mentioned above, but also hospital care insurance already being paid, for example, $78 per family per year in Ontario [And the hon. Minister wants to tack another $170 on top of that] and as well as for dental care, optical services and nursing. After more than 35 years of endeavour on the part of the voluntary plans and commercial insurance companies, only slightly more than one-half the population of Canada has any degree of voluntary insurance protection, and this for medical services alone.

The commission goes on to discuss private plans which I have already mentioned.

I hardly expect that anything I say would convince the hon. Minister of Health, but I am hopeful that he might one day open this report and read it, and let the facts speak to him.

I am going to read a little more from the report, on page 743, where the commission says:

Our reasoning is as follows:

1. That the method of subsidy should be one that subsidizes the insurance fund, rather than one that subsidizes individuals.

Precisely what my hon. leader was proposing in the plan he offered to this House two or three years ago, and repeated in shorter form yesterday.

2. That reliance on the method of voluntary insurance would be unnecessarily slow and inevitably incomplete.

3. That the number of individuals who would require subsidy to meet total health services costs is so large that no government could impose the means test procedure on so many citizens, or would be justified in establishing a system requiring so much unnecessary administration.

This is another point that the hon. Minister has not faced up to. He does not propose in this bill to subsidize nearly all the people who will require subsidization under his way of doing things.

3. Continued: The health services will make enough demand on our resources. We must not waste them.

4. That, so far as the issue of compulsion is concerned—

Now I would ask the hon. Minister to listen carefully to this:

—we believe that as long as decisions of this kind are made by democratically elected Legislatures, as long as they provide only basic essentials—for example, standard ward hospital care—and assure citizens free choice of physician and hospital and free choice of additional items against which they may insure through private arrangements, then we have confidence that our democratic ideals will not only be protected, but, in fact, more fully realized. It is of great significance for a democratic society such as ours that The Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act was passed by a unanimous vote of the House of Commons representing all political parties.

5. That the health insurance fund in each province should be administered by one agency in order to achieve full integration and effective planning of all health services, and thus to obtain the most efficient administration of all sectors of the proposed health services programme. We have recommended that the existing hospital insurance programme be administered by the same agency in each province as administers all personal health services. This necessarily means rejection of any proposal that one phase of health services, namely, payment of physicians' services, be administered by a separate agency.

Mr. Speaker, it would be hard to envisage a more effective condemnation of the bill than the hon. Minister has put before us than that passage I have just read from the report of this distinguished commission. I want to quote just one more portion from this report, and that is on page 745:

—the decision which Canadians have to make, assuming that they accept the claim of the health insurance industry that it can provide universal coverage, is whether they wish to pay $1,020 million for physicians' services in 1971 for a programme administered by the insurance agencies, or $837 million for a programme administered by government agencies.

Apart from anything else, Mr. Speaker, I think that hits the nail right on the head. The figures used here were in terms of Canada, but my hon. leader gave similar figures in relation to Ontario. The question asked by the Hall commission, as its parting shot, was, in effect: Do we want to subsidize the insurance industry to the tune of nearly $200 million a year as far as the whole of Canada is concerned? Do we want to hand out—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: That is absolute nonsense.

Mr. Bryden: The hon. Prime Minister suggests that the only people in Canada who really studied the matter ended up with absolute nonsense. Well, it is unfortunate that he has closed his mind to mature consideration, and merely wishes to protect his prejudices by describing as nonsense what is unquestionably an authoritative study, infinitely more comprehensive than anything his people have ever undertaken. This is the final point of the Hall commission and one I would like to repeat here:

How long are we going to go on subsidizing insurance companies, instead of providing health services for the people of the province?

Mr. MacDonald: A good question.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, I would now like to take the bill itself and some features of it. I will not attempt to deal with matters that can be considered in committee of the whole House, but apart from the very broad questions of principle that I have dealt with, I think, even within the four walls of the bill, some extremely bad principles are enunciated that the government might very well consider before this bill gets to committee of the whole. For example—

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the member not to get into the precise details of any clauses of the bill in his remarks.

Mr. Bryden: I will try to avoid that. Sometimes it is difficult when one is discussing a principle to avoid a specific reference, but what I would like to deal with really are some of the main outlines of the bill.

The basic principle we have here is that the control over the cost that is going to have to be paid by the people of Ontario—through their taxes for subsidies paid under this bill, and through premiums when they buy from insurance companies—is really left wholly, or almost wholly, in the hands of the insurance companies and the medical profession. Apart from any other criticism I have made of the bill, this is essentially what the government is laying down, that these groups can write their own ticket. The bill says that payments for the standard contract will be—for the subsidized groups, and this will undoubtedly become the model for the voluntary plan—in accordance with 100 per cent of the fee schedule of the Ontario medical association.

I will not repeat what my hon. leader said about this yesterday, but this is handing an enormous melon to the medical profession. They have never contemplated that they would get 100 per cent of the fee schedule for people in the lowest income groups. In fact, they do not get 100 per cent in the plan that is now in effect in the province of Saskatchewan for the whole of the population. They get 85 per cent of the fee schedule there, and they are making more money than they ever made in their lives before. In fact, their average incomes, I think, went up about $2,000 or $3,000 after the plan came into effect on the basis of 85 per cent of the fee schedule.

Yet the hon. Minister comes along and says that he is going to give them 100 per cent.

What is even worse, Mr. Speaker, is the point I am at this stage mainly interested in. The bill will let the doctors determine what they will be paid, and we on the public side will have to accept whatever the doctors arrive at.

They set their fee schedule, we have to pay it out of taxpayers' money in the case of the subsidized group.

There are some limitations on this, but mighty few. As a matter of fact, the bill now provides that payments will be according to the fee schedule in effect at the time the bill comes into effect, an open invitation to the medical profession to jack up its fee schedule between the time the bill is passed and the time it comes into effect. Then they will be restricted for two years, but beyond that, they will be able to set their fees at anything they like, and we will have to pay.

The hon. Minister, in his introductory statement, referred to difficulties that had been encountered in France, Belgium, Italy and Britain. I believe the difficulties have been more or less solved in negotiations with the doctors. I think we should all recognize that whenever negotiations are involved there may be difficulties. But there will not be any difficulties under the hon. Minister's bill. The doctors are not going to complain when they can simply say whatever they want; they can write their own ticket; they can requisition the public Treasury for whatever they want.

They are not going to complain about that. In fact, I would think there would be no industrial disputes in this country and The Department of Labour could wind up its conciliation services if employees were authorized to say what their wages would be without any reference to anybody else.

Yet this is precisely what the government proposes here—let the doctors say exactly what they are going to get. There will be no difficulties, but I would suggest to the government that they ought to think of that again.

The government is going to set up a council—I have forgotten the precise name, but it does not matter—which is going to be responsible for—

Mr. Reilly: Medical services insurance council.

Mr. Bryden: Medical services insurance council, my friend, the hon. member for Eglinton says. It is going to advise on maximum premiums, open enrolment periods, form and content of standard contracts, and so on—in fact, everything of significance under the legislation is going to go before this group. How is it to be set up? The bill provides that there will be nine members. Five, it says, in very general terms, will be representatives of the public; there is no suggestion as to how those public representatives are to be named, or what their credentials will be, they are just described as public representatives. But we have it very clearly set forth that two of the members will be named by the medical association, and two of them by the insurance companies. So four of the nine will be straight advocates and lobbyists of the medical profession—

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Did you not say that five of the nine will be appointed from the general public?

Mr. Bryden: I just said it. I said it was stated very vaguely—

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Four of the nine will represent the medical profession.

Mr. Bryden: I indicated, first of all, how the five will be appointed. I would like to come back to that, if the hon. Prime Minister will allow me the privilege of doing so.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I am sorry. I listen patiently, but occasionally I just have to interject, Mr. Speaker, and I apologize. Occasionally I have to interject, but I recognize that you must put the emphasis where you want your argument to go. But when I sit here and listen, I sometimes see the other side. So I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member; I am enjoying his speech, but I just noticed that instead of saying five of nine represent the citizens he said four of nine represented the medical profession and the insurance companies.

Mr. Bryden: I do not want to quibble with the hon. Prime Minister. I think if the record is checked he will notice that I said first that five will be designated as public representatives, and I assure him that I want to say a little more about those five. But I wanted, first of all, if he will bear with me for one moment, to say again that four of them—and this surely is beyond dispute—will be appointed by the medical profession—

Hon. Mr. Roberts: The minority.

Mr. Bryden: Four of the nine. My arithmetic is almost as good as the hon. Prime Minister's, but I will accept his statement that four of nine is a minority—but just barely a minority. Four of the nine will be appointed by the medical profession and the insurance industry. And, of course, Mr. Speaker—and I am sure that the hon. Prime Minister with his great knowledge of arithmetic will follow me on this point—

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, if I may just set the record straight. The reason I belabour this point a little bit is that the hon. leader of the Opposition, in his speech yesterday, missed this point completely and said that the majority of that group would be representing the medical profession and the insurance industry; these men he uses for research had not done it very well, and he was wrong.

Mr. Bryden: I am sure the hon. leader of the Opposition will take responsibility for his own statements. I have no doubt that if that is what he said, he would be prepared to correct it.

However, I was going to say, Mr. Speaker, that all of us know enough arithmetic to know that if those four can capture just one more, they have got a majority, and I would emphasize again that there is no basis, nothing in the bill, that suggests how the additional people are to be appointed. They are to be whomever the hon. Minister of Health, I take it, or the Cabinet, considers to be representative of the public.

Well, from my observations to date of people whom they consider to be representative of the public, I would not even figure that the public would have more than one or two out of the nine. They might ask the O.F. of L. to submit a panel of names. They might ask the Ontario federation of agriculture to submit a panel of names. That would give us a couple of public representatives, Mr. Speaker.

Then, I suspect, the others would be retired doctors, or nurses, or people like that, or perhaps actuaries, or representatives of the Canadian manufacturers association.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Would you like to appoint them? I suppose this is what you would like?

Mr. Bryden: No, I would not like to appoint them at all, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: You would have to take the responsibility then.

Mr. Bryden: I expect my colleagues will, in the not-too-distant future, be over there in the position where they will be able to appoint them. I would not personally be anxious to participate in the appointment.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bryden: But I think that the bill should set forth, just as precisely as it does for the medical and insurance companies, who these public people are to be, and where they are to come from. Why do we not say that the Ontario federation of labour will name two, the Ontario federation of agriculture will name two and the consumers' association of Canada will name one? Something like that. Let us see exactly where they are going to come from. The qualifications have been set forth very clearly for the other people. I have no confidence at all, Mr. Speaker, that even the administration of this bill will be—

Mr. R. M. Whicher (Bruce): Will the Progressive-Conservative association appoint any?

Mr. Bryden: I suspect that a substantial number of them will have been passed by the Progressive-Conservative association.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): A substantial number of the population is Progressive-Conservative, of course.

Mr. Bryden: There will, however, undoubtedly be one New Democratic Party member to make it look good.

Mr. G. H. Peck (Scarborough Centre): That is about all you can find.

Mr. Bryden: I have found quite a few in my constituency.

Mr. Reilly: One has to get away from Woodbine to find out—

Mr. Bryden: There are also quite a few up in your constituency.

Mr. Speaker, I would like now to summarize some of the major points which we find objectionable in the bill and which are so completely objectionable as to make the bill totally unacceptable. I will not deal with all of them, but I would like to summarize one or two.

Primarily, Mr. Speaker, it is a social security plan for insurance companies and the medical profession. For the overwhelming majority of the people, it will mean inadequate insurance protection at high premiums, and an excessively high charge on their tax dollar to provide protection for subsidized groups. The government plans to accept full responsibility for a million people, plus part of an additional 800,000 who are so poor that they pay little or no income tax. It is well known that the sickness rate among the poor is much higher than for other people. Thus, the government is relieving the insurance companies of the high-risk group so that they can declare open season on the rest of the population.

This segregation of the poor will mean that the cost of providing them with protection will be higher than if the risks were averaged across the whole community. Thus, the taxpayer will have to pay far more than is necessary to protect this group. Moreover, the high cost of protecting the poor will undoubtedly become the yardstick for setting the rates to be charged by insurance companies to the rest of the people. The taxpayer will not only have to pay higher taxes than necessary to protect the poor; he will also have to pay unnecessarily high premiums if he wants insurance protection for himself. What is equally bad is that he will get inadequate protection.

The proposed standard insurance contract, which we can deal with in greater detail in committee, is riddled with exceptions and loopholes, and there will continue to be all the fol-de-rol of enrolment periods and waiting periods. This, I think, is one of the great tragedies of this half-baked plan the hon. Minister is putting before us. We still have to go through all this nonsense of enrolment periods and waiting periods, all of which would be eliminated in a universal plan.

We should not, however, conclude that the insurance companies will be the main beneficiaries of the proposed legislation. We should look at the melon—I will not go into it in detail, because my hon. leader did it yesterday—that is being handed on a platter to the doctors. The government is planning to pay 100 per cent of the Ontario medical association schedule of fees for medical services provided to the poor. As my hon. leader said yesterday, this probably means we are handing the doctors about $20 million free, gratis and for nothing—the group that is already the highest-paid in the community. I do not begrudge the medical profession the high rates of remuneration they receive; I think that they earn such scales of remuneration by both hard work and by a high standard of qualifications and responsibility. I do not begrudge them their high incomes, Mr. Speaker. But let us bear in mind that they are already the highest-paid group in the community. Why should we be collecting taxes from people with 20 per cent, 25 per cent, 30 per cent of the income that doctors are getting to give them a great big melon that they do not need? I am surprised if they are so greedy that they want it.

This is probably the most objectionable feature in this bill. It cannot be considered in any sense a medicare bill, a bill to provide for medical care insurance; it does not do any such thing. It provides for certain subsidization of certain groups, but mainly subsidization of doctors and insurance companies. But what is particularly objectionable is the redistribution of income that is going to take place under it, from the poor and the average income people, to some of the wealthiest groups in the community.

Mr. Speaker, as I said at the outset, we oppose the bill absolutely. We will vote against it at every opportunity that presents itself. However, we will, as we always do, if by some great stroke of misfortune it should be approved in principle in this House, try to clean out some of the most objectionable features contained in it, and do our best to assist the government to make at least a half-loaf measure out of this pitiful crust it is now offering.

Mr. R. J. Harris (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, when one has been privileged to sit in this Legislature, as I have, for a comparatively short time, it is very interesting to note the flip-flop that takes place with some of our friends in the Opposition. I am sorry my hon. friend from Parkdale is not in his seat at the moment. But as short a time ago as April 25, 1963, he told the House this:

One of the main principles of the Liberal plan for administration is that we must work in co-operation with the doctors. I know the socialists think this is a big joke, but we mean it, sir, and most seriously, because we have seen examples of the way the CCF in Saskatchewan messed up the plan. We do not want to see this happen here in Ontario or Canada.

An hon. member: Who said that?

Mr. Harris: Our hon. friend from Parkdale. Just a little farther on—I will not read all this—he makes a big issue out of having a PSI scheme. Then, in his closing remarks:

Then, Mr. Speaker, should we fail to get the co-operation of PSI, we admit that we will sponsor one of our own carriers. In other words, we will have a government-sponsored carrier. This is not our first choice, this is our second choice.

I thought that was worthy of being repeated at this time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Bryden: It shows the power of education. They have learned.

Mr. Harris: I have a word or two for the hon. member when I get a little farther down.

Mr. Speaker, at this stage in the debate, repetition of fact, figures and varying philosophies is becoming very apparent. In all this welter of words that have emanated from my hon. friends in the Opposition, very little time has been spent in pointing out the benefits that will accrue to the 1,800,000 of our people who are going to benefit from this legislation.

I am concerned about the welfare of my constituents, and the passage of this bill will bring relief to a very large percentage of them. I would rather move slowly and bring in a prudent health care plan in stages and make sure the people who are most urgently in need of physician services are going to be looked after first; I submit that is what this bill does for us.

For several reasons I want to take a few minutes of the time of the House this afternoon. First, from the public point of view, I have had the privilege of serving on the board of one of Toronto's larger hospitals for almost 15 years now. From the private family point of view, as a result of a rather serious car accident, I had a better-than-average insight into the practical workings of our hospitals.

As I have said before, certainly from the political point of view—I represent a riding where the average male wage earner makes approximately only about $4,200 a year—I am concerned as to how this bill is going to affect my constituents. During the past 15 years, medical science has made enormous strides. People who once suffered from diseases that completely baffled medical science can now have their condition diagnosed, and through drugs and therapy can lead more normal, useful, and often very full, lives.

During this time the Conservative government in Ontario has consistently moved forward. It has assisted in the building of hospitals, it has assisted in making grants available for research. It introduced the Ontario hospital insurance plan in 1959 and now we are going to introduce a medical service insurance plan.

Mr. Speaker, the remarks that our hon. Prime Minister made last October 29 are of tremendous significance at this time. This is all part of this overall package. I am just going to highlight one or two of those things that he said at that time, because they bear on this bill and they are worth repeating.

First, a new medical school at McMaster University; a new school of dentistry at the University of Western Ontario; a medical school at the University of Toronto expanded to provide for the admission of an additional 75 first-year medical students; and a general upgrading of all the facilities throughout. A new health science building is being provided at Queen's University and the first-year medical class increased in numbers up to 75.

Now the cost of this particular programme is approximately $50 million. As well as that, the government is setting up a programme of special grants to assist hospitals associated with our medical schools and our dental schools. And this programme will cost an additional $64 million.

So in total, there is an expenditure of $114 million that ties right in with what we are doing.

Just to explore this a little farther, much has been said about nurses in this House, and I just want to add a word in that regard. The grants by the Ontario government for construction of nurses' residences will be increased from $2,000 to $3,200 per bed. In addition, the province intends to construct three regional nursing schools, each to accommodate 100 students. Encouragement will also be given to hospitals to push forward programmes for training registered nursing assistants, and I know as chairman of a school of nursing how vital this need is.

The para-health services, we have a tremendous need in this area and it is so essential to the good health care. At this time these things are being studied. They include physiotherapy, occupational therapy, speech therapy, laboratory, technicians and others. Planning to meet these needs has progressed and will be pressed forward as an integral part of the provision of adequate health care.

This is a comprehensive and carefully planned programme to meet the needs for the supply of trained personnel in the health field. Its financing is a vast undertaking, planning for which is in no sense the least important part. This is entirely a provincial programme, financed by the province. All of these projects are outlined in the Hall commission report and it is there recommended that they should be paid for on a 50/50 basis; so it is certainly to be hoped that the federal government will see fit to implement these programmes very soon, because such support would be of tremendous assistance to this province.

Mr. Speaker, the enumeration of the specifics proves this government's concern for the welfare of all of our people in this field of health. As I said a moment ago, apart from the particular bill, the allocation of $114 million that I have just outlined for the needs of medical education is something that we must bear in mind when we are discussing this project. So let us remember the things that have been done and are being done in this field. As the hon. Minister of Health said when he introduced Bill 136 the other day, this Act is not an isolated piece of legislation but a further step in a health programme which is designed to make available medical coverage to all our people.

In this age that we are privileged to live in new remedies are available and more will be made available because of the research money that this government is providing.

What is now being considered in this bill is the assurance that the people of this province will have available to them physician services without the financial worry that a serious illness could bring. The real issue raised by this bill is that group of people who are now without medical insurance of any sort and also that group which has inadequate insurance coverage.

In this area, what could be more realistic than taking our approximate 1,000,000 non-income taxpayers and making sure that they have their medical bills paid for? It should be pointed out that approximately 50 per cent of our people over the age of 65 do not pay any income tax. So here in this area we are providing health coverage for those of our senior citizens who are most urgently in need.

Second, we take that group of approximately 850,000 people who have taxable incomes up to $1,000 and we assist this group. Under this scheme, the person receiving the assistance is no more identifiable by his neighbour or friends than anyone in the province who pays income tax. We all know this total figure of 1,800,000 represents approximately 25 per cent of our people and by means of this bill we should more than close the 16 per cent gap which most experts agree now exists with our uninsured people.

At this time I would like to commend Joan Hollobon of the Globe and Mail for her very excellent series of articles over the past six months which have dealt with this subject. It is interesting to note that in one of her references to British Columbia she said, and I quote:

The means test troubles few. An average of 83.7 per cent of all income groups said they had no objection.

Bearing in mind this report of Miss Hollobon's and with the simple procedure that we are adopting here of applying an income test which falls far short of a means test, I find that objections in this area are no longer valid.

In several of our provinces where free enterprise has been left to flourish completely without any government intervention, as has been said on the other side both this afternoon and yesterday, in some instances the lower-income groups who need insurance most are not buying it. I say with all sincerity, Mr. Speaker, if we find in our bill that some of these low-income people who need this insurance are not buying it, I am sure that this government will find ways and means to make sure that they are covered with the minimum of delay.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): When are you going to find that out if you cannot see it now?

Mr. Harris: I have faith in this executive council that sits on my left here that if this does not work out in the first instance, they will certainly amend it to make it work out.

Mr. Singer: None so blind as those who will not see.

Mr. White: Continuous progress in this jurisdiction.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: None so deaf as those who will not listen.

Mr. Harris: A few years ago, I was involved in a rather serious motor-car accident. I have paid doctor's bills in this regard something in excess of $6,000, and the Ontario hospital services commission paid, on my behalf, something over $8,500—

Mr. Sopha: All of which you recovered, I trust.

Mr. Harris: Just a minute. I am not complaining in any way about this large expenditure that I made, because I had insurance which provided for this—

Mr. Sopha: The hon. member had a good lawyer. The hon. member recovered the money.

Mr. Harris: But the point I want to make—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Harris: —to the hon. member for Sudbury, is this. This experience pointed out to me very dramatically that the purchase of medical care cannot be compared to the purchase of any other service.

Mr. Sopha: Not paid out of his pocket!

Mr. Harris: The human element and the capabilities of the doctors are of prime importance. In this regard, in discussing a proposed operation that my daughter was going to have at this time, some of the finest neurologists in the country could not give me any assurance of what was going to happen. I might say the operation was successful. But I am pointing this out because we, as politicians, always have to remember that medical care is provided by medical people, not by politicians.

Mr. Trotter: We are not arguing about that. The money; where is it coming from?

Mr. Harris: All right. I am just making sure you have it straight. Our job is to do everything in our power as legislators, which this government is doing, to see to it that in order to have adequate medical care we make the facilities available to provide more doctors; to provide more nurses; to provide more hospitals—

Mr. Trotter: Why do you not, then?

Mr. White: Do not be ridiculous.

Mr. Harris: We are doing it. Provide more researchers, and more of all the facilities necessary for proper medical care. This, I submit, we are doing. I will repeat again this government's allocation of $114 million for the needs of medical education. The additional amount of $30 million for the needs of the nurses is evidence of our concern.

Mr. Trotter: A long time coming.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, we are looking forward, with anticipation, to the results of this federal-provincial conference that was scheduled to take place at the end of this month. I understand it has been postponed until June or July, and it is quite possible that this subject will be on this agenda. At that time I hope that consideration is given by Ottawa to make available to the province this 50 per cent figure that we have all heard so much about.

After reading and listening to some of my hon. colleagues opposite, one would almost get the idea from some of them that we are doing a great injustice when, in fact, this bill is a tremendous step forward. It will help to ensure the right to good health is available to all of our people, not just for those who are wealthy enough to be able to afford it.

I would like to say to my hon. colleagues who make up the executive council of this province that this is a good piece of legislation and I commend them for bringing it forward.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trotter: Preaching for the call?

Mr. Harris: Before concluding, I would like to make brief reference to some of the sections of this bill, as the hon. member for Woodbine has just done. But let us just see where the emphasis lies in some of these questions.

Regarding this medical service insurance council that so much has been said about here this afternoon, I want to commend the government for making it clear that five members of this council will be representatives of the public. I have enough faith in them to be sure that they will appoint five people who are five just men. You have heard enough about the two from the insurance companies, the insurance carriers, and the two from the medical profession, but with this five to four majority in favour of the public, we can be assured of the best possible decision without any possibility of any excess pressure which has been talked about so much here this afternoon.

In section 7, we should note that this makes it absolutely clear that assistance is available for a person who is not able to continue payment of his or her premium because of the lack of income due to unemployment or illness or disability.

Again, section 12 should be emphasized so that everyone is aware that not only are they eligible for a standard contract, but, if the licensed carrier were to refuse to sell them a standard contract, the carrier would be guilty of an offence and, upon conviction, liable for a fine up to $500.

In section 14, subsection 2, this makes it clear that any dependant is covered up to 21 years of age. I would like to say to the hon. Minister of Health that I am pleased to note this age limit is set at 21, but I would also like to recommend that under the Ontario hospital services commission he give consideration to raising the age of the dependant from 19 up to 21, and bring it in line with this Act. By doing this, many parents of older children will be relieved of the present burden this age limit of 19 imposes.

At this time, I would also ask the hon. Minister of Health to give consideration in both these areas to extending this coverage to all of our university students.

Under section 18, subsection 2, it should be emphasized that for a period of two years after the day the Act comes into force, the prescribed maximum prescription rate will remain constant. This is a most important section, and will certainly relieve the minds of many of our people who might be worried about increased premiums.

Again, in section 25, I would like to emphasize that everyone has the right to choose their own physician.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, as I said a few moments ago, no one on this side of the House would say this is the last word in health care, but it does assure that no person will be denied attention when they are sick. And, most important, no person will suffer impoverishment as a result of illness. It is just another step in this government's long and progressive programme which has, as its ultimate objective, complete health care of the highest order for all of our people. I commend the hon. Minister of Health for bringing this legislation forward.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Speaker, to accomplish the purpose that I have set for myself, if the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Downer) will forgive me, I should like in the format of my remarks to provide a text, against the background of which to relate all that I have to say after the text. The text I should like to provide is a series of quotations, so that the discerning, who may take the opportunity or the liberty or give themselves the licence to read the remarks I make, will be able to see what I am trying to do. The first quotation that I should like to read into the record by way of preamble is this one. The quotation begins:

Frankly, we are concerned about the feeling that exists among many people in this province. They simply do not want everything taken away from them by the state.

That, sir, is the first citizen of the province, the Hon. John Parmenter Robarts. The second quotation that I should like to read is this one:

What the commission recommends is that in Canada this gap be closed, that as a nation we now take the necessary legislative, organizational and financial decisions to make all the fruits of the health sciences available to all our residents without hindrance of any kind. All our recommendations are directed toward this objective. There can be no greater challenge to a free society of free men.

Those words, I suppose, may be attributed to Mr. Justice Emmett Hall, for they are read from the Hall report on health services.

The next one, sir, is a quotation from a speech made just two weeks ago tonight. It begins:

The individual must be secured by the state, but the individual has some responsibility, too. If you turn over to the government the total economic responsibility of the individual, then you must prepare to give up the right to a lot of individual decisions. You cannot have it both ways.

That, again, is an excerpt from a speech made by the Hon. John Parmenter Robarts, first citizen of the province.

The final quotation, to provide the text—as I say, my hon. friend from Dufferin-Simcoe will understand what I am doing—begins thusly:

We wish to speed up the date when all have access to health services and to have enabled them to make their contributions to Canada's welfare. Low incomes and poor health have been too closely associated for us to ignore the adverse effects on income distribution of chronic illness and disability. Expenditures on good health may well be as efficient a device for equalizing the distribution of income as any subsidy can possibly be.

That sir, again, is a quotation from the Royal commission on health services, chaired by Mr. Justice Emmett Hall.

By your leave, Mr. Speaker, that is the text against which I am going to approach this subject on the philosophical basis. I am delighted—nay, I am enthused—with the prospect of having the opportunity to address some remarks on the second reading of this bill toward a delineation—and a crystallization of the differences that separate a Tory in his philosophy from a Liberal—the philosophical predilection, the intellectual predilection that delineates a small “c” conservative from a small “l” liberal.

I have been impressed by a number of things in the debate thus far. If we sit here until mid-August, I hope that every hon. member of this House will take the opportunity to participate in this debate which, after all, deals with a subject fundamental to the well-being of our society. It relates to a precious asset, an invaluable asset, beyond which one would find it difficult to conjure up a greater one. It is fitting that each hon. member of the House get up in his place and take a suitable length of time to expostulate his views, his philosophical approach to this problem and to the remedying of the evil, the distress and the suffering that we are all—I accord all hon. members that—concerned about.

One of the things that impresses me about this bill is that there is no preamble to it, as there was in the case of the bill which introduced on March 21, 1957 the establishment of the Ontario hospital services commission and provided hospital care to all but one per cent of the citizens of this province. Here is the preamble to that Act:

Whereas it is in the public interest to establish a plan of hospital care insurance for the people of Ontario, universally available to all without regard to age, financial circumstances or condition of health, and whereas it is desirable to extend the powers of the hospital services commission of Ontario in order that it may put such a plan into effect as soon as practicable—

As we say in the law—and I look at my friend, the hon. member for York Mills (Mr. Bales)—mutatis mutandis, those words could apply to this bill if it was universal and comprehensive in its coverage. One could borrow the words of the preamble of that statute and emblazon them on the front page of this bill, if this bill met the terms and the characteristics of the amendment that we have proposed.

I was impressed by the fact that the bill was not introduced by the hon. Prime Minister; he left its introduction and preliminary statement to a mere Minister.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Frost used to speak first, last and always.

Mr. Sopha: No, he is primus inter pares—first among equals—primus inter pares, the hon. Prime Minister. Unlike Leslie Frost, who introduced the hospital services care bill, and who spoke first on second reading of the bill, the first citizen of the province unfortunately is absent. If he believed this was a major step forward, then he himself would have got up and moved it to the House and made the preliminary statement.

I noticed that in regard to this bill—I cannot read the mind of the first citizen—but in regard to the bill, I noticed that if you observe him in this House and as he goes about the province in his public sphere, you know what the rest of the 78 are thinking and doing, because they all merely reflect and parrot what he says from time to time.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Sopha: I noticed a certain willingness to banter in his attitude—

Mr. MacDonald: What about the hon. member for St. George? He is sometimes obstreperous.

Mr. Sopha: That may be so.

I was impressed—indeed, I was shocked and dismayed—to learn that 1,800,000 citizens in this province need to be subsidized—more than 25 per cent of the people who live in this province. I would not have dreamed, even in the wildest state of hallucination, that more than 25 per cent of our population live on the edge of poverty. That is to say, one out of four of the residents of this province—which other hon. members have described as the “affluent society,” which we proclaim to be the richest, the wealthiest, the most industrial province of the nation—one out of the four apparently live in a state of suspended animation, where they are too poor to live properly and too rich to die.

If that be so, it is a pocket of poverty that you will not put in a vest pocket, in the war of the several governments on poverty. It might be interesting at this point to reflect on how the citizens of this province manage to pay for the Ontario hospital services coverage. Here are the figures; very current; from an absolutely reliable source, the commission itself: 4,866,723 are covered by reason of the regulation that industry or businesses having 15 or more are required to enrol.

Compulsory, that is the word, the shibboleth, the red herring that is trotted across to us. Is it an assault on human dignity to be required to have a driver's licence? Is it an assault on human dignity, is it a detraction from freedom, for an employer to be required to pay the total of the benefits into the workmen's compensation fund? Such artificiality that is used to defend this piece of legislation!

Then, 1,613,406 pay direct. There are 66,782 in the armed forces, for which the federal government pays. The indigent—324,308. That makes a total of 6,871,219 souls in the province. Then we are informed that about 65,000, less than one per cent, are not covered.

So, my reasoning from these figures is that apparently all but 324,308 people, through one means or another, are able to make their contribution toward the securing of the protection that hospital insurance gives, without having to go cap in hand to the public purse; without suffering the scrutiny of the bureaucracy; without being put in a position of a recipient of charity. And what greater assault on human dignity is there than that? All but 324,000 can make some form of payment.

Mr. Singer: Is that compulsion?

Mr. Sopha: My hon. friend from Downsview asks is that compulsion? I never heard a constituent complain about compulsion of hospital care coverage. I have heard a good many of them thank a merciful providence that we have it, and that they were not faced with crippling financial distress by having to meet the burden of a hospital bill that piles up at the rate of $22 to $25 per day.

Then, where does this 1,800,000 figure come from? Or to put it another way, is this a gigantic bribe to 25 per cent of our population? Those people rely upon the concept of free enterprise, which, in many cases, is neither enterprise nor free. These people speak the maxims that were suitable to the late years of the 18th century, the philosophy of Adam Smith, about individual initiative and all that sort of thing.

Mr. Bryden: He was one of the Liberals.

Mr. Sopha: Is there not some concept in their mind that there is an assault on human dignity if you thrust charity on a person? Or to put that another way, for purposes of clarity, does one not conjure up in his mind that there is a certain measure of pride in the individual, that he is making some contribution himself to his welfare? Or is the hon. Minister of Health, who brought up this figure, saying to us and to the people of Ontario, that 1,800,000 of our people are content to go to the public trough and ask for a subsidy? If that is the position he takes, then I say to the hon. Minister that I do not believe that rubbish for a moment.

The next thing that impressed me about this debate, was the attitude of our hon. friends in the NDP. When I was getting ready for the minor contribution that I will make to the second reading, I thought to myself, here is one place and a principle where we may stand together to make an assault on this government.

Mr. Bryden: If you will just stay with your present position, we will welcome you.

Mr. Sopha: I am telling the House what has always been my position in the realm of social welfare. I am talking about my social philosophy. It has never changed since the days that I went to university. But I am asking my hon. friends, is it not better for the well-being of the people of Ontario that we present a united front against this?

Mr. Bryden: We rejoice at your conversion.

Mr. Sopha: For us—and I speak on behalf of my party, though I have never consulted them about it—I say with assurance that we are content to go to the people of Ontario on this issue. We are content to make this an election issue.

Now we are able to reveal to the public from the public rostrums, the outlines, the skeleton of what the government proposes in the field of health care, instead of having to battle with the smoke, shadowy substance of the hon. Prime Minister of this province on the electronic medium, backed by millions of dollars in his political campaign treasury, and checking off against health care and saying “done” as he did in the election campaign of 1963.

As an aside—it was not really one of the things that impressed me—I noticed the ferocious scribbling of the hon. Minister of Health throughout the debate. Every once in a while he takes up pen and he notes down something that is being said on this side of the House. I look forward to his participation in this debate, when he gives himself the opportunity to meet and attempt to defeat and to muster arguments against the things we are saying are wrong with this legislation.

I know in every sinew of my body, I know in my heart, that this legislation is wrong. This bill is shameful. It is a shameful delusion, wreaked upon the people of Ontario.

All afternoon I have been watching the comings and goings of the hon. Minister of Education (Mr. Davis) and now that I have reached this point I am delighted to see that he is in his seat. I want to say to the hon. Minister of Education that I hope that at some point in this debate, he will rise in his place.

Mr. Speaker: I would inform the member that he is always supposed to speak through the Chair to the House, and not to particular individuals on the other side of the House, or even on his own side of the House.

Yesterday, and the day before—or last week rather—we had occasion where members were speaking directly to the Minister and saying, “you said this,” and “you did that,” and making personal conversation to each of the individuals whom they were addressing. I would say that was wrong, and you should always address the House through the Chair, and thus to the House as a whole.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Speaker, I would say that several times this afternoon I have used the phrase, “I say to the hon. Minister through you.” I am in the habit of doing that. I was not, I assure Your Honour, speaking directly to the hon. Minister of Education, without regard to Your Honour’s dignity as the chairman of the House. May I add, as an addendum, that I hope we will soon see the end of the pernicious device that has grown up in this House, of hon. members of this House referring to other hon. members by their first names. It is only in this session that it has grown, and I hope there is a surcease put to it. I believe in the dignity of Parliament too much to allow those things to come seeping in.

Through you, Your Honour, to the hon. Minister of Education, I challenge him to rise in his place, occupant as he is of perhaps the most important portfolio in the government, and explain to me—there may be others that are interested—what is the difference between compulsion in the field of education and compulsion in the field of medical care?

Perhaps from a philosophical point of view, education is the care and training of the mind. Fundamentally, it is nothing more than that. It is a very complex field, but it boils down to that—care and training of the mind. Throughout our history as a province, we have exercised compulsion in the field of education. Parents have no choice but to train their children's minds, to care for their minds, and they must send their children to school. Indeed, if they do not they are in danger of going to jail. The statute so provides.

Medical care, medical health insurance, is care of the body in the same way as education is care of the mind.

Then, if we exercise compulsion on the one hand toward the mind, what philosophical argument is there against exercising compulsion in being concerned and accepting responsibility for the well-being of the body of our citizens and, indeed, their minds? Mental illness is taken care of on the same basis as any other illness.

So I hope the hon. Minister of Education, Your Honour, has understood the challenge that I hand to him. We are indeed fortunate, I say, and I do not want to wound any feelings, we are indeed fortunate in this province to have a Minister of Education who fights for education. But we do not have a Minister of Health who fights for health in the same way, I am sad to say.

I want to say, by way of interpolation to my next remark, that I have a profound admiration for the man who occupies the Cabinet portfolio as Minister of Health. As a man, as a person, he has great humanitarian instincts. He is easy to talk to, he is understanding. But having said that, I go on to say that it is perhaps unfortunate that the incumbent of that portfolio is a medical doctor. I learned at the knee of Professor R. McGregor Dawson that it is a fatal mistake in the choosing of Cabinet colleagues to take a man who is a professional in the field of the portfolio that he is to administer.

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): We have a lawyer as Attorney General.

Mr. Sopha: We have to have.

An hon. member: Lawyers stick together!

Mr. Sopha: We have to have. But we do not have to have a doctor as Minister of Health; and in most cases in our system the Minister of Health has not been a doctor; I cannot recall during my lifetime that the Minister of Health in the federal government has been a doctor.

The unfortunate part about it is—against this background of having the intelligent amateur of high administrative ability in a portfolio—the unfortunate thing is that a medical doctor comes to this department with intellectual predisposition. He cannot put himself outside the society in which he has grown up. His society is composed of the medical profession, his brethren in the profession; and as a medical doctor he would be inclined to be governed by their desires and their wishes.

Several hon. members: Let us get back to the bill.

Mr. Sopha: I cannot imagine anything more closely connected to this bill than to treat of its genesis, how it came about to this form, doctor and insurance company oriented as it is.

Now to go back to the text I was attempting to develop and to elucidate: These people who talk about freedom, these people who talk about the voluntary nature of the scheme, these people who want to leave something, some decisions, to the individual—the words of the hon. Prime Minister—I say to them that if they are truly concerned about freedom, that I have learned from our history and from my observation that without security there can be no real freedom.

Small comfort to a man suffering the terminal stages of cancer of the pancreas, to say: "Well, at least I had the volition, I had the free will to join the plan or not." As well as it is small comfort to the individual who is without employment to say: "Well, at least I live in a free society." That does not put any food in his children's stomachs, that does not make him feel any better.

As Liberals, we believe that freedom can only be realized within the framework of economic security. When people have economic and physical well-being and security, then they can be truly free. They can be free within that environment.

An hon. member: What is the number of that bill?

Mr. Sopha: The whole history of this 20th century has been the intervention of the state on behalf of the individual, to secure to him that attitude of mind where he is relieved of the worry about pain and suffering and financial distress and economic dislocation.

That is the march of the time; and we live in times of great change, great change. He who sits back, or mounts the public platform and starts to talk about securing to the individual his freedom to make decisions, he who holds up on high as a shining banner and says, "We do not want to impose things upon the individual;" he flies in the face of the history of this whole century. Those comments were suitable before the first day of January, 1900, but they are no longer suitable.

The truth is that in all fields of human endeavour we interfere with the individual, and we interfere with him in the name of the greatest good for the greatest number, in the name of public welfare, in almost every sector of his life.

In another aspect, he who is truly liberal, liberal in the sense that Emmett Hall is liberal, believes that the equitable distribution of the goods we produce among those who produce them is the proper philosophical approach, that is what social welfare is.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Do not get mad.

Mr. Sopha: I say to the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions I am not getting mad at anyone. The whole philosophical concept of this century has been the march toward the more equitable distribution of the goods we produce among those who produce them. That is what Mr. Justice Hall said in the quotation that I read: He said this is another means of distributing the wealth of this country among all its citizens; to provide him with health care, to ensure indeed that every citizen has available to him the best that medical science can give. He put it in another way; he said there is a terrifying gap between the state of our medical knowledge in this country and the availability of that knowledge to the great mass of our citizens.

Now I have heard and I have listened to the debates; and I heard money being talked by every speaker. Every speaker emphasized the money aspect. But in humility I say to them, to those who are concerned about the money, the financial aspect of an appropriate and adequate system of medical care is not the most important aspect. Whether it costs $150 or $175 or $200 or costs 5.4 per cent of the gross national product or six per cent; that is only a minor and ancillary matter. Listen to the words of Mr. Justice Hall on that score:

It became clear as we entered upon our hearings that two factors in particular were going to pose special difficulties. One was the haphazard approach of organizations and government to the search for solution to the problem of providing a measure of health care for Canadians. The second was the overemphasis given to Medicare. This latter factor threatened to overshadow the broad purpose of the inquiry.

No one would suggest that the payment of medical bills is not an important item, but it is, after all, but one item in the full range of health services and in any objective approach it could not be permitted to dominate the whole field.

Now this remarkable document, the report of the Royal commission on health services—against which, I am a person who uses selective words, Your Honour, against which this blue covered one, Tory blue, pales into insignificance of rubbish—this document, which is the background of our amendment, the basis on which we have phrased the amendment we present to the second reading of this bill; this document was four years in preparation, in its two volumes and several hundreds of pages.

The commission listened to 400 briefs; they commissioned 27 separate studies in the field of health care. Canadians have had the habit, in almost every sector of their lives that whenever a problem comes up, Canadians are unique in that they institute a Royal commission. So help me, I would not be surprised that if atom bombs were flying over Greenland that somebody in this country would propose a Royal commission to investigate.

An hon. member: The Liberals!

Mr. Sopha: They have had the habit, having imposed the Royal commission, of taking the Royal commission report and putting it on the shelf—the darkest, deepest, most dusty of the shelves—and there letting it lie until eternity. But I have a feeling—I do not only have the feeling, I know in my bones—that this Royal commission is not going to suffer that fate.

And that for three reasons: (1) Because it is a penetrating analysis into one of the most important sectors of our national life.

(2) Because the subject-matter of this Royal commission is in the political context—Medicare, medical health insurance, is now a political matter in this country. It is political in the sense that the majority of the people who take an interest in public affairs, which is the majority of the people in the country, have an opinion about it. Everyone has an opinion about Medicare. I made a private little survey. Everybody I speak to has something to say about it; it is a subject of thought and reflection and consideration; because after all with humans nothing strikes more deeply than illness, illness and injury.

(3) Because the man who chaired the commission will fight for it. No sooner were the reports published than he was in this city and he was battling on behalf of his report. He took on an august organization like the Canadian tax foundation. He took them on, fair square, heels dug into the rug like mine are.

Mr. P. J. Yakubski (Renfrew South): The hon. member's heels dug in!

Mr. Sopha: He is ready to fight for the implementation of this report, and it is an appropriate place to say that if the hon. Prime Minister and the members of his executive council believe in the principle of a national health scheme, if they fully believe in that, then all they need do, this is a simple move, is say to the federal government, we are ready to co-operate with you in a national scheme.

Mr. Reilly: Why do they not say it?

Mr. Sopha: If Ontario said that, if Ontario said that to the federal government, then within a very short space of time, it is my own view, Canada, Canadians from coast to coast, would be the beneficiaries of a national health care scheme.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: What about Quebec?

Mr. Sopha: I do not want to digress, but I would expect as in the pension field, I would expect that Quebec would not go in.

Mr. Yakubski: The hon. member would expect!

Mr. Sopha: I do not want to digress, but I would think that the temper in Quebec is such now that they would be reluctant to become a part of it.

Mr. Yakubski: You would not be sure, though.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Sopha: But remember this, apart from the attitude of Quebec, we in Ontario, we are the very fulcrum of this country.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: What about the British Columbia scheme?

Mr. Sopha: We are the very centre of the scale. We in Ontario, after all, were the main stimulators toward confederation of this country; we started the idea of confederation in this country.

Mr. Yakubski: No, not really.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sopha: We in Ontario have a healthier attitude towards the power of the central government, I have said in this House before, than any other—

Mr. Speaker: Order, order. I am afraid we are getting away from the principles of the bill or the amendment and I would ask the member speaking to try to confine himself to the principles contained within this bill. At the same time, I would ask some of the other members in the House who are making interjections to desist as it would enable the speaker to stick to the second reading better without these many interruptions.

Mr. Sopha: Fine, sir. The hon. Prime Minister asked me a question, and I thought it polite to answer him.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, Mr. Speaker, I must say that I am enjoying the hon. member's speech very much, digressions or no.

Mr. Sopha: We in this party believe in a national scheme. We say in our amendment—in order to relate this to the business before the House—we say in the last paragraph of the amendment that the bill should be revised so that it might be easily integrated or readily integrated into a national scheme. We in Ontario have always been most generous—and this is a thing about which we can be proud—in our attitude to sharing the wealth of this province with the less fortunate areas of this Confederation. We can be justly proud of that without going into the details, although we hear complaints from time to time about the tremendous amount of income tax and corporation tax that is collected in this province by the federal government.

To be true to our history and our tradition, we in Ontario ought to be the prime motivator of a national scheme of health insurance for all Canadians.

Now, sir, having said that, I want to return for a moment to this report that I referred to in that very kind language a moment ago—the report of the Hagey commission. It really astounds me that you can have a number of doctors as part of the Hall commission, and a number of doctors as part of the Hagey commission, and the medical men can come to contradictory conclusions. With the same facts before them, with the same time for reflection, they can come to opposite results!

Mr. A. H. Cowling (High Park): Sounds like the lawyers!

Mr. Sopha: The medical men on the Hall commission unreservedly supported the principle of a government-operated scheme. The medical men on the Hagey commission are cut of a different stripe. They support the voluntary nature of a scheme, and a scheme that is carried by private carriers. It is interesting to note that the government did exactly the same thing as it did in The Hospital Services Commission Act. The Act was introduced as a trial balloon in 1956 but it was not passed; it was reintroduced in revised form in 1957, and it passed. This government introduced Bill 163, but it departed from the practice in hospital care insurance and it established a Royal commission in order to make suggestions about the revision of the bill. But the Royal commission that looked into the provisions of Bill 163, sir, had the cards stacked against it before it started. The dice were loaded before it embarked upon its inquiry. Listen to this, the remarks of the report:

The investigation was brought but the committee's recommendations and decisions deal primarily with "matters related to and consonant with" the basic principles, purposes and objectives of Bill 163 of the 1962-63 session of the legislative assembly of the province of Ontario respecting medical services insurance.

Note those words—matters related to and consonant with, the purposes and objectives. In other words, one gets the impression that they are not supposed to look into any matters that are not consonant with the purposes; one almost gets the impression that they are not supposed to hear conflicting opinions about it. Now I will expand on that in a moment. They go on to say:

The primary task in the view of the commissioners was to examine the feasibility of the approach to medical services insurance taken by the government in Bill 163, to suggest such changes in detail as would make the bill effective to the fullest extent, and to propose in the form of amendments to the bill or administrative regulations the organization and procedures needed for a programme of medical services insurance in Ontario, operated by private carriers rather than by government.

In other words, instead of making the scope of the inquiry broad enough to encounter opinions from people as to what form of medical care they wanted or they thought feasible, the government loads the dice against that type of inquiry, and restricts this commission to an examination of the feasibility of the bill which had been introduced.

In other words, to put it in a nutshell, we never had a Royal commission of inquiry in this province, of the nature of the Hall commission. The government made up its mind; the hon. Minister of Health made up his mind. Indeed, his mind has been made up, one gets the impression, since he was a lad in the 1920s about this; he exhibits an inflexibility of mind. He and the executive council have made up their mind that we are going to have a system of medical care insurance in this province, financed by private carriers, and no other suggestions would be welcome to the Hagey commission.

The public, which, after all, in the final result, in spite of Barnum, cannot be fooled—you cannot fool the public—must have divined that that was the attitude of this government, with its overpowering majority; that it was, if you will pardon the expression, hell-bent on a scheme that would be based upon profit, and not upon need. The response of the public to this commission was not very great. They heard, I think it was, subject to correction, 57 briefs. That is all, in contrast to the 400 heard by the Hall commission. I do not know the reason: Whether they did not encourage the presentation of briefs, or whether they were restrictive in their invitations to people who might present briefs. Certainly they never looked into the other side of the coin, and the other side of the medal is this basic question. Is a government-operated scheme more suitable for the well-being and the best interests of the people of this province than the scheme envisaged in this bill, which my friend, the hon. member for Parkdale and I detest so mightily? That is the basic question.

I give it as my opinion, as the clock approaches 6 o'clock, that almost everybody in this province is against this type of medical care insurance. Farmers are against it, trade unionists are against it. Social workers are against it. Many people in the medical profession are against it. Most people in the middle-income groups—the forgotten men in our society—are against it. This is the man that makes the moderate income. His children belong to the Girl Guides. He goes to church. He obeys the law. He pays his taxes. You never hear of him, because he does not do anything abnormal; he does not do anything exciting. Most of the time he prays, but more often, he pays. That is the forgotten man—the middle-income group that make the very fabric and the bulwark of our society. He is against this bill.

The only organization in the country that appears to support a plan like this is the Tory party.

Mr. Bryden: The Ontario medical association.

Mr. Sopha: Yes. The Tory party; they are part of it. I say to the hon. Minister of Health, and this is the only comment I am going to make about them, that there is a reactionary wing of the medical profession, composed largely of two types of individuals. One is that type who is making so much money that he is afraid that any scheme of government-operated insurance would make him disclose the amount of money that he is making—probably, in many cases, something in the order of $75,000 to $100,000 a year. That is the reactionary wing of the Tory party.

There is another group. The disaffected doctors from Britain—a small group of disaffected, noisy doctors who preferred to emigrate from Britain and come to this country. Indeed, the hon. Minister of Health and I know personally that quite a number of them ended up in Sudbury. Indeed, one of the strongest antagonists to this, and to any form of state intervention in the health care field, was the president of the Ontario medical association, who was one of the disaffected emigrants from Britain, and who practised law. He is a very good practitioner in the city of Sudbury.

May we call it 6 o'clock, sir?

It being 6 o'clock, the House took recess.

MEDICAL SERVICES INSURANCE (continued)

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, one cannot feel that one can always command a good House, and that I suppose depends upon the time of day. However, one feels that that does not in any way impair the validity of his remarks.

I was reflecting on the fact that it is my opinion, and an opinion shared by a good many people in this country, that the reactionary wing of the medical profession has had more attention paid to it and more influence upon government policy in connection with this bill than it deserves.

I was referring to the important part played in this whole affair, in the genesis of this statute, our approach to medical care insurance, by that disaffected minority of doctors who came from the United Kingdom. Again I refer to the fact that the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond) is not an amateur. He is a professional man, and he has a rapport with these people. He is a member of the brethren with them, and because of his intellectual predisposition he cannot help but pay very close attention to what they say to him; and what they have said to him, we charge, is incorporated in the body of this statute.

It always strikes me as something quite remarkable, sir—perhaps I should not refer to it and sometimes I am known for my bluntness—that the Anglo-Saxon, when he gets off the boat in Montreal, is ready to run the country the next day. It would take the central European two generations to get into the swing of public life. These people—and I know some of them personally—were disaffected, disenchanted, perhaps disillusioned by the national health scheme in Great Britain enacted in 1948 or 1949, and they preferred to emigrate to this country.

Right in my own community, right at the height of the debate about the type of plan that this province was going to have—and, as I say, at that time one of the immigrants was president of the Ontario medical association and no doubt the hon. Minister of Health had heard his views at a close interpersonal level—I made it a point to conduct another little survey among other members of the medical profession. I was struck by the number of times that I heard other members of the medical profession say: "That group does not speak for me. I do not necessarily believe the sort of thing that they are expostulating as being the views of all the medical profession of this province."

Now, it might be apt to compare the attitude of lawyers and doctors in this connection. It might be helpful. I never heard one wail, not even a whimper of protest about the report tabled in this Legislature on a system of legal aid. I have yet to meet a member of the legal profession who believes that because there is government intervention in the realm of subsidizing people who cannot afford legal advice, that the profession is going to have its rights, liberties and freedoms in any way impaired. The legal profession, as the medical profession, has been content to give its services free of charge. They have been happy to do so.

I am sure I speak for the great majority of the members of the legal profession when I say that they would be content to continue to handle the legal affairs of those who are unable to pay in much the same way as they have been doing. However, the legal profession has the view that if the state, the government, can come up with a better system that will ensure more adequate coverage of the population, which will create a better system of giving legal assistance, then the profession is content to go along with it and without the wails of protest that one hears from the medical profession.

I have only made an excursion into that realm in order to get at the genesis of this bill. This bill must have come from some place; somebody must have dreamed it up. In fact, I have to—and I do not use this merely as a figure of speech—continue to pinch myself into reality that the government is serious about this bill. I can scarcely believe that the government is serious in foisting a half-baked system of medical care on the people of this province in confrontation of the very penetrating analysis of the health needs of the people of Canada conducted by the Hall commission report.

In other words, we would be in a bad way if we stood in this House and emitted large quantities of oxygen against the principle of this bill, and were not buttressed by the Hall report. The Hall report is the touchstone of our argument. We hold it up in challenge and we defy any person, be it the hon. Minister of Health or anyone expert in the field of health care, and we say: "Show us a better analysis of the health needs of the Canadian people than this one," and we will stand or fall upon it.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, I am merely seeking, with my own limited capacities, to explore the philosophical basis that brings this type of legislation into this House as a mere routine bill. That is how it came in; it is a mere routine bill introduced by the hon. Minister responsible for the department under whose responsibility it comes. This is not, and is not proclaimed to be, as far as I can gather, a major step forward in health insurance in Ontario. Now, I leave that.

There are Tories and Tories. I thought the comments of the hon. member for Woodbine (Mr. Bryden) about the Tory connection with this bill were very apt. The hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) sometimes bruises easily. He has a type of dermatitis. I am not being unkind, but he bruises easily and that seemed to hurt him this afternoon when the hon. member for Woodbine said that, because he responded as though he had been stimulated by the point of a pin when the hon. member kept referring to that.

I thought it was very valid; I thought it was very apt to show the connection of this bill with typical Tory philosophy. Now there are Tories and Tories. There are the Tories who wrote the Royal commission on health services, and there are other Tories that wrote that Hagey report.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

I would remind the member that although this amendment is quite wide and has several sections to it and gives him a great deal of latitude, I think that at times he is straying perhaps a little too widely in his philosophy. I would ask the member to stick to the amendment a little more closely, if he could.

Mr. Sopha: Very well. There are Tories—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

I would remind members that I will keep the members speaking in order, and would ask them to await leave from the Chair to speak instead of interjecting.

Mr. Sopha: There is the one Tory, and I look across at some of them, Mr. Speaker, and

I do not see how they can support this bill. I do not see how the hon. member for St. George (Mr. A. F. Lawrence) can support it; I do not see how my alumnus, the hon. Minister of Education (Mr. Davis) can support it—to name two who deserve the appellation "progressive."

There is the one who, in connection with this bill says "They"—meaning the people—"simply do not want everything taken away from them by the state." That is a handsome statement.

Then there is the other type; and I want to read something to indicate the point of view of the other type. I hope you will agree with me, sir, that there is almost a perfect analogy with hospital care insurance and with medical care insurance.

Hon. Leslie M. Frost moved first reading of the bill intitled, The Hospital Services Commission Act, 1957. He said:

Mr. Speaker, in giving a very short explanation of this bill, because there has been considerable explanation given in the House heretofore, may I read the preamble which is part of the bill?

He read it.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the whole intent of this bill. The first part of the bill is really a re-enactment of the bill we passed last year. The second part of the bill deals with the needs of a hospital care insurance plan. I think it is thoroughly apparent to hon. members of this House that the action we must take under this bill is predicated at the present time on an agreement which is encompassed by the Porter-Martin correspondence, which was tabled in the House a few days ago.

Then he goes on to deal with the form of that agreement with the federal government and there is a brilliant interpolation, interjection, by the hon. member for Grey South (Mr. Oliver) and then he continues:

I would not like to say—

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): The hon. member would not like to say what the interpolation was?

Mr. Sopha: Yes. Yes, I will read it. It is very germane to this discussion.

May I ask the hon. Prime Minister a question? He said the plan would have to be cleared with the other provinces. What I want to get at is this, is it a fact that Ontario has moved closer toward the final composition of a plan than any other of the provinces?

That is the interjection of the hon. member for Grey South. That fits perfectly with what I was saying this afternoon about Ontario's responsibility to be the leader.

Mr. R. M. Whicher (Bruce): Why is there no interjection from over there?

Mr. Sopha: Just forgive me, Mr. Speaker, while I—

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Minister of Highways): Finds his place?

Mr. Sopha: Now, let me continue.

But perhaps in moving the second reading of this bill, I can make some comments from just a little different angle. I am moved to do this because I received comments from varying points of view. One of the points of view that I received from some people is the fact that this type of legislation goes too far, that it is involving the government and the public in commitments in what might be termed business which goes beyond the realm of government.

Now is that not a perfect antithesis to the remarks that I read of the hon. Prime Minister of this province at the present time? —

Mr. MacDonald: Socialism.

That is even worse. You see, this reads like a CBC script.

Hon. Mr. Frost: I may say I have always been open to new ideas, and I hope I will always remain that way.

Mr. MacDonald: Even if it is socialism?

Hon. Mr. Frost: I think I have been practical in that way, I have been practical in regard to these matters. I do not profess to be a reactionary. I profess to be a member of the most progressive of all political parties, the Progressive-Conservative.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sopha: Now, having made that bland and utterly indefensible statement, he feels an immediate need to come to the defence of it, for he says:

I have no apologies for that.

So he, too, is sensitive.

I think I belong to a school of thought that is very progressive. However, in line with what the hon. member says, I made this note or two before I came in here.

Just hearken to these words.

In some quarters, I am glad to say few and small, there is always a somewhat hysterical opposition to a project such as I propose to the House this afternoon in the form of second reading of this bill. I point out that the social system in Canada, if one wants to use the hon. member's expression, is socialistic in a sense.

Mr. MacDonald: So is our educational system.

Hon. Mr. Frost: That is right. However, I would say to the hon. member that my references to practical socialism and the application of it are quite different from some of the things that the hon. member has advocated, and some of the thoughts that were notably in the Regina manifesto that he threw into the bay. I come from a progressive school of thought, and a line of progressive political thought, and I am advancing one more change in this House this afternoon in the same sense this applies to our great water programme.

He then goes on to say something about the hydro-electric power commission. Then he goes on:

Insurance companies operating in Ontario—

Mr. Speaker: I confess that I cannot follow the analogy that the member is trying to relate in answer to the various clauses in the amendment proposed here by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Thompson). If he can point out to me the analogy a little more clearly, I shall let him carry on with Hansard, otherwise I would like him to get back on to the amendment which is before the House.

Mr. Sopha: I am completely subservient to you; I will obey your directions. I thought, as well as the amendment, that I was speaking to second reading of this bill.

Mr. Speaker: The amendment is before the House at this time.

Mr. Sopha: I thought this was a time when we make composite speeches both on the second reading and on the amendment.

The hon. Minister of Health, in introducing the bill, said this. The hon. member for Woodbine read it:

It will be voluntary. Although many cry for compulsion, an equal or even greater number cry out against it. The records in Ontario show that, given the opportunity, our people do not want, do not like and would rather not have compulsion.

I am merely demonstrating that if that is part of his, the hon. Minister of Health's, political philosophy, I am showing that there have been great Conservatives in the political life of this province who have different philosophies than that. We are asking for an extension of the benefits of medical care in line with the Hall report on a compulsory, universal, comprehensive basis and I was making the point of using the analogy of the hospital services insurance scheme. I want to read one more brief excerpt:

Insurance companies operating in Ontario have done a very marvellous job and I want to pay a compliment to those who are operating in Ontario and I hope they will continue to operate in Ontario and I know that they will. At the present time, we have between 3.5 and 4 million people covered by policies of private insurance companies. They may be co-operatives or they may be other types of companies but, in any event, they are not government subsidized companies. We have between 3.5 and 4 million of our people covered by policies that give them only partial coverage in regard to hospitalization. As with the case of power companies 50 years ago, it is impossible for these fine insurance companies, in any practicable combination I know of, to give to all of our people, regardless of the condition of health, financial circumstances and other conditions, complete hospital coverage which would be universal to all our people.

My point is that you could take those words of Mr. Frost, uttered on March 28, 1957, and you could translate them without the change of a comma to the principle of medical care. The words are as applicable, in our view, to medical care as they are to hospital insurance. He said that private companies cannot provide an adequate standard of hospital care. We say that private companies cannot provide adequate standards of medical care insurance, and upon that foundation we rest our case.

If we are wrong the electorate will tell us we are wrong, but we are convinced that we are right.

Now there are various types of Tory philosophy. Let me read this one.

In our complex society the individual has turned to government for assistance and government has responded by introducing broad social welfare and economic measures which provide basic services to the population. In the past 20 years there has been a steady shift in the nature of the demand for government services. While we still must provide such services as roads, water, schools, hospitals, more and more are we concerned with such measures as medical insurance, municipal planning, pensions, pollution control, post-secondary school education, welfare, hospital insurance, and many other programmes in the field of human capital and human betterment.

Apparently Tories can talk out of both sides of their mouth at once. They can say that in a significant document, the Speech from the Throne, and yet at another time and another place the hon. Minister of Health can say people revolt against compulsion. Compulsion in the orderly development of the state and in the use of those powers that only government has.

Government is unique. Compulsion, then, is the hallmark and, to analogize to the phrase used this afternoon, not compulsion for compulsion's sake, but compulsion in the orderly use of our resources to meet the greatest good of the greatest number. Again I say, and it could not be re-emphasized too much, that that is in the context that there can be no freedom, there can be no liberty, without security, the security of a state of health and economic security.

The British North America Act, I reflect, assigns to the province responsibility for health. The federal government is limited in its scope until it meets a responsive chord among the provinces for the development of a national plan. We charge that health, one of our most precious assets, is not receiving the attention that it deserves here within this province.

Again I reflect, sir, and not for the sake of repetition, that we have presently a great emphasis on education. I do not want to be laborious and I do not want to be flattering, but it appears that the hon. Minister of Education has taken hold of our whole educational field and he is bent—out of whatever stimuli that motivate him, maybe he has hyperthyroid glands, I do not know—but he is bent on revising and reforming and changing the whole thing.

Sometimes one wonders how much co-operation he gets from his hon. colleagues on the Treasury benches; but we wish there was the same concern about things of the body, about the health of the body. We see in this bill before the House that there is a marked difference in approach, Your Honour, to the care of the body than there is to the care of the mind. I am one of those that is suspicious when I see the old hackneyed phrases, the old shibboleths, being trotted out, plus some other arguments of an economic nature.

They say we have not got enough doctors. The hon. Minister of Health wails there is only one doctor to 976 persons in Ontario. Well, we might aptly ask: Whose fault is that? Whose fault is it? This party has been in power for 22 years. It had the opportunity over that space of two decades or more to build medical schools, to entice people into the very honoured and very historic profession of medicine. It occurred to me back in 1947, when I was told that that building over on St. George Street housed the only dental college in the province, the thought occurred to me a priori, in a state of ignorance, that that was not sufficient to meet the needs of our children, that great harvest of war babies that were coming along in the sixties.

Now I read to my dismay in the popular press that the services of an orthodontist have become a status symbol in this province. If you live in certain parts of the sprawling metropolitan area, then it is a matter of prestige if the child has his teeth wired up. He is different, he is better, he is higher in the social scale than the little boy from Cabbagetown. That makes me reflect about the pernicious aspect of this legislation, that I could conceive in my own mind that two children might be in the schoolyard of one of the schools of the hon. Minister of Education comparing their appendectomies and one would say to the other, "My father paid for my operation, yours did not"—class distinction.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sopha: Not at all, not at all, I could very well conceive that. I can very well conceive that, children's minds being what they are.

On the public dole! I can remember when I was a child, if hon. members want to get serious about this, I can remember when I was a child having to suffer the brunt of being told that my family was on relief. I can recall that.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: The hon. member had no corner on that.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): The hon. Minister has forgotten about it.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: That is what the hon. member thinks, he does not know what poverty is.

Mr. Speaker: Order, order!

Mr. Sopha: Then to haul in arguments of this type is unworthy of a person occupying the position of Minister of Health. Listen to this one:

Surely we have had clear and unmistakable evidence that compulsion brings in its wake many and great problems. Scarcely a month passes in which we do not read of the difficulties arising in nations and states where compulsory schemes have been introduced and imposed upon the people—France, Belgium, Italy, all have had serious difficulties within recent months with services not available because doctors were on strike.

Is the hon. Minister of Education suggesting that if we have a programme, a plan of national, universal, comprehensive medical insurance, that the medical profession in this province, in this country, is going to go on strike? Is he seriously suggesting that? I am sorry, the hon. Minister of Health. Is the hon. Minister of Health seriously suggesting that, or does he just use words for the sake of filling up the allotted time?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: You are a past-master at that.

Mr. Sopha: Then he goes on, carried away by his own exuberance in superficiality.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: That is the pot calling the kettle black.

Mr. Sopha: He says: "Britain is presently facing serious trouble with the plan there."

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Is that not so?

Mr. Sopha: Where is the evidence? Where is the documentation?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: All around the hon. member!

Mr. Sopha: Where is the documentation?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Read the British press.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order, order!

I would remind the members that the speaker is asking rhetorical questions and therefore they do not require an answer.

Mr. Sopha: He answers and I quote:

There will be no dramatic revolt by doctors such as occurred in Saskatchewan if the proposals set forth by the Royal commission on health services are adopted as law, said Hon. Matthew B. Dymond, MD, Ontario Minister of Health, here Monday night. Speaking as a doctor I have too much conscience to revolt like that.

I can't see the doctors across the country just giving up their patients to battle a national health plan. I don't think there will be a stream of younger doctors out of Canada either if such a plan is put into force.

The Windsor Star, September, 1964. He answered.

Having made the speech in Windsor, I ask him through you, sir, when the hon. Minister gets up, when he is going to speak, will he tell us why he included this pernicious paragraph in his remarks in introducing this bill in first reading?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Because I thought it very apropos.

Mr. Sopha: Then he goes on: "Need I remind the hon. members about what happened in Saskatchewan?"

Now what happened in Saskatchewan? This report tells us that the plan in Saskatchewan is working very successfully.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Ask Tommy Douglas!

Mr. Sopha: Val Sears of the Toronto Daily Star went across the country examining various medical care plans and he compared the Saskatchewan plan to the Alberta plan, much to the disadvantage of the latter. He reported to us as a result of his studies that in Saskatchewan, the plan being subsidized by the public purse, that the family of two or more pays $24 a year.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: And is Val an authority?

Mr. Sopha: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: He is?

Mr. Sopha: Well, I am saying he is a reporter; but I buttress myself much more strongly on the remarks of this document, which I have read from cover to cover, with the exception of some of the statistical summaries in it. The report of Mr. Justice Hall is that the plan is working very finely in Saskatchewan; and if hon. members want to know about doctors, I happen to have noted that after the plan went into the effect the increase in doctors amounted to 50, between the years 1962 and 1963. Instead of doctors leaving Saskatchewan, they were in fact coming in.

Mr. G. H. Peck (Scarborough Centre): What happened to the specialists? They left. They all left.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: One hundred left, but only 50 came back.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Sopha: I also read with some interest that the average salary in Saskatchewan was $26,000 a year.

Mr. L. Letherby (Simcoe East): Too much!

Mr. Sopha: Yes, I think that is too much. As a matter of fact, one of the pillars of the medical profession made a speech which I read some months ago in which he related to his brethren of the medical profession that probably the greatest ill that affected the medical profession was that they were making too much money. They were putting the ideals of mammon ahead of those of the social needs of the community, so he said. That was one doctor talking to another. The same thought might well be ascribed to the profession of which I am a member, and I readily admit it.

Hon. L. P. Cecile (Minister of Public Welfare): Oh, I would not do that.

Mr. Sopha: Basically—and I am taking the opportunity to examine the philosophical basis of the approach the government makes, and the approach we would make, if we were charged with the responsibility—the test of any worthwhile government health insurance plan, is whether it guarantees adequate medical care to everyone as a matter of right, not of charity, regardless of ability to pay.

This bill simply does not meet that test. One of the most shocking things about this bill, I discovered in my study of it, is that twice in its pages, it refers to classes. I have never seen a piece of social legislation in the six years that I have been a member of this august assembly, that referred to the people of this province and delineated them into classes. This bill does that. Twice.

I ask the hon. Minister of Health, when he rises, to let us hear whether this government is setting up a system of classes in this province. In section six, it provides a standard medical services insurance contract for persons of such classes as are designated by the regulations:

B. Provide standard medical insurance contracts for persons of such classes as are designated by the regulations.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: The lawyers wrote that.

Mr. Sopha: They ought to be ashamed of themselves.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: I agree with you, and I will tell them you said that.

Mr. Sopha: And I hope you will get them to revise it by withdrawing the whole thing. Not only section six, but the whole bill.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Too many lawyers!

Mr. Sopha: In this country, we talked about a national flag for half a century. We have considered some form of state intervention in the health field for 46 years.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: That was the Liberals.

Mr. Sopha: There is no use of linking me with my ancestry. I am not responsible for those people.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: I bet they did not see the hon. member in their crystal ball.

Mr. Sopha: I belong to the present party. I was a mere child. I was not born when this notion was first introduced.

You can take out of those 46 years, two significant periods. You can take out the period of the great depression, which lasted a decade of the 30s, then you can take out the period of the 40s in which the world was in a conflagration of world war. So, 20 of the 46 years can be removed.

However, we are told at this juncture of history, that is to say in the year of our Lord 1965, that we can afford the plan. We are told that in the report of the Royal commission, that the economy, the people of this country, can afford to pay for a comprehensive universal plan that will provide them with all the skills and all the knowledge and all the technical know-how that the medical profession now has to care for their health.

So, now is the time. We cannot afford, we say, to delay further. We cannot afford to reject the recommendations of this document. We cannot be satisfied, in a word, with the contents of this bill. And with the hon. member for Woodbine, with whom I am happy to be in a common cause, I hold out the olive branch to those people.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: They are knocking at the door to get in.

Mr. Sopha: In this great social area of social amelioration, we can make common cause, when we say that in 1965, we cannot be satisfied with the approach based on private profit that is inherent in this bill. The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Trotter) dwelt very eloquently on this section, and I would say that in the Roosevelt, in the Kennedy, and the Trueman, Mackenzie King tradition, it is morally wrong for any institution or any group of persons to make a profit out of the sale of health insurance. As a matter of philosophical basis with myself and other hon. members of this party, I say no person in this society has the right to make a profit out of illness.

I have looked at this dynamic statute. Everybody else has referred to it. I have looked at it, and it seemed to me that it talked more of insurance companies than it did about health. All kinds of provisions are interwoven into it for the protection of the insurance companies. There are all sorts of provisions for giving them the right to nominate various people to positions of influence over government policy inherent in its provisions.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Oh, no. Only one. Be honest, at least.

Mr. Sopha: Of course, I want to be honest.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Well, the hon. member does not try very hard.

Mr. Sopha: I make every effort. I am referring to the right to nominate people to this group called Medical Carriers Incorporated.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Well, that is their own body. That is their own corporation.

Mr. Sopha: Yes, their own body, which, with government blessing, is going to sell health insurance contracts in this province.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Oh, no, no, it is not. The hon. member has not read the bill.

Mr. Sopha: Yes, it is enshrined right in the statute.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): It is not statute yet.

Mr. Sopha: Then it talks a long time about the council. What is that council called?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Why does not the hon. member read the bill?

Mr. Sopha: Medical services insurance council.

Mr. Letherby: The hon. member had better give up and sit down.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Better set up a trans-fusion for him.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Speaker, would you tell the hon. member for High Park (Mr. Cowling) who has been here for more years than I, because I should not teach my grandmother to suck eggs, that it is against the rules of the House to refer to another member by his first name? I see no ringing declaration in it about the health needs of the people of our province. It is a pretty fallow and sterile and emasculated statute in my view.

One final word. Surely a healthy nation is more important to the future of Canada than anything else in this year. Surely there is nothing we ought to be more concerned about than the health of our people. I venture to say that the health of our people ought to exercise our attention far more than the provision we make for national defence.

I would that we lived in an atmosphere of world harmony where we could take all of those resources—our goods, our youth that we divert to the defence of this country, and put them into some sort of national health care scheme for our people. That is the kind of change I welcome.

The hon. member for Woodbine referred to that statement, "no change for the sake of change." But it ought to be said that to be a true Liberal is to believe that change is welcome, so long as that change is directed toward the betterment of the lot of our people.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Sopha: A Liberal is not afraid of change, he is not afraid to meet change, he is ready to experiment, he is ready to try new devices, new measures toward the furthering of the public good. The Tory on the other hand prefers the intellectual pre-disposition of the status quo.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Is it not odd the hon. member has sat there for 20 years?

Mr. Sopha: The hon. Minister does not want change, he wants to remain as he is. He relies upon tradition.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Is that why the hon. member sat there for 20 years? He is dreaming.

Mr. Sopha: We will not always be. The best stimulus to put us on that side is for the hon. Minister of Health to adopt that attitude of divine right and conceit that he is exhibiting.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: I am just asking the hon. member a factual question.

Mr. Sopha: Or if he introduces a few more bills like this one, it will hasten the change.

Mr. R. K. McNeil (Elgin): We will still be here and the hon. member will be over there.

An hon. member: Vote against it!

Mr. Sopha: In Canada, I say, we are not against government action, we do not fear the government. As Canadians and against the background of our history, we have grown into an attitude of trust of the government. We expect government intervention, we expect government direction. Government has operated in a friendly climate since this country became a nation.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: The hon. member's colleagues at Ottawa do not help him.

Mr. Sopha: Government built most of the capital works in the last years of the 19th century. Government has been accustomed to interfere in the economy to the extent of ownership of important sectors of it. The people have turned to government to meet the needs in areas of social distress.

Let me remind the hon. Minister of Health, and all else who would be willing to listen, that it is not yet 15 years since groups interested in the welfare of retarded children turned to government to fill in the vacuum, to cure the dislocation in that area and to take away the anxieties of people who were the parents of retarded children.

That part of our social philosophy and our social attitude toward government in this country is established, and it is idle for anybody on that side of the House to get up and try to attribute to our national character any fear of the spectre of government interfering in the affairs of people and taking away the ability of the individual to make decisions. That is nonsense and rubbish and deserves only to be put in the waste basket. So I say, against that background, where I have tried to explore the social philosophy, these are the things we will be pleased to say on the hustings about your bill. That no one—

Mr. L. M. Reilly (Eglinton): We are not a socialistic country yet.

Mr. Sopha: Oh, indeed we are.

Mr. Reilly: Oh, indeed we are not.

Mr. Sopha: Indeed we are. If the hon. member for Eglinton would but just open his eyes he would see that this is a socio-capitalistic society. If he would just come alive, he would see it. But however they view it, whatever point of view they take, I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that no one, no one with a social conscience can vote for this bill.

Mr. R. Gisborn (Wentworth East): Mr. Speaker, it goes without saying that I rise along with my party to oppose the principle enunciated in Bill 136 and support the amendment put forward by the Liberal Party. We oppose the principle of the bill because it provides a medical insurance plan with too little coverage at too high cost.

I might say, Mr. Speaker, I am sure of two things in my own mind: This piece of legislation is one of the most important that has been debated in this House since I have been a member and for many years prior to that. I believe the hospital insurance programme, which was debated, I think, in 1957 and came into effect in 1959, was one of the most important pieces of legislation.

Second, I think the volume of the report of the Royal commission on health services will be the most controversial subject that will be dealt with in this country for some time to come. I make that assumption based on the attitude of many of the provincial governments across the country.

It is surprising, Mr. Speaker, in this month of May in 1965, with so much uncertainty around the world, the great technological development, changes, the age of nuclear development, the benefits that we may derive from them and the hardships that we may face in the future because of these changes that at this time we are debating as to whether or not we will have a comprehensive medical insurance programme in the province of Ontario and eventually across Canada, when at the same time many of the countries in the western democracies have developed these programmes long ago and are now reaching out for new horizons in the social welfare field. One project of importance in many countries is income-maintenance; they have forgotten about the need and the arguments about comprehensive medical insurance programmes.

Mr. Speaker, many assertions have been made by those opposed to the principles of tax-supported universal coverage medical insurance:

1. It should be left to private enterprise since public coverage would remove the enterprise and competition of individuals;
2. If public funds are utilized, political bureaucracy will be rampant;
3. Universal tax-supported coverage will destroy the initiative and ambition;
4. Standards will be lowered;
5. Governments should only concern themselves with coverage for the needy;
6. Universal tax supported coverage is foreign to our country;
7. Requiring people to pay under universal coverage is dangerous and there is no confidence in compulsory equalization;
8. If all are covered through tax-supported funds, rancour, decay and discontent will ensue.

Mr. Speaker, I understand that all of the foregoing statements were taken from comments made in the United States 134 years ago, in 1830, by opponents of tax-supported education for all children within the population.

At that time the battle against universal tax-supported education was fought as bitterly as is the current battle by a minority against universal tax-supported coverage for medical care insurance.

Surely we must realize that good health is as essential to the well-being of a country as is the education of its people, so why must health be left to chance any more than education? Is private enterprise to dictate the terms under which we are going to treat our illnesses? Are we going to use human needs to serve the financial ends of the insurance companies?

Mr. Speaker, I repeated that—it has been said before many times—and I would suggest that the government withdraw Bill 136 and make it a requirement that all of the members of the Conservative Party who are hon. members of this Legislature read at least volume 1 of the Hall commission report. I think before they vote on this bill they should clear their conscience as Canadians and know exactly where they stand in regard to medical coverage.

As others have, I want to quote briefly from the report and I turn to page 6 in volume 1 and start at the third paragraph:

There are undoubtedly external forces causing us to explore new ways in which a democratic society can co-operate to enable its members and those of other societies to achieve a fuller life. One of these is the threat of totalitarian regimes with their professed greater concern for people. If a democracy fails to meet the legitimate aspirations of its people, there can be few who doubt that alien philosophies will win the right to try.

Another is Canada's membership in such special agencies of the United Nations as the world health organization, the international children's fund, the food and agricultural organization, the international labour office, all in some measure related to health. Apart from being bound by the various international agreements it has ratified, it should be remembered that this country, by signing the constitution of the world health organization, has subscribed to the following principles announced in the preamble to its charter:

"The enjoyment of the highest attainable standard of health is one of the fundamental rights of every human being without distinction of race, religion, political belief, economic or social condition."

"The health of all peoples is fundamental to the attainment of peace and security, and is dependent upon the fullest co-operation of individuals and states."

Thus, humanitarian considerations are at the source of Canada's concern with this situation, as much as her self-interest and formal international obligations.

The commission is convinced that, quite apart from humanitarian considerations, the health of Canadians is a matter of concern to us as a nation, and that no enlightened government can ignore that the economic capacity of its citizens to be productive depends upon their health and vigour as much as upon their educational attainment.

Mr. Speaker, I would quote further—just briefly—from page ten of the first volume, because I think it carries a message that all hon. members should be aware of:

The rationale of health insurance is now so well known and accepted that it scarcely needs restating. What Winston Churchill once described as "the application of averages for the relief of millions" is, in our opinion, absolutely essential for all but a small minority of wealthy Canadians. Many Canadians have availed themselves of the insurance mechanism, principally those who can afford the protection, or those who are in employment where coverage is provided or subsidized as part of their working conditions.

However large this group may be, it is not large enough. The national interest requires that the risk must be spread over the whole productive population to cover everybody, and not only those who choose to insure voluntarily. And the device must be used ultimately to finance the whole spectrum of health services, not merely hospital and physicians' services.

To make certain that all our citizens have access to the necessary health services is now clearly a matter for the public interest. That less than half of our population has some degree of reasonably adequate health insurance coverage for medical services is a matter of grave national concern, and of greater concern is the fact that few organized insurance programmes worth mentioning exist in equally important areas such as mental illness, dental, and optical care, drug requirements, retarded and crippled children.

These are the areas—environmental controls, education, facilities, personnel and universal availability and access to services—that now clearly constitute the public interest in health care and call for public action.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): That fellow Churchill was quite a Tory, too.

Mr. Bryden: He was certainly away ahead of you fellows, anyway.

Mr. Gisborn: I did not quote the Honourable Winston Churchill in total—there was just a brief reference to what he said.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Always start off with a good Tory comment—

Mr. MacDonald: Apparently the hon. Minister is immune to reason—even Tory reason.

Mr. Gisborn: Mr. Speaker, as a boy of a family of eight, in the early 1920s, I remember the continual indebtedness of our family to the family doctor, and one of my weekly chores at that time, among many, was to go to the grocery store each Saturday and pay the grocery bill for the past week and pick up the groceries for the coming week. A second chore I had each Saturday was to take what was left to the family doctor. This was one of the religions of my father, that food came first and then the doctor must be paid, and all were in sympathy with the fact that the family doctor had to wait and take what was left. This was not just my problem; this was a problem of many.

My early family life might have been somewhat the same, and during the early 1940s my wife and daughter were stricken with scarlet fever, and my daughter was left with a rheumatic heart. I remember that at that time—1941—we were on what was called compulsory savings, and we were requested to buy victory bonds, to make the sacrifice that everyone wished to make during the war years—the rationing and restrictions of wage increases and price increases. But these supplementary savings, and the victory bonds maturing in a year went directly to my family doctor for a period of three years to the extent of $1,800. At that time it was not just my problem. It was the problem of thousands of wage earners across the country, the continual indebtedness to medical services.

Of course, the coming of prepaid insurance programmes guaranteed, to some extent, the doctor his fee, and of course brought some degree of protection for the wage earner.

Mr. Speaker, when I became active in the trade union movement in the early 1940s it was not just because I thought there was a need for more wages and better conditions in the steel industry, but because of my studies of the aims and objectives for many years back of the trade union movement. The aims and objectives, as far back as 50 years from that time in the old trades and labour congress and subsequently in the Canadian congress of labour, were for the benefit of the community as a whole. On the resolution books you can find today resolutions that called for adequate workmen's compensation, adequate pensions for the elderly, adequate housing, unemployment insurance and foremost of all, reiterated year after year, was the resolution in support of a comprehensive national health insurance programme.

Now I say this, Mr. Speaker, because it has been said by many, particularly one speaker from the Firestone Company of Canada on behalf of the Canadian manufacturers association, that the trade labour movement was a self-centred, selfish group trying to take everything out of industry and put nothing back into the community.

But no group was more strongly in favour of these benefits for the community than the organized trade labour movement over the years. Of course, in this particular field, there has been support by many other organizations. The Hall commission report on behalf of Her Majesty's federal government brought great hopes for achievement in the field of health care for the Canadian people, and not without the greatest effort should we let an obstacle deter its implementation. To do so would mean we have forsaken our responsibility to the people of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, the trade union movement, as I have said, has fought strongly over the years for the kind of a programme that our party, and the Liberal Party, are in favour of, and the latest reiteration of this programme in opposition to the present legislation before us, was released by the president of the federation of labour. I would like to put it on record:

To the Honourable John P. Roberts, QC,
Prime Minister,
Province of Ontario,
Parliament Buildings,
Toronto, Ontario.

Honourable Sir:

The views of Ontario federation of labour on the matter of health care legislation have been brought to your attention on a number of occasions, and are therefore well known to you and your government.

Now that the medical services insurance bill is before the Legislature, we would again draw your attention to certain deficiencies in this proposed legislation. Specifically, our federation finds this bill unacceptable because of lack of universal coverage, the limitation of service, its high cost and its use of private carriers.

We believe any Medicare legislation must have as its basis universal coverage. This is essential if it is to provide maximum service at minimum cost. To try to equate universality and compulsion, as Health Minister Dymond seems to have done, doesn't make sense to us. With universal coverage we are convinced that a much wider range of benefits could and should be provided. Simply paying the doctor bills does not by any stretch of the imagination cover the cost of health care. Drugs, dental care, eye-glasses, preventative measures, rehabilitation and such are equally as important and at times even more costly than actual doctors' bills and should be included in any scheme.

While no specific figures are available, indications are that the cost would be very close to that recommended in the Hagey committee report. Using the $175 a year premium suggested by the Hagey committee and adding the $78 per year Ontario hospital services premium, a family would have to pay $253 for the limited coverage. This represents three or four weeks wages for the average family. In addition to this, drugs, dental services, etc., would still have to be paid.

We believe this to be excessive. Much of this cost is due to the reliance on private carriers. The Hall commission estimated that by using one public carrier rather than a multiplicity of private carriers, administrative costs could be reduced substantially.

For all of these reasons we would suggest that the bill be subject to careful scrutiny and the defects remedied before your government forces its passage in the Legislature.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Ontario federation of labour, the parent body in Ontario for the affiliates of the organized trade union movement, have participated in joint co-operation to scrutinize most of the health measures and problems across the province and to carry out their responsibilities in drawing public attention to this medical insurance bill. They did on Friday, May 14, and I quote from their release:

Our federation sponsored an informal meeting in order to obtain the views of representatives of other organizations on the revised medical care insurance Act introduced last week by the Ontario government. Leaders of 24 groups attended, representing farm, church, and social organizations in the province. Most, if not all of these organizations, had, like the federation, submitted their views to both the Hall commission federally and the Hagey committee provincially. Most of them had also questioned the adequacy of the original Bill 163 introduced by the government in April, 1963.

All aspects of the proposed legislation were discussed and with few exceptions the representatives of the organizations at this meeting voiced objections very similar to the federation's. This meeting confirmed that a great cross-section of the people of Ontario are dissatisfied with the proposed Medicare legislation and will seek to have improvements made. The stand taken by the Ontario federation of labour is outlined in the enclosed letter sent to Prime Minister Robarts. A copy of this letter will also go out to every member of the provincial Legislature.

Now, Mr. Speaker, along with the very documented absolute evidence of the Hall commission report, plus the feeling of a cross-section of organizations in our communities, I think it is well that hon. members of this House give a lot of consideration to the passage of this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I would also put before the House the feeling of an organization, a religious organization, the United Church of Canada. I am sure no one can deny that this organization has great or greater knowledge of the problems of the people in our communities in regard to health and welfare needs than any other group. They did submit a lengthy brief to both the federal commission and to the Hagey committee, but I would like to just quote part of their brief that indicates they have studied this matter for many years. I quote from part of their brief:

(a) The 15th general council, Hamilton, Ontario, September, 1952:

Be it resolved that this council expresses its considered opinion regarding national health insurance as follows:

1. Commend the federal, provincial and municipal governments concerned for progress made to date in providing more adequate health services, increasing the number of hospital beds and in related ways improving effective diagnostic, remedial and other forms of medical and surgical care and treatment.

2. Recognize the contribution that has been made by certain organizations and agencies that have promoted voluntary health and hospitalization plans.

3. Urge all responsible governmental authorities, in co-operation with the medical, dental, nursing and related professions, to move as quickly as possible to the establishment of an integrated and contributory national health plan.

(b) The 16th general council, Sackville, New Brunswick, September, 1954:

The resolution quoted above passed at Hamilton in 1952 was reaffirmed at this general council meeting at Sackville in 1954.

(c) The 19th general council, Edmonton, Alberta, September, 1960:

Whereas the cost of medical care and treatment, the heavy burden which many are unable to bear and whereas there are those who are deterred from seeking medical care and treatment because of the high cost involved; and, whereas existing medical insurance plans are inadequate to cover all medical needs;

and, whereas the 16th general council has endorsed an integrated and contributory national health insurance programme, it is recommended that this general council:

1. Re-endorse the principle of a national health insurance plan.

2. Commend the province of Saskatchewan for steps to be again taken to implement such a programme in the provincial level.

3. Urge the federal government, in co-operation with the medical, dental, nursing, pharmaceutical and related professions, to establish a comprehensive national health insurance programme.

Again, Mr. Speaker, there is evidence of the great need.

Now, I would just take a moment, Mr. Speaker, to refer to the concern of the hon. member for Scarborough North (Mr. Wells)—who is not in his seat—about the possible implementation of the New Democratic Party programme into the industry that has union-management sponsored medical insurance programmes. Some of them, as he said, are completely paid for by management. Some are partly paid for by management, but, nevertheless, partly negotiated by the unions involved. Certainly this is a method of covering their members with prepaid medical care. Whether or not they negotiate for complete coverage, or for partial coverage, is a matter of difference in any particular union.

My particular local union did not believe in negotiating for fully paid company plans, because we felt if we paid part of it, we would have better argument for having something to say about the administration and experience of such a plan. But the specific point the hon. member made was that what a situation we would be in if the New Democratic Party plan was implemented into General Motors, stating that they now pay $156 a year on behalf of the employees, and if our plan was implemented, then, based on our plan, they would pay a basic premium of $31.20, which would leave, in the hon. member's figures, $106 for the industry to pay.

But my figures show me that $31.20 deducted from $156 is $124.80. Nevertheless, it would leave a savings of $124.80 for the industry. He said that this would give General Motors a profit of two-and-a-half million dollars for that year.

He said, on the other hand, the employee would have to pick up the difference on the six per cent surcharge on his taxable amount, the amount he pays in taxes, basing it on $5,000. He said they then would be paying $18.60. So, he said, with our plan, General Motors would save two-and-a-half million dollars, and the employee, after paying nothing, would have to pay $18.60 a year.

Well, this might be the case, but I would just assure the House and the hon. member for Scarborough North, that all of the unions in Ontario, the organized unions in Canada, and particularly the UAW local in Oshawa, would heartily endorse this kind of a situation. To implement the New Democratic Party plan, they would forego the profit to the company happily. They have never been against General Motors making money. And they would happily pay their share for the balance of the contract.

Certainly the transition is always negotiated, as it has been in the hospital insurance programme, and will be in regard to the portable pension plan of Ontario, and the transition will be negotiated in good faith for the benefit of all, in regard to any kind of a health insurance programme.

With these brief remarks, Mr. Speaker, I hope that we can, before this measure is passed, convince the government that the bill should be either withdrawn, or drastically revised to implement some of the proposals put forward by the New Democratic Party and the Liberal Party in the House.

Mr. E. A. Dunlop (Forest Hill): Mr. Speaker, in his remarks addressed to this bill in the House yesterday, the hon. leader of the Opposition—and I am sorry to note that he has not been in his seat today—professed a very high respect for the report of the Royal commission on health services, prepared under the chairmanship of Mr. Justice Emmett Hall. I am sure that all hon. members of the House have the same high regard for that great work, which is serving, and will continue to serve well, the people of Canada.

In its 1,400-odd pages and its 256 recommendations, the report of the Royal commission on health services has given us a nearly all-embracing view of the vast array of services and facilities involved in Canada's health programmes, in the past, the present and the future. Indeed, the commission's review has extended not only across a very broad spectrum of services and facilities, but it has extended throughout seven decades, from 1921 to 1991. And we see a system involving hundreds of thousands of scientists, of professional and skilled workers and technicians, and thousands of millions of dollars invested in social capital in the form of educational facilities, hospitals, rehabilitation centres, convalescent centres, and all the panoply necessary to the health of our people.

I think that in their high regard for the report, certain hon. members opposite have, in some cases I am sure unwittingly, and in some cases I am sure wittingly, neglected the full import of all its recommendations.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote the words of Judge Hall, spoken in Toronto last September, as reported in the Canadian Tax Journal, when he was describing one of the significant problems which the commission faced, and he said:

It is the overemphasis given to the question of payment of physicians' bills, i.e., Medicare. No one would suggest that the payment of physicians' bills is not an important item, but it is after all but one item in the full range of health services, and it must not be permitted to dominate the whole field.

Mr. Sopha: I read that into the record, too.

Mr. Dunlop: You read the report of the commission and you will find that the text is different as reported in this speech in Toronto.

Mr. J. H. White (London South): Do not speak so quickly.

Mr. Dunlop: Now, Mr. Speaker, I feel that hon. members opposite have become obsessed with the question of the payment of physicians' bills. It is important, as Mr. Justice Hall has said, but in terms of expense it represents about one-fifth to one-quarter the total health services bill, both today and in the commission's future projection. The obsession that hon. members opposite have is with one particular means of paying the doctor's bill at one particular time, and that is universal, comprehensive, tax-financed medical services insurance now.

In his report Mr. Justice Hall referred to the great importance of priorities. Let me again quote from page 84 of the commission's report. He said:

A programme of health services should be provincially organized and administered with the staging, timing and scope determined by provincial governments.

Now that is what this government is doing at this very moment. It is presenting a bill which provides for the payment of medical services insurance on behalf of certain persons as part of its responsibility for determining the priority, the staging, the timing and the scope of services. It must be regarded as one measure in a programme for discharging its responsibilities which this government has been undertaking in the past, is undertaking today and will continue to undertake tomorrow. To the hon. members opposite obsessed with universal, compulsory, totally tax-financed payment now; and a tendency to regard the provision of health services as something of an iceberg four-fifths submerged from their view and one-fifth, the payment of the doctors' bills, blinding their eyes.

The Hall commission report, Mr. Speaker, did not settle the question of priorities. The commissioners said the first priority was of course to do something. They laid great stress on research, medical education, nursing education and the education of the other professional workers in the health field. They laid great stress on the development of adequate facilities, hospitals and so forth. They laid particular stress on amendments to the federal Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act to place the treatment of the mentally ill and the tuberculous on all fours with the treatment of the generally ill. At no point did the commissioner suggest that it would be possible to introduce their comprehensive programme before 1971, and that based on the assumption of the success of the crash programmes of medical and health personnel education which they recommended.

Now this government is doing something. It has not waited for the recommended conference, recommendation 199 in the Hall commission report, between the Dominion and provincial governments to determine the order of priorities. It has appreciated the report of the Hall Royal commission which can only strengthen its own view of these priorities. It has appreciated the Hall commission's reinforcement of its views as to what should be done in these priorities.

I will not review the entrance of government into the health and hospital field in the province. It has been done most excellently on the introduction of the bill by the hon. Minister, but I do want to refer particularly to the educational programme announced by the hon. Prime Minister on October 29 last, a $115 million programme for speeding up and enhancing our medical and nursing and dental education. Now this, along the lines recommended by the Hall commission, is doing something.

The amendment proposed by the hon. leader of the Opposition, I think, Mr. Speaker, certainly should not be approved. In subsection (a) it would direct the committee to bring in a recommendation leading to an immediate introduction of universal, compulsory medical services insurance. This would run counter to the recommendations of the Hall commission which urged a progressive implementation of a health programme and does not, I think, at any point suggest that universal, compulsory medical care insurance is the first priority. Thus the amendment, I submit, is running counter to the basic recommendations of the report of the Royal commission.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is a delusion to believe that any simple system for paying the doctors' bills, whether solely from taxes or otherwise, will of itself improve the quality and the distribution of medical care services. I think it is cruel to attempt to delude people that there is so simple a panacea for so complex a question.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to review briefly the situation before us and the principles embodied in Bill 136. The population of Ontario can be divided into two groups so far as their medical service insurance status is concerned: Those who have such coverage or do not need it or do not want it; and those who need such coverage and at the moment cannot get it, either because of age or state of health or their economic status.

Although the hon. member for Woodbine would be disposed to dispute the figures furnished by the Canadian health insurance association, I am prepared to accept that somewhere in the neighbourhood of 75 to 80 per cent of the people of Ontario have adequate medical services insurance today, adequate at least to their own wishes and desires. That leaves us then some 20 per cent, or perhaps less, who do not have such coverage and who may wish to have it. They cannot get it on account of their health, their age, their income status. Now it is to apply public funds to the needs of that group that this legislation addresses itself.

In addition to the provision for the persons of low income it will also provide certain improvements in the policies of persons already insured under private plans. Some people face the possibility of the cancellation of their insurance as their age increases or they show a frequent record of illness, but henceforward standard plans must be non-cancellable. Sometimes the private carriers who are doctor-sponsored, non-profit, co-operative and commercial, find it difficult to meet the so-called "bad risks." This legislation provides for a pooling of the so-called "bad risks" under the Medical Carriers Incorporated provisions, and enables the private carriers to cope with the problems of bad risks.

It provides for standard contracts but it does not make it necessary that the standard contract is the only kind of contract that can be written. It provides for the establishment of a maximum premium for standard contracts but it is a mistake to assure or to promote the idea that the maximum premium to be charged for standard contracts will be the generally applicable premium in the province. No change will be made in the excellent group provisions which already exist, and there will be no disruption of the satisfactory arrangements which have been so successfully developed in many companies through collective bargaining and otherwise.

A good deal of time has already been spent, Mr. Speaker, on the outline of the provisions to assist people of low incomes to obtain medical services insurance at rates which they can afford, and I shall not dwell further on that subject, save to say that it can hardly be called timid or inhumane to provide a first-class standard of medical services insurance for which 1,000,000 people in this province will be eligible at little or no cost. It can hardly be called timid or inhumane to provide a fine standard of medical services insurance for which 800,000 more people will be eligible with some degree of assistance, and which is not now available to them.

The hon. member for York South, Mr. Speaker, expressed concern about the costs which are estimated as being applicable to these provisions—some $70 million. I would not like to place my judgment against that of the actuaries, who have been retained by the government to develop that estimate. Still, he noted that it came to a per capita cost of something approaching $50 a year. I cannot believe that the cost will be as high as that and I will be surprised if the cost exceeds $50 million in the first full year of operation. I do not think we will find that it will be as he expressed it, a low-coverage high-cost programme. But that, of course, will be revealed in the accounts for the years 1966-67, and at the moment it is really a matter of speculation.

The hon. member for York South also suggested that a universal plan could be instituted now, and unlike the hon. leader of the Opposition he presented a plan by which that might be achieved. His recommendations, of course, run counter to the recommendations of the Royal commission on health services in many areas, as I am sure he knows very well.

The Royal commission on health services suggests that such a programme should be financed jointly by the federal and provincial governments, each paying about 50 per cent of the costs. This was its judgment after very careful review of the tax resources available to both levels of government, and the workings of conditional grant programmes in Canada. It did not suggest at any point that the plan should be financed by a provincial government out of its own resources.

Also, the Royal commission recommended that taxes for the support of medical care insurance should be visible taxes, and by that of course, it meant taxes which can be identified, such as the personal income tax and sales tax, but not corporation tax or excise tax, where you cannot identify the participation of that tax in the goods and services that we buy.

The hon. member for York South suggested that the costs of the programme of universal medical care insurance today would be about $165 million a year. In the very able commentary on his remarks made by my friend the hon. member for Scarborough North, he pointed out that that estimate was seriously understated by probably $60 million to $70 million a year. But even supposing the estimate was correct, this would require, under the proposal of my hon.

friend from York South, a six per cent surcharge on personal income tax, and a three per cent increase in corporation tax. I am sure he is sufficiently interested in economic planning and in strong central government, to wish to leave as many as possible of the instruments of fiscal policy in the hands of the federal government and not have individual provinces fragmenting the ability of the central government to direct our economy, by establishing different rates and especially fluctuating rates of taxation in the several provinces. This would be a disrupting force in our economy.

Mr. Speaker, I have been at many meetings where at various times medical services insurance has been discussed. One of the most common questions asked from the audience is, what's in it for me? This is an easy way for people to try to judge a complicated social measure, and it does not mean that they are so self-centred or so lacking in altruism as the question might seem to imply.

What's in it for me? The answer for the majority of people who already have medical services insurance, particularly where this is partly or totally paid for by their employer, is a very simple one. Whether it is a universal compulsory plan, as advocated for immediate application by hon. gentlemen from the other side, or whether it is this voluntary and, I grant, partial plan as proposed by the government, the answer is still this: For them there is nothing in it except the opportunity to pay a little more by way of taxes for the support of the insurance for those who do not now have it. I find most people are sufficiently altruistic when they find that really there is nothing in it for them, that they are still glad to think that the programme will be of help to others.

Mr. Speaker, this measure is a step in a long programme of priorities which has been developed by this government. I submit that it is the right step taken at the right time and I trust to see the defeat of the amendment and the passage of this bill through its second reading.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Forest Hill who has just completed his address to the House, I feel, has done a considerable service. Particularly in his introductory remarks where he dealt so thoroughly with the recommendations of the Hall report, which has been brought to the attention of the House so frequently this afternoon and this evening.

I would like to take a moment to read what I consider to be the basic recommendation and it is in the form of a proposal:

To establish a comprehensive universal health service programme which will be available to all regardless of age, condition, place of residence or ability to pay. The programme will cover not only medical care but the whole range of personal health services—

I might comment here that this is where the hon. member for Forest Hill indicated the submerged part of the iceberg was not something that we on this side were aware of:

—including prescription drugs, dental and optical care for children and public assistance recipients. Organized care for crippled and retarded children, prosthetic services and home care.

And he made the point that Mr. Justice Hall in his report, and, in fact, this government in its proposal, is bringing this into being in the province of Ontario in phases. And I would say that we on this side would not expect a plan as is suggested by the basic proposal of the Hall report to come into being full-blown and overnight. But I would submit to you, sir, that there is one part that does not admit of phasing. That is the word, the important word, "universal," which is interpreted by our hon. friends opposite as compulsory. I suppose we must accept the word as a proper synonym, with all the implications that have been put upon it, as that involved with what we, in a democratic Legislature, do not propose. Nevertheless, in this House, in this very session, we have had an opportunity to discuss and, in fact, support many proposals of the government which were in every respect compulsory—having to do with the economic business of the province, its education and in so many other areas with which we as members are so familiar.

So, I would submit to the hon. member for Forest Hill, and to those who agree with his position, that if one is going to stand up and be counted with those who are favouring a voluntary approach to this—an approach that we consider on this side to be completely inadequate when we see that it will not present the minimum requirements for an adequate health care programme to all the citizens of this province—that they in turn are establishing a precedent much more powerful than that which has been put before the people of Canada by the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. We, in the words of the hon. member for Sudbury, are at the fulcrum of this country, and what we decide to do here will in fact establish the future of medical care for this country for a good long time.

It is on this basis that I submit the hon. member's emphasis on phasing is misdirected, because his government is not in a position to phase universality. The legislation that is before us tonight is one that is going to be presented to the people on a voluntary basis and I would submit that there would be large areas or large groups in our population that will not have sufficient coverage, in fact any coverage at all, if this legislation is allowed to be passed into law.

Now, I would like to say, Mr. Speaker, that in spite of the government that we in this province have had for the past 21 years, we are, in fact, in an age of enlightenment that spreads over a large part of the world. Twenty-two years? I stand corrected; time does fly. We read the newspapers and after we get past the more interesting events having to do with our own political scene, it is apparent that we live in a world of disease, of hunger and, in many areas, mass destruction. Yet here in this Legislature the thing that concerns us more than anything else is how best to provide for adequate medical care and services for those people that we have the honour to represent. Surely it will be that, when the great day comes when wars shall cease and the swords shall be beaten into ploughshares, then in fact we will have the wherewithal to stop all talk of phasing and give the services that we so earnestly desire for the people of Ontario. But until that millenium arrives, we do have to accept the principle of phasing that has been described by so many hon. members in this debate.

Mr. J. R. Knox (Lambton West): The hon. member for Brant is making a better speech than his hon. leader.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, I would say that the one basic principle that I wish to refer to tonight has to do with this idea of universality, or the fact that this legislation should be amended so that it will be applied in a compulsory manner to, if not every, citizen of the province, at least practically all citizens of the province, so that all of us can fulfil our responsibility of assisting our fellow man; at the same time providing for the needs of ourselves and our families with a coverage that will be adequate; and with a sharing of responsibility that will bring the premium price to the individual family down to the level where all can participate, and a level of services that we consider necessary in 1965.

There is no one in this House who can say any representative of the Liberal Party would do anything but continue to respect and encourage the development and application of individual talent and initiative. The fact that we advocate a universality in the application of this legislation is something far from being against this individual initiative that we all know is so valuable in the development of our province and, as a matter of fact, our civilization. But we do know that the realization of the opportunity for the full life—the full, useful life of the citizens of our community—and the opportunity to undertake the pursuit of happiness cannot be denied to anyone because the basic needs of the individual cannot be met by individual endeavour. This is true in education. This has been brought to the fore several times already, as it is in health services.

I would say my friend, the hon. member for Sudbury, dealt very well with the compulsory aspect of education, not only in the matter of attendance, but in the matter of financing. He did digress a bit in referring to the hon. Minister himself and it seems to me we will have to make a caucus point of restraining ourselves when we tend to praise the hon. Minister of Education unduly and too frequently. If he listens too often to the Opposition, he is liable to get a swelled head. However, we would say that the principles that tend to have a compulsory aspect to legislation are ones that we are used to dealing with in this Legislature and in every other jurisdiction when the great good of the greatest number is what we are concerned with in that particular manner.

Now I would say, Mr. Speaker, that after dealing with education so extensively in the years past in this province, and in the years to come, and taking on ourselves as taxpayers such a heavy burden in the financing of education, we must realize that the fertile mind and the mind that has been well educated can be stifled by a sick body. If we consider investment in education as being the type that will give the proper return to the province of Ontario, then we must consider equally that investment in medical care will return an even greater amount of good as far as our responsibilities are concerned.

Now at times I am under the impression that the debate is whether or not Mr. Justice Hall in his report has given us a document that is worthy of respect and worthy of direction, as far as government policy is concerned, in Ontario. I do not believe that there are too many hon. members of this House who have studied the document as carefully as, let us say, the hon. Minister of Health, the hon. member for Sudbury, and perhaps a handful of others. But when the hon. member for Forest Hill tells us that we on this side are obsessed with only a small amount of knowledge that might be available from this report, I would submit to him, sir, that outside of himself and his seatmate, the hon. Minister of Health, there is no group in the Legislature more concerned with seeing that the legislation that is put into effect by this House in the future, concerning medical care, should follow the principles laid down by Mr. Justice Hall in this excellent report, which I feel should be the guiding principle of the introduction of medical care in the provinces of Canada. It is accepted by all, even the federal leader of the Conservative Party, who has embraced it in toto, and the recommendations contained in it should be a guide for the deliberations of every Legislature and the Parliament of Canada, when they are considering this very important topic.

I submit, sir, that the decision of this Legislature is going to have great effect across Canada, much more effect than the decisions of the Legislatures of Saskatchewan and Alberta have had in the past. It is in this light that we must view our special responsibilities as members of the Legislature of the province of Ontario, the banner province of Canada in many ways. It is our responsibility to lead. It is our responsibility to accept the Hall commission report as what it is—the outstanding document for the guidance of any government body, for the years that remain in the 20th century, in the establishment of these services that are so important to the development of our community.

As I say, our pattern will be the deciding factor. The basic recommendation that cannot be phased and the one that is ignored by this government, is the recommendation for universality that is stated clearly and without equivocation by the report that so many hon. members have dealt with today.

There are many things to be said for a voluntary application. For one thing, it will enable the government to satisfy certain groups in the community that feel that the status quo, as far as medical insurance is concerned, should be maintained. But I would say that the voluntary method is going to be useful only for those who primarily are able to look after their own responsibilities as far as insurance is concerned.

This would include all the hon. members of this House, many of whom I suppose do not have adequate insurance, because they feel that under the circumstances, any emergencies that may arise they can meet on a personal basis. I would say that voluntary insurance would certainly be sufficient for large numbers in this province who are employed in industry where, by negotiation over the years, the industry itself has accepted the main responsibility for paying for adequate and complete medical coverage.

But this means that large numbers are going to be left outside the purview of the bill that is before us. Those who are aged, those who are chronically ill, those who are self-employed and those working in small establishments, are going to have to apply their own initiative to a great extent. They are going to have to squeeze their budgets to pay for a premium of great size, but we are not informed specifically of its size by the hon. Minister.

It seems to me that after 35 years, the insurance industry in Ontario has covered just about all the voluntary aspects that are going to get the coverage under that basis. Three-quarters of the people in Ontario, of course, do have some type of coverage. It is inadequate, certainly by the researches that the Hall commission has done, and it would remain for a universal plan, a compulsory plan if you like, to give us the coverage that we need.

There are many drawbacks to a voluntary plan. Those who are healthy, wealthy and young, are not going to see fit to invest in the large premium that is required. And because they will not enrol in the plan that the government proposes, they will not be in a position to take part in the levelling out of the premium aspect to those who do need it, because they are in a group that would certainly not benefit very greatly from it. They will not have an opportunity then, except through their share in taxation, to share in this responsibility. As a matter of fact, the government programme itself, which will be applied by a branch of The Department of Health, will have a government-sponsored programme for those who do not pay income tax, and this will not be available in any way, even on a voluntary basis, for those who wish to enrol. Therefore, although they are put in a position of supporting this with their tax money, a good many people in this province are not going to have the government plan available to them and they will not have the funds themselves to pay the high premiums that we would expect would be found in the voluntary plan that the government is proposing.

It is also true, Mr. Speaker, and I am not in a position to say how extensive this would be, that there are certain people in our community—one might call them lazy and irresponsible—who will not avail themselves of the opportunity to cover themselves and their families with the basic plan that would be made available by this legislation. All of us, as members, have had to deal with citizens in our community who have not availed themselves of the opportunity of coverage with the hospitalization plan, and frequently through inadvertence, and perhaps irresponsibility, the plan has been allowed to lapse. When they then come forward with a claim, we all know of the great difficulties associated with this and associated with the worst aspects of any voluntary plan.

But we find that the bill that is before us will set up another bureaucracy that will administer the part of the plan that would be available to those who would not pay premiums. This would be in addition to the present large staff that applies the hospitalization plan, and it seems to me that this is unnecessary duplication. Surely the facilities that are under the direction of the hon. Minister of Health, or at least the Ontario hospital services commission, might be combined very efficiently to apply the plan in this regard.

We have said something about means tests. It seems that the government feels that by applying the means test to the income tax requirements, it has removed any odium that might be associated with it. But in the bill that is before us, it is not clear precisely how this means test would be applied. It is known that this government does not have access to income tax data, and certainly we would expect the hon. Minister to clarify this point, because if the means test is to be applied, this would certainly add to the bureaucratic requirements. As my hon. leader pointed out in his speech, moving the amendment to the bill that is before us, it is true that if one sets a standard means test as the government proposes, a person's means changes and fluctuates and it would have to be a continuing test, with all of the expense, difficulty and red tape that would be entailed as an individual citizen's means go up or, unfortunately, down. There is going to be a great deal of difficulty that should be explained by the hon. Minister before the bill is carried to any further stages.

I feel that the government plan combines the inefficiency and high cost of the voluntary schemes, with the double bureaucracy of two provincial offices for government coverage of essential health services, and I feel that this is done without assuring that the basic problem will be met.

The hon. Minister of Health has said in the past that he assumes everyone would join the plan that would be made available. But it is true that in Alberta, where a somewhat similar plan is available, 15 per cent of the population has not touched the plan in any way and there is every reason to believe that among that 15 per cent are a large number who require this coverage. This is a problem that the government plan does not meet.

Very briefly, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say something about the supposed virtue of the free enterprise application in hospital insurance, or, I should say, in medical insurance. In my own constituency of Brant, there are, of course, many citizens who have a variety of coverage but the Physicians' Services Incorporated coverage is generally used.

I would like to recall to your mind, sir, that I believe it was in last July that PSI undertook an expensive and expanded advertising campaign in many areas across the province, Brant county included, in which there was a supreme effort to enrol everyone who could possibly be enticed into the plan. There were spots on the radio about every ten minutes. It reminded me, actually, of the provincial election campaign of 1963 when the Tories were dominating all of these media; you would almost think they had the same sources of funds. The PSI advertising extended from radio into television and full-page ads in the newspapers. But believe me, the doctors themselves are the best salesmen for their own campaign and for their own plan and a good many people whom I know personally were enrolled at that time in PSI.

You know, sir, it was not but a matter of weeks following this extensive campaign that the directors of PSI raised the premium considerably, from between 12 and 20 per cent, so that the very first premium that was paid after the initial premium was raised by, in many cases, an amount of 20 per cent or more. I do not know of any single instance that has occurred in my brief public life that brought more of an outcry from a good many of the constituents in my area, who had been enticed into the plan under circumstances that were put to them by the very best advertising methods that were then available. And within a very few weeks the whole basis of the contract had been changed.

It was quite within their rights to withdraw. They had made changes in the plan, they had left one insurance company and joined another. At that time, I went out of my way to question a number of doctors who, of course, were committed to the plan themselves and certainly did everything they could to advance it.

I am deeply impressed with the concern for the medical profession, particularly those in it who work in rural areas, those whom I know personally, from their efforts to be of great assistance in these rural areas. The miles they drive, the services they render are unknown to a good many of those practitioners who are living, I suppose, a life of comparative professional ease in some of the more metropolitan areas.

But these professional gentlemen were able to point out to me the fact their expenses had gone up tremendously, because we, as citizens in rural areas, expect most of the facilities that can be found anywhere else in the province. Our doctors have electronic devices that answer the phone for them while they are out on calls, so that we can always get in touch with medical assistance. And it was brought home to me in the very best way that the advances in the premium were justified by the requirements that the doctors themselves had from the fund.

But at the same time, there were other competitive organizations in our area offering medical insurance. I would say the outstanding one was the local medical cooperative, which has a large and extensive coverage in Brant county. It is interesting to note that for a considerably lower premium, the Brant county medical co-operative is able to pay the local doctors 100 per cent of the OMA schedule, whereas the PSI premium is a bit above it, as a matter of fact considerably above it, and I understand pays the doctor members of PSI somewhat less than 100 per cent of the tariff—somewhere around 85 to 90 per cent.

So I would say that the co-operative insurance companies have an outstanding record, and they are really a non-profit organization. Their overhead is very low, and they are able to offer this service to citizens of the counties where these co-operatives exist. I know that they are widespread across the province, and there are a large number of our citizens who have availed themselves of this type of insurance.

But I think back to the campaign of PSI, which was supposed to blanket so many areas of the province, and the fact that if the medical co-operative was going to stay in business at all they had to meet this advertising campaign with expenses of their own. One need only read the annual report of these two organizations to see that as non-profit organizations, a good amount of their overhead was actually used up in the good old free enterprise competition that I have described to hon. members, involving radio, television and the newspapers, in an effort to wean allegiance of the citizens from one plan to the other.

I do not think this is in the general good. I feel that in this case, the citizens themselves are paying for these elaborate advertising campaigns, and although I have great regard for both of these medical insurance plans, it still is the reason why there should be a universal plan, government-sponsored, which would in fact see to it that every dollar of the premium is applied to an overhead that can be justified. More than that, to the provision of the services that are the main reason for these plans existing.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that the premium proposed in the basic plan in the government bill is unknown. We have heard several estimates of its size, but whatever it is it is going to be crushingly high when one adds it to the already very high hospitalization premium that was raised 52 per cent, just a few months ago. The responsibility, then, for the provision of medical care through premiums, is becoming very high indeed, and I would submit to you, sir, beyond the reach of a good many of our citizens who are in the income tax paying bracket.

The Hall commission which, by the way, is a far more detailed work than anything that has been presented to this House for our consideration, also rejected the voluntary aspect for statistical reasons.

I want to refer to a few statistics here which I feel are very important. The Hall recommendations estimate that the average Canadian family would have to pay a premium of $345.60, practically $350—this was in 1963—to be fully covered for medical and hospital services, dental care, drugs, optical services, nurses' care, the works. No one is proposing at this stage that a plan with that expensive coverage would be enacted immediately. We have all been talking about phasing. This is our goal. But as a matter of fact, a citizen who requires these services, if he were to be covered by insurance, would have to pay a premium of about $350.

Assuming, as the Hall commission did, that such services should be no greater in cost than about five to seven per cent of a family's income, then it becomes clear that a family must earn between $5,000 and $7,000 a year if they are going to be able to adequately provide on a voluntary basis for their medical needs.

It was the conclusion of the Hall commission that too many Canadian families—a large number of Canadian families—earn salaries below this level and, therefore, a voluntary scheme could not possibly meet their needs. They asserted that a voluntary scheme was primarily suited for those who could look after themselves, and for organized groups, especially those with stable employment, where the employer makes a substantial contribution to the premium.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Ontario government offers a scheme through which, on a voluntary basis only, free or subsidized coverage would be offered to a smaller group than that which Hall said would be unable to afford the premiums. For the average family discussed above, if it was to earn an income of more than $3,700, it would be without any assistance in meeting the medical care premium. This leaves a $1,300 income gap between the Ontario plan and the minimum set by Hall.

According to the latest figures issued by The Department of National Revenue in Ottawa, almost 20 per cent of the tax returns from the province of Ontario showed incomes in this range, from $4,000 to $5,000. In other words, 20 per cent of our people are going to be out of the range of the help that the government offers and they are going to be $1,000 below the income level that Mr. Justice Hall in his report said was essential if they were going to be able to look after themselves adequately.

We have to add to this number of people those with an income from $3,700 to $4,000. We find that in all about 25 per cent of our citizens are going to be in the income range where they will not receive assistance from this bill, and according to the recommendations of the Hall commission, they do not have the wherewithal to adequately provide for themselves.

I feel that this is a serious gap, including a large number of people, and something that the government cannot afford to overlook as it introduces this legislation, which it so proudly refers to as voluntary. These people, then, have the freedom to go without. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that this bill could be amended in such a way that the coverage would be made available for them, and that we would be following the recommendations of the report that is surely the guide for any government in introducing legislation of this type.

I would say, sir, in closing, that the amendment before the House standing in the name of the hon. leader of the Opposition provides a means for correcting the mistaken approach that this government has taken. It is before the House at the present time, it is being fully debated, and as I have said, we in Ontario are leading the way, more than any other province could possibly do. Our responsibility is clear and I recommend that the amendment be carried.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour) moves the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will have estimates and on Friday we will deal with estimates and go into committee of the whole House.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): What is the order of the estimates?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Treasury and Agriculture.

Mr. Speaker, the House will sit tomorrow evening.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 10:20 o'clock, p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

THURSDAY, MAY 27, 1965

The House met at 3 o'clock, p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: We are always pleased to have visitors to the Legislature and today we welcome as guests, in the west gallery, members of the women's institute, Ivy, Ontario.

Presenting petitions.

Presenting reports by committees.

Mr. T. L. Wells (Scarborough North), from the standing committee on education, health and welfare, presented the committee's report, which was read as follows and adopted:

The committee begs to report the following bill with certain amendments:

Bill No. 119, The Child Welfare Act, 1965.

Mr. Speaker: Motions.

Introduction of bills.

UNIVERSITE D'OTTAWA

Mr. F. Guindon (Stormont) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act respecting Université d'Ottawa.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Mr. A. F. Lawrence (St. George): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member mind giving an explanation?

Mr. F. Guindon (Stormont): The citizens of this province should feel a sense of pride and satisfaction in the knowledge that Ontario possesses a sound system of higher education. Having been built over a lengthy period of time on a firm foundation, it is not only growing larger year by year but also stronger. Credit for these circumstances can be given to a significant number of persons and organizations, not the least of whom are the many educational leaders who have served the cause of higher education in this province over the years.

If a single group of individuals had to be selected as having made the greatest contribution, however, it would be my opinion that such honour should be designated for the founding fathers of this province. For it was their foresight, more than a century ago, when Ontario was little more than a wilderness, that led to the establishment of a university that would serve the needs of our citizens, and it was from their foresight that evolved a system of government support to higher education on which sound future growth was able to take place.

As has been explained in this Legislature on several occasions, it has been the policy of successive governments of Ontario for close to 100 years to direct financial assistance to those institutions of higher learning which are free of the restrictions and control of any single religious body. This policy was initiated by Robert Baldwin with the introduction of an Act creating the University of Toronto in 1849 and confirmed, so to speak, by the decisions of the government of John Sandfield Macdonald shortly after Confederation. From these decisions emerged a new concept which, while unique to Ontario in its time, has since been imitated in various other jurisdictions.

This concept was the federated university, an organization which allowed a strong central institution, receiving the benefits of full government support, to work in conjunction with one or more religious colleges. The latter, relieved of the heavy financial burden of certain aspects of the university programme, have been able to concentrate their attention, efforts and financial resources on those areas where they were best able to make a contribution. A sound, co-operative system of higher education has been the result.

With this policy clearly established and having the full support of the people of the province, a number of our institutions of higher learning have reorganized under independent boards of governors and have thus qualified for provincial assistance. In the early part of this century, Queen's University at Kingston and the University of Western Ontario both carried out such changes. More recently, McMaster University at Hamilton and the University of Windsor have been re-organized along non-denominational lines. At the same time, institutions such as Laurentian University of Sudbury and the University of Waterloo have developed as federated universities from what had previously been more strictly denominational bases.

Some time ago, the government was approached by the council of administration of the University of Ottawa, an institution which has been operated to the benefit of this province for nearly 120 years by the order of the Oblates of Mary Immaculate. The council submitted a proposal by which this bilingual institution might also be reorganized under an independent board of governors. I am pleased to report that the discussions which followed have led to an agreement which will remove the University of Ottawa from religious control, qualify it fully for provincial support in all aspects of its operation, and lay the foundation for extensive future growth and development. The new organization of the university is set out in the bill that has just been introduced.

The University of Ottawa is one of our oldest and proudest institutions. Its founding dates back to the year 1848 when, under the leadership of Monseigneur Joseph-Eugene Guigues, the order of Oblates of Mary Immaculate established St. Joseph's college in what was then the village of Bytown. The following year, the Legislature of Canada granted the institution its first charter, under the name Bytown college, and the college operated a full grammar school programme under this title until 1861 when, consistent with the change in the name of the community in which it had been founded, it became known as Ottawa college. In 1866, one year prior to Confederation, the government of Canada amended the charter of the college to give it degree-granting powers, and it has operated with full university status since that time. Perhaps it is significant that just one year short of a century later this proud school has reached another milestone in its history.

It was in 1933 that the Ontario Legislature last approved a new charter for the institution, and it was at that time that it assumed the name University of Ottawa. The Act of that year has been the basis of the university's operation ever since and shall, as the hon. members of the House will observe from the Act being presented, continue to be the charter for the new St. Paul university, an institution through which the Oblate Fathers will continue to render direct service to the Ottawa area and to this province.

Over this period of nearly one and a quarter centuries, in which the University of Ottawa has served our people so fully and so well, a number of characteristics have come to be associated with the institution. One, as is well known to hon. members of this House, is a tradition of achievement and scholarship which has few parallels. Its graduates occupy important posts throughout this nation and, indeed, beyond its borders, and reflect in an effective manner the pursuit of excellence that has for so long motivated its alma mater.

A second, and important characteristic of the University of Ottawa, has been its willingness and ability to adjust to the changing needs of the Canadian society. This is reflected, in part, by the growth of the university over the years—not only in size, but in breadth and depth. At this time, the institution offers one of the widest ranges of programmes and courses in Ontario, a factor that will give the new governors and administration an extremely strong basis for future growth.

Monsieur le Président: Je suis très sensible à l'honneur qui m'échoit aujourd'hui d'introduire un projet de loi visant l'Université d'Ottawa. A titre de diplômé de cette noble institution, je ne puis évoquer le souvenir de mon alma mater sans en ressentir une vive émotion car aujourd'hui nous écrivons une nouvelle page dans l'histoire de cette université. Il tient du prodige qu'une institution, forcément limitée par ses sources de revenus, ait pu grandir et atteindre l'importance, l'envergure et le prestige qu'elle détient dans le domaine du haut-savoir.

Je voudrais rendre un bref, mais vibrant hommage de reconnaissance à la congrégation des Oblats de Marie Immaculée. Grâce à leur zèle intrépide, à leur dévouement inlassable, à leurs sacrifices incalculables, Les Oblats de Marie Immaculée ont édifié une institution séculaire qui n'a cessé de rayonner non seulement en Ontario mais dans le Canada tout entier. Les changements rapides et radicaux qui s'opèrent dans le domaine de l'éducation, tant au Canada qu'à l'étranger, furent une cause de soucis et d'inquiétudes pour les autorités de l'université. Après mûres réflexions et longues et exténuantes discussions, le conseil d'administration de l'Université d'Ottawa et le gouvernement provincial finirent par tomber d'accord sur une formule qui permettrait à l'université de s'épanouir davantage et de répondre aux besoins toujours plus grandissants de notre jeunesse désireuse de fréquenter nos universités.

Espérons qu'avec le concours de la divine providence, la voie dans laquelle nous nous engageons est celle qui conduira aux cimes des plus grands succès.

Most important of all, however, in the light of the present Canadian scene, is the bilingual nature of the university and its programme. A detailed review of the history of the University of Ottawa would show that over the years there have been periods in which the emphasis upon both the French and English languages as media of instruction has varied, depending on the particular circumstances of the era. Throughout the twentieth century, however, the university and its staff have been dedicated to the goal of making the University of Ottawa a truly bilingual institution—a place of higher learning where both English- and French-speaking students are assured of a sound education, an opportunity to learn of and appreciate our two major languages and cultures, and a chance to live and learn within a single educational environment which reflects our mixed heritage. Nothing could be more important at this time than the fact that such an institution should exist. Nothing could be more important than its growth and development. Nothing could be more important than the fact that it be encouraged and supported in the attainment of the ideal which it seeks. That is why this new charter, and the new organization and strength which it gives to the university, is so appropriate and so necessary at this time.

It is not possible to find adequate words of praise for the members of the Order of Oblate Fathers on this occasion. Particular commendation, in this regard, should be paid the Very Reverend Henri Legaré, recently retired rector of the university, and the Very Reverend Roger Guindon, the present rector. It was during the rectorship of Father Legaré that discussions on possible changes within the administration of the University of Ottawa first showed that an acceptable change of pattern could be attained. It was more than fortunate, therefore, that when the system of appointments used by the Oblate Order resulted in Father Legaré's retirement in July of 1964, he was succeeded by a man with equal dedication and foresight. Father Guindon, despite the heavy burdens befalling him in his new and most responsible office, ensured that the trend of events continued at a steady pace and, indeed, it is largely through his leadership that this final, satisfactory solution has been reached.

The University of Ottawa, as it exists today and as it points to the future, is solely the result of the efforts of men such as Father Legaré and Father Guindon, and of those of the teaching and research staff of the university whom they have gathered around them. Their dedication and sense of vision have been the foundations on which the University of Ottawa has been built, and it is these characteristics that have led to their decision to turn over the reins of control to a larger section of our community. That the members of the Oblate Order will continue to serve, through the federated University of St. Paul's, is a clear indication of their willingness to support and encourage the reorganized university in future years as they have so effectively done in the past. For this we can all be grateful.

And now we move to a new era. Under the new, independent board of governors, most of whom are named within this Act, the university must look to the years that lie ahead. They will be years of challenge and opportunity for our entire system of higher education and they will be years of trial and problems. That such a group of citizens, most of whom are already burdened with heavy responsibilities, are willing to undertake the challenge should be a lesson to all of us.

The University of Ottawa must and will play an increasingly important role in higher education in the province. The way is now cleared for it to do so. I have every confidence in the success it will meet.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I want to say at the outset that I, personally, welcome the introduction of this bill; a bill which will place the University of Ottawa on a non-denominational basis, so that there will not be discrimination in grants to it in the future—as there has been in the past—as one of our institutions of higher learning. It is a bill that I think should be welcomed in this House and I assure you that we in this party will support it.

But, Mr. Speaker, I rise on two points. First, I think the House is entitled to an explanation as to why this bill was not introduced as a government bill. All other legislation in connection with universities this year has been introduced as government bills. Second, Mr. Speaker, I cannot let this occasion go by without pointing out that the rules of this House stipulate that, on first reading, there is a brief explanation as to the purport of the bill, not a long historical essay which would be appropriate at some other time. We on this Opposition side of the House have attempted many times to give even a brief explanation of a bill, let alone a long speech which would be appropriate at another time, and we have been cut off.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, this is out of order. And if we are going to keep from straying further from the rules of the House, we just cannot tolerate this kind of thing. Otherwise we, on this side of the House, are entitled to it also.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I speak to this point? I recognize that the procedure we followed this afternoon was not exactly ordinary. I was rather interested to have the hon. member for Stormont introduce this bill, as I believe he is the only graduate of the University of Ottawa who sits in this House.

While the procedure may be, as I say, somewhat out of the ordinary, on the other hand this bill, as has been pointed out, is somewhat out of the ordinary, too, and I think all hon. members of the House on all sides are very interested in what it is going to accomplish.

Mr. MacDonald: Why is it not a government bill?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: It is a government bill. If the hon. member will notice, it was seconded by the hon. Minister of University Affairs (Mr. Davis). For a very personal reason, we asked the hon. member for Stormont to introduce it. We thought that from his position as a graduate, there would be some historic significance to this day, and that is the reason that this procedure was followed.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, my point is directed wholly then to the latter part of my remarks, with regard to what is legitimate on first reading, because I think we should have clarification, for our guidance in the Opposition, as to what are our rights.

Mr. Speaker: The member was asked to give an explanation. Although I agree with the member for York South that perhaps the explanation was longer than is ordinarily the case with most bills, I allowed the member to continue because of the distinguished delegation that was present today. Since he is a graduate of the university, I thought perhaps we should give him some extension of the rules.

THE HOSPITAL SERVICES COMMISSION ACT

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Hospital Services Commission Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would explain the purposes of the bill.

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, as it happens, I have a half-hour presentation relating to the introduction of first reading of this bill, but in deference to the hon. Prime Minister and the Speaker, I shall abbreviate myself to the following short explanation.

The amending bill is a simple procedure, designed to have The Hospital Services Commission Act parallel the basic principle of the newly proposed Medical Services Insurance Act. It would provide continuity of hospital coverage to persons who are unemployed or without income due to illness or disability.

For some years we have argued that paying of hospital premiums sometimes five or eight months in advance, imposes an intolerable hardship on a wage earner whose income has suddenly been sharply reduced. Being faced with a huge bill for hospital insurance, he often decides to drop it for the time being, until he has been restored to gainful employment.

It has been our contention that arrangements should be made to continue payment of hospital premiums for anyone who finds himself in this kind of situation. Under its new Medical Services Insurance Act, the government agrees with this contention. Section 7 reads:

Any person who is unable to continue payment of his medical services insurance subscription because of lack of income due to unemployment, illness or disability may within the first 30 days of such default make application to the council for assistance during the period of unemployment, illness or disability, to continue his medical services insurance contract or toward the purchase of a standard contract.

My proposed amendment will extend the same right of assistance for hospital purposes.

I thank the Speaker for allowing me to participate in this precedent-making explanation.

Mr. Speaker: May I say to the member that it really is not precedent-making, because his colleague, the member for Riverdale (Mr. Renwick), was allowed to make an explanation of his bill just a little more than a week or two ago. I may say that if any member has a bill to present to this House, he will be allowed to give an explanation on its introduction.

Mr. A. F. Lawrence: If requested.

Mr. Speaker: Whether requested or not. If the member wishes to give an explanation, it may be done.

The member has a question before the orders of the day?

Mr. S. Lewis: Yes. I should like to direct my question to the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond), notice of which has been given.

In view of the statements made at yesterday's inquest by Dr. Davidson, ward supervisor in Toronto Ontario hospital, and Dr. Paul Christie, superintendent at Toronto Ontario hospital, would the hon. Minister inform the House: (1) what he intends to do about the question of staff morale, and (2) what the present staff complement is and what it desirably should be in the respective categories of (a) psychiatrists, (b) psychologists, (c) social workers, (d) nurses and (e) attendants?

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): Mr. Speaker, it appears that the hon. member assumes the statement regarding the level of staff morale is to be taken at face value as reported in the press. This is a statement of one man and may very well be the statement of his own morale, rather than that of the staff generally.

However, we are always concerned that staff morale be maintained at as high level as is possible. At a big institution internal improvements are constantly required to be made, and these we are attempting to make.

There is, however, one factor which is external and potent and one over which I have no control. I have been repeatedly advised, and more so particularly in recent weeks by my senior staff, that the abuse and disparagement to which our services and staff have been subjected in the past few months are having a very deleterious effect on staff morale generally. I am concerned that the continuation of such attacks and depreciation of the efforts being made, will make employment in the service so unattractive that a steady decline in the numbers and efficiency of the staff will be inevitable—

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): That is a poor excuse, a poor excuse!

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order! I ask members that when a question has been asked and the Minister or other person to whom the question was directed is giving an explanation—and he does not have to give an explanation, if he does not wish to—members will show him the courtesy of listening to his reply.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: I am concerned that the continuation of such attacks and depreciation of the efforts being made will make employment in the service so unattractive that a steady decline in the numbers and efficiency of the staff will be inevitable. In such an event, the people of the province may well find themselves without services on which they have depended so much.

The hon. member asks what I intend to do about staff morale. This is a question which cannot be answered without thought and consideration, but I can assure the hon. members that this is a matter under constant attention. In the light of this latest report, we will look again at every possibility which might aim at the maintenance of high staff morale.

The total staff complement at the Ontario hospital, Toronto, is at present 805. Of these, the present level of professional staff is as follows:

Qualified psychiatrists	12
Residents in post-graduate course:
Junior	7
Senior	8
Other physicians	4
Psychologists	8
Social workers	12
Nurses (registered)	40
Nurses (unregistered)	50
Attendants and nursing aides	277

This is a total of 419 patient-care staff. On March 31, there were 1,000 patients in the hospital and 247 residents in the residential unit. The ratio of ward staff to patients would therefore be 1 to 2.4.

I am quite at a loss to understand how the 50 per cent staff turnover figure came about, because it is quite out of keeping with the facts. In 1962 there were 45 resignations from the attendants' staff and there were 52 appointments made. In 1963, the resignations were 60, and the appointments 61. In 1964, the resignations were 64, and the appointments 55. This is far from the 50 per cent figure reported.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I rise on a point of order in connection with a question that is not being asked. This morning, Mr. Speaker, I submitted to you a question I wished to ask of the hon. Provincial Secretary (Mr. Yaremko) in connection with the dinner tendered by the province to the Shahanshah of Iran. You refused me permission to ask this question, sir, and appended to the bottom of the question, which was returned to me, in your own hand, the following:

No urgency to be justified before orders of the day. For the notice paper.

D. H. MORROW

I should like to refer you, sir, to Lewis and the comments made by Lewis in connection with the putting of questions. Page 44 of Lewis reads as follows:

The putting of questions, particularly to Ministers of the Crown, is a most important portion of House procedure for the private member, especially so to a member of the Opposition party.

Under modern procedure with the party system in effect and with the management of the House largely in the hands of the government, the putting of questions affords a useful method of supervising the work of administration and provides the private member with his greatest opportunity to take part in the proceedings of the House and to secure information which is often enlightening and of great public importance.

The question hour provides one of the most interesting and useful portions of the day's proceedings and the answers to questions on private members' day are always eagerly awaited. If a question requires a lengthy or voluminous answer, the Minister to whom it is addressed may require a motion to be made for a return. Similarly, a Minister may refuse to answer a question asking an expression of opinion on public policy.

Mr. Speaker, I would especially direct your attention to the last part. It is the Minister who declines to answer, and Lewis clearly indicates that it is the Minister who requires the question to be put on the order paper, insofar as it may require statistical information by way of reply, or a voluminous return. I say with the deepest respect to you that there is no mention of the Speaker's intervention to prevent a private member from asking a question of a Minister.

Second, Lewis makes no reference whatsoever to the question of urgency in respect of a question.

Last—

Mr. L. Letherby (Simcoe East): Lewis did not figure the hon. member would ask.

Mr. Sopha: I am sure that was a brilliant comment; I just did not hear it.

Last, sir, I direct your attention to the order of business in the House that is made out in Lewis. You will observe on page 108,

"Rules of the House," and rule 28 is as follows:

The ordinary daily routine of business of the House shall be as follows:

The order of business for the consideration of the House day by day, after the above daily routine shall be as follows:

You will notice, Mr. Speaker, that on every day, Monday to Friday, there is an item, "Questions put by members." Presumably, at some time in the distant past—certainly before I had the privilege of becoming a member of this assembly—that rule got buried, no doubt by precedent, custom and usage.

But the writer of the rules of the House, beyond which there is no greater authority, clearly anticipated that there would be a daily question hour; indeed, Major Lewis at page 45 refers to the very phrase, "a question hour." Certainly, sir, this has become somewhat altered, and I would ask you why I, as a private member who at this time feels that his rights have been somewhat violated, could not ask what was the total cost of the dinner tendered to the Shahanshah of Iran.

Mr. Speaker: The member is not to ask the question now. He is rising on a point of order—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: I dealt with it and I would ask him not to abuse the privilege by asking the question which I have refused to permit at this time.

Mr. Sopha: I want to make one further point on the question of urgency, because we in this party are thinking of inviting Haile Selassie to a dinner for defeated Liberal candidates.

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Grey South): Mr. Speaker, before you rule on the point of order, may I say a word? I want to direct attention particularly to the notation on the question which was returned to the hon. member for Sudbury.

In it you indicated that there was no question of urgency to this matter. I think that if 90 per cent of the questions that have been asked during this session, before the orders of the day, were subjected to the same scrutiny, one could say that there was no urgency attached to those questions.

I want to say further that I do not think for one moment that hon. members on this side of the House have abused the privilege and the responsibility and the opportunity—or whatever you like—of posing questions to the Ministers before the orders of the day. There has been no rash of these questions, and I am sure that so far as the hon. Prime Minister is concerned—and I will say this directly to him—I think it would be a good thing if my hon. friend would encourage questions before the orders of the day. I think it is one of the best ways of getting information for the public good and for the public service. I am sure his hon. Ministers are not that overworked and I am sure that he, as the Prime Minister, would be anxious that they would be put on their toes to the extent that they would always be on the alert to the place where they would be willing and anxious to answer legitimate questions before the orders of the day.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, we are having quite an afternoon with procedure. I would just point out to the hon. member that I did not know this question had been asked, and I did not know that the question had been refused. I would agree with my hon. friend that if this is a privilege—perhaps it is not; it is a right of the Opposition—I have never found anything we had difficulty in handling in any way at all. We get questions and we are quite prepared to answer them, and there is no effort being made by the government to cut off any questions. I want to make that point very clear.

Mr. Speaker: I think perhaps each will have his turn on a point of order.

First of all, I should like to say that I have never thought that I have been very restrictive with regard to questions before the orders of the day. Perhaps the member for Grey South is quite right in that there have been many questions asked before the orders of the day that did not have too much urgency about them.

I have always thought myself it was the privilege of each and every member to ask questions. If a question has any relevancy or urgency about it, and if I think the member needs the answer to this question in order that he may complete a speech that he is making to the House that day or the day after, I allow the question and submit it to the Minister to be answered.

There are certain questions, however—and I will come to that in a moment with regard to urgency—that really do not have any urgency before the orders of the day. It has always been my opinion that they should have some urgency. I had trouble last year before the House mostly in regard to the form of the question, and after editing questions for a month or two, we got over this difficulty. I must say the questions which have been submitted this year by the members have been in good form and very seldom have we had to change the form of a question.

Only yesterday I refused a question from the member for Yorkview (Mr. Young) pertaining to something about brine and salt in meat, which I figured did not have any urgency. I returned it to him with the comment that he should ask the question through the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Stewart) in his agricultural estimates, which are coming on today. There really was no urgency that it should have been asked yesterday, and today was in plenty of time. I do not think too much meat was spoiled in the meantime.

Now I may say to the member for Sudbury that those questions to which he referred require two days' notice as provided in the rules. The questions in this book refer, when it says: "questions may be put to Minister of the Crown relating to public affairs and to other members, etc." to questions by way of the notice paper. There is really no provision in our rules for oral questions at all.

It is only by the adoption of a British practice of allowing private notice questions that we permit oral questions before the orders of the day.

I have looked up the reference in May relative to this point, at page 358, and which will bear on the question of the member for Grey South on urgency, under private notice questions, and it reads thus:

Questions which have not appeared on the paper, but which are of an urgent character, and relate either to matters of public importance or to the arrangement of business may be taken—now it says here, "after half-past three," that is the hour for the British House to open. Ours is at three o'clock:

—provided they have been submitted to the Speaker before noon on the day on which they are to be asked, and have been accepted by him as satisfying the conditions imposed, and provided notice has been given to the Minister concerned.

Now you will notice here that this is what we have been following with regard to the urgency. Rule 37 refers to the form of the question which it must take; that it must not be argumentative; it must not make a statement, and so on.

Mr. Oliver: May I ask, Mr. Speaker, wherein what you have quoted does it revolve around the question of urgency? Let me have that again, I am not just to sure of that.

Mr. Speaker: To repeat:

Questions which have not appeared on the notice paper—that is, the ones that you do not put on the notice paper:

—but which are of an urgent character, and relate either to matters of public importance or to the arrangement of business . . . may be asked in writing to the Speaker before noon of the day on which they are to be asked.

So we really have no provision in our rules for asking oral questions, but we accept the practice of the private notice questions of the British House to allow them in writing to the Speaker before noon of the day on which they are to be asked.

Mr. Sopha: Then I take it I may ask the question, in view of your ruling, of the hon. Provincial Secretary?

Mr. Speaker: I take it that I have made my ruling before 12 o'clock today, at noon, and I do not wish to reverse it at this time. I hope the member will accept it and not feel that he would have to appeal it.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, if I may pursue this point of order just for a moment. If, as I understand it, your interpretation is correct, we have no procedure at all for asking oral questions and we adopt—

Mr. Speaker: I say we have no provision in our rules, but we have a procedure in that we have adopted the British practice of making oral questions private notice questions.

Mr. Singer: Well, you establish my point, sir. If we have no provision in our rules, what right have we to adopt half of the procedure? In other words, we have been proceeding in a manner which our rules do not recognize, and we have been proceeding in part by custom established in another jurisdiction.

Mr. Speaker: By precedent.

Mr. Singer: By precedent which we accept when it apparently suits us, and by precedent which we discard when it does not suit us, sir. We have a resolution on the order paper which I hope, Mr. Speaker, the hon. Prime Minister will call, referring to the whole question of orders of this House.

To my mind, the restrictions placed in the asking of oral questions before the orders of the day are so restrictive that a great deal of benefit that can be derived from the sittings of this assembly is lost, and it is long overdue that we re-examine this, and re-examine it thoroughly.

Mr. Speaker: The member though will appreciate the Speaker can only go by the precedents and usages that we have had in this House over the years, and that is what I have been following.

Mr. Singer: Well, with the greatest respect, sir, the precedents and customs that have been established over the years seems to vary, not only from year to year, but from month to month. The ruling you made a little earlier this afternoon, sir, was in direct contradiction to a ruling that was made either a year, or two years, ago when a similar approach was used on a private member's public bill. When a member had introduced a private member's public bill and one of his colleagues said, "Explain it;" either you or your predecessor said, "No, that is completely out of order;" and I can find that reference for you.

But this afternoon, the direct contrary order was made, and you said you had done the same thing a week or so ago, which I accept. But the rules are made from day to day, and from month to month. If we are going to be in the unhappy position where sometimes we follow rules, sometimes we follow precedents, and sometimes we follow a compromise or marriage of each of them, we get into the present unsatisfactory state which does not allow, in my opinion, the public business to be properly conducted, sir.

Mr. Speaker: The only thing I can say to the member for Downsview is that that is perhaps his opinion on the matter, but I do not agree in whole with what he has said.

Mr. Oliver: Well, may I ask Your Honour if my hon. friend's ruling is the Speaker's ruling, that the question of the hon. member for Sudbury is not one of urgency or public importance. Is that the ruling?

Mr. Speaker: Yes. I made my ruling in writing back to the member for Sudbury before noon today, that I did not think it had urgency to be asked before the orders of the day, and asked him to submit it for the notice paper. That is the usual custom. Whenever we do not think that the question has enough urgency and importance about it that it should take up the time of the House before the orders of the day, it is submitted to the order paper.

Now, I might also say that running through my mind at the time I examined the question, which was almost a page long and consisted of considerable statistics, that it had a statistical nature to it that would require some time, perhaps, to answer and would be much better placed on the notice paper. Having made that ruling before noon today, as I said before, at this time I do not care to reverse it.

Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The twentieth order, House in committee of supply; Mr. W. G. Noden in the chair.

On vote 2205:

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Chairman, when we adjourned this debate the other night, I had concluded some comments with regard to the Ontario racing commission. Indeed, we had gotten into something of a discussion as to whether it was appropriate—dare I suggest whether it was in order—to consider the racing commission by way of detailed questions on the estimates, since there had been a report from the chairman of the racing commission before the standing committee on government commissions.

I would just like to say, Mr. Chairman, on this point, and then leave it, that I, on reflection, am a little puzzled as to why down through the years, the chairman of the racing commission has not come before this House, in the fashion that most other chairmen have—I concede not all of them. As I reflected on this, I find we have a very mixed pattern.

For example, I do not think that the chairman of Hydro has ever come here into the House during consideration of estimates. He has come before the standing committee. Certainly the chairman of the water resources commission, the hospital insurance commission, and many other bodies has been here when the department whose estimates under which the jurisdiction falls, have been under discussion. He has been there, ready to brief the hon. Minister on detailed questions that might be put to the hon. Minister.

I can quite understand the hon. Minister's hesitancy in entertaining detailed and technical questions with regard to the commission, when he has not got advisers from the commission, who are familiar with the detailed operations, at his elbow to assist him. This is quite understandable and natural reticence.

I would like to suggest that in the future the procedure that normally has been the case, should be followed in the instance of the Ontario racing commission.

I would also like to underline—because I thought I was making some headway in drawing it to the attention of the hon. Minister—some pretty extraordinary procedures in the operation of the Ontario racing commission. I cite this one here by way of recapping my comments of the other night—the fact that there are no regulations. Since there are no regulations, they cannot be published in the official publication of regulations, so that they are not readily available. It is run by directives and orders that are to a degree secret. It is true anybody who wants them can go and get them, but they are even less readily available than regulations, and part of our problem with regulations is that often they are made and people who are seriously affected do not know about them. So I think we have to take a look at the whole operation of the Ontario racing commission.

However, before I sit down, I want to raise one other aspect of the Ontario racing commission, and I state at the outset that I recognize this falls partly in the jurisdiction of the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan), through the racing commission, and partly in that of the hon. Provincial Secretary (Mr. Yaremko). It is this double-barrelled responsibility with regard to charters, which has got into some difficulties in years gone by.

The contention of the government has been—with the hon. Provincial Secretary chiefly being its spokesman—that he has cleaned up the companies branch, and the granting of charters. He has made quite a production in the House on a number of occasions, of indicating the extent to which it is cleaned up, the back files which have been accumulating there for years, and that he has brought in new regulations which presumably were going to eliminate either abuses or possible areas of abuses.

I just want to draw one to the attention of the hon. Minister—and to the hon. Provincial Secretary, since he is back in his seat—which is indicative of a continued rather sloppy approach to this situation, which allegedly the hon. Minister had cleaned up.

We have had some very heated debates and a great deal of public interest focused in the last year on the racing charters involved in the Windsor raceway. In the first instance, those were accumulated by the Rowe family. To an extent a somewhat embarrassing situation arose very early in setting up the Windsor raceway and the accumulation of these charters, when Earl Rowe was appointed Lieutenant-Governor of the province of Ontario. It was highly appropriate that he should then resign as director from these racing charters.

I draw this, too, to the attention of the hon. Provincial Treasurer, to indicate the illegalities involved in that process, and I hasten to add right away that it is not the responsibility of His Honour, the Lieutenant-Governor. His Honour, the Lieutenant-Governor resigned from the directorship of the Picton Driving Park Association Limited, and also from the Desoronto driving park association, two of the charters that are involved in the Windsor raceway. He resigned on February 1, 1963. To my recollection, that is very shortly after the announcement of his appointment. The law requires that within 15 days the Provincial Secretary's department shall be informed of any change of directors.

It is interesting to note this, Mr. Chairman, that that law is an amendment which this Provincial Secretary brought in, presumably as part of his cleaning-up procedure. Indeed, in the statutes of Ontario 1961-1962, you will find An Act to amend The Corporations Information Act. Section 1 of it is an amendment to the section 5 in the original Act, adding a 5(a), and let me read 5(a):

Every corporation to which section 1 applies shall file with the Provincial Secretary a notice of every change in the membership of its board of directors within 15 days after the change has taken place and the notice shall specify the date upon which each person became a director or ceased to be a director as the case may be.

That was assented to on December 15, 1961. That was brought in by this Provincial Secretary. Indeed, he brought in another amendment, even tidying it up a bit more, so that you have addresses—almost everything up to and including telephone numbers—so that the company files would be up to date for anybody who wanted to see them.

Now, actually what happened in this instance?

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. We have been discussing order here quite a bit this afternoon, and my point would be that this is completely irrelevant to the estimates that we are considering at the present time.

Mr. MacDonald: I would suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that I am pointing out that it is either the Ontario racing commission's responsibility, or the hon. Provincial Secretary's responsibility, or there is joint responsibility for—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Chairman, the procedures in the hon. Provincial Secretary's department certainly have nothing to do with the racing commission. Any amendments that the hon. Provincial Secretary may have introduced to The Corporations Act are completely irrelevant to what we are discussing here this afternoon.

Mr. MacDonald: What I am drawing attention to, Mr. Chairman, is the fact that the Ontario racing commission has tolerated illegalities in charters on which it is permitting the Windsor raceway to operate. The fact of the matter is that the notice with regard to the change in directorship did not come in until June 1. It arrived on June 3, as a matter of fact. It was dated June 1, and arrived on June 3. Either the hon. Provincial Secretary is not enforcing his own laws, so that the illegality carries over into the Ontario racing commission, or alternatively, the legal offices in this province just do not pay attention to the law.

I just draw to your attention, Mr. Chairman, when is the hon. Provincial Treasurer, who has jurisdiction over the Ontario racing commission, or the hon. Provincial Secretary, who brought in these changes in the law—

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary): That has nothing to do with the legality of the charters.

Mr. MacDonald: It has nothing to do with the legality of the charter, but changes in directorships are illegally handled as far as the law is concerned. You are splitting a hair very neatly. The hon. Minister may have a fine legal point, but my point is that the procedures for notification of changes in directors are illegally handled. This is the hon. Minister's law. He brought it in. What is he doing about it? What is the hon. Provincial Treasurer doing about it?

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer): Mr. Chairman, I would like to deal with some of the comments that were made when these estimates were before the House and some of the comments of the hon. member for York South today.

First of all, I may say that it is still, in my judgment, proper that details in connection with the operation of the Ontario racing commission should be discussed with the commission when it appears before the committee on commissions. I have no objection at all to speaking for or accepting my responsibility as far as the racing commission is concerned and the general actions of the racing commission.

I objected the other night to the discussion of certain details in connection with Murray Waples. I still think it was unwise, because Murray Waples is appearing before the commission on June 2; this is known. Although it is not a court, it may have the effect of a court, and I think in fairness to him that we should not have gone into the details regarding the charges—

Mr. MacDonald: I did not go into the details of the charges at all. I dealt only with procedures.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I am happy to—

Mr. MacDonald: I deliberately avoided details of the charges.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I do not think we should go into them and I said that then. I do not object to discussing the actions of the commission in this particular case, because in my opinion the commission acted as a wise commission should act. There was nothing done that prejudiced the position of the person who came before it and in just a few minutes I would perhaps review what happened.

In the first instance, the judges who were concerned were Clare Smith, representing the Canadian trotting association; Floyd Milton, who was the commission judge, and Max Hill of the jockey club, and the race in question was the sixth race on August 4.

The judges—and I am not trying to excuse or to justify the action of the judges in this particular, because I think the judges should have acted more promptly. But that is only the opinion of a layman, and I do not want by that to indicate that they acted improperly, because they did call the driver in very soon after the race. Perhaps—I am not sure—it was the next day, but very soon.

Mr. MacDonald: Three weeks later.

Hon. Mr. Allan: No, it was not three weeks, it was within the next couple of days. They called the driver in and discussed this race with him. Then they laid a charge of collusion, charged Lockhart and Waples with collusion in the driving of this race. They, in turn, appealed the judgment of the judges, appealed to the commission the judgment of these judges.

I think the action of the commission in this instance is evidence of their desire to be fair, and to mete out justice because the appeal came before the commission and it was allowed. However, in the meantime, having viewed the film patrol very carefully, and having allowed the appeal—this was the judgment of the judges, that there had been collusion between these two drivers—charges were then laid by the commission against each of these drivers for driving in a way that was not in the interests of the public.

I see nothing wrong with the laying of this charge. The counsel for these men, or one of them, objected to the hearing of investigation on the sixth race on August 4—this was laid in connection with two races—and the seventh race on August 5. They served a notice of motion prohibiting the commission from proceeding with the hearing.

The application for prohibition went before Mr. Justice Landreville of the Supreme Court of Ontario. He reserved judgment. Later the commission was informed that Mr. Justice Landreville allowed the prohibition, and there is a copy of his reasons on file.

The chairman of the commission requested the counsel to appeal the prohibition. This was done. The court of appeal gave judgment in favour of the Ontario racing commission, revoking the order of prohibition granted by Mr. Justice Landreville prohibiting the commission from investigating owner-driver Waples' conduct in the sixth race at Greenwood raceway on August 4, 1964. And that case is coming before the commission on June 2.

Now, the commission is composed of reputable men—Magistrate Tupper Bigelow is the chairman of the commission; Brigadier C. S. McKee is a member of the commission; Ronald W. Todgham is a member of the commission; Clayton W. Hodgson; W. Erskine Johnston—

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Who never says a thing in this House about the racing commission as far as I am aware. He draws the salary.

Hon. Mr. Allan:—and Kenneth C. McKinnon. This case will be heard on Tuesday next.

I have every reason and confidence that this man will receive a good hearing, and that justice will be meted out as a result of that hearing.

Mr. Sopha: Well, Mr. Chairman, I want to make a comment on the perennial subject of interest to me, in the hope that some day there will be some reform in this regard. I reiterate my comments that I think it is something less than salutary that the public Treasury of this province should pay moneys to a member of this House for sitting on a commission, and the hon. member who sits on the commission has never moved to get on his feet and report to this House anything about the deliberations of that commission.

In respect of the per diem rate, I have raised with the hon. Provincial Treasurer over the years—and I have raised it with the chairman of the racing commission—the suggestion that the Ontario jockey club should be required to pay a sufficient per diem rate to defray the entire costs of the operation of the racing commission. I must say that there was some success, because I first raised this in 1960 and the rate was raised after that. It was increased.

But the place where it now stands—I think it is $400 per day for 196 days of racing—is not yet enough according to an answer given by the chairman of the racing commission before the standing committee on government commissions this year. It is not yet sufficient to pay the total operating costs.

I maintain that it is simple justice that if the commission is in existence for the sole purpose of supervising racing in this province from the point of view of the public interest—it performs no other functions than that; it is there for simple justice—then those who race horses in the province, those who make a profit out of the racing of horses, ought to pay the total cost of the expenditure for the existence of that commission.

As for the public, the taxpayers in Kenora, in Killaloe and other hamlets—indeed in Dunnville—who have no interest in thoroughbred racing, it is injustice that they should be asked to pay part of their taxes for the operation of this sport, which really is only of interest to those people who go to the race tracks to participate in the spectator and the betting aspects of the sport.

The 6 per cent tax which we have maintained ought to be increased. It ought to be pure profit for the province, because anybody who thinks about it for 30 seconds knows that there are economic dislocations which result from gambling on the horse races. Indeed there are economic dislocations and distress and financial worry which arise from any form of gambling.

To put it a little more graphically, we know that many the light bill and the milk bill and payments for them go into the mutuels. And we know that many children throughout the province are perhaps denied some benefits accruing from the income of the parent, because the parent has such a weak nature as to take the money that should go into the home and bet it in the mutuels at the race track.

Indeed some of them are so weak that they take little children with them to the race track, which I think is a shameful exhibition. It shows a disregard for a person's children to take a four, five, six or even 10-year-old as I have seen at the race tracks.

The pleas fall on deaf ears with the Ontario jockey club, because they neither forbid the taking of children to race tracks, nor do they provide a nursery where the children may be left. Indeed, with my own optics, I have seen children in the betting area, right up against the windows where the punters put their money. They are well on their way to establishing the validity of the maxim: like father like son.

Once again, I plead with the hon. Provincial Treasurer, who, after all, is the boss of the Ontario racing commission, to see if he can give directives telling the Ontario racing commission to increase the per diem rate to the Ontario jockey club, to defray the total costs of the expenditure that this House is asked to approve for the operation of that body.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I realize there is reason in the remarks of the hon. member for Sudbury, and I assure you now that I shall have a very careful look at the matter he refers to.

Vote 2205 agreed to.

Vote 2206 agreed to.

This concludes the estimates of The Treasury Department.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Chairman, as we progress through the Budget estimates of the Ontario Department of Agriculture, we are quite prepared to examine in detail the various items. However, there are a few general comments I wish to make.

As Minister, I take very great pride in my staff and would like, in this Legislature today, to pay tribute publicly to their dedication of purpose, which results in a closely working team who realize that the agricultural and food industry will assume ever-increasing importance in the provincial and Canadian economies and in its service to the public. We have been fortunate to attract to The Ontario Department of Agriculture men and women of energy and wisdom who, in their service to the agricultural industry, are willing to stand up and be counted. They have enabled me, as Minister, to develop policies of vigour and purpose, designed to expand and strengthen the industry of agriculture in Ontario. There are no magic buttons to press; there is no wizardry to employ when you are working with people or dealing with economic situations.

I have in turn been criticized and commended by hon. members of the Opposition for the appointment of committees of inquiry and committees of investigation. I would be the first to admit that, on occasion, I have been disappointed that some of these reports were not tabled more quickly. On the other hand, I will not consider introducing new policies for agriculture in this province unless I have all the facts at my disposal. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, from time to time, I will continue to appoint fact-finding committees, or to use other means of obtaining the facts of any particular situation. I am interested in the long-term solidarity and success of this industry.

As mentioned, we in the department are working as a team toward a common goal. We have recognized that in order to reach this goal for Ontario farmers, we must also develop a team effort of all those concerned with the agricultural and food business in this province, from the producer through to the processor and handler of food products, giving proper recognition to the consumer. However, we cannot limit our attention and confine our action to activities within the province of Ontario. We must seek greater interprovincial understanding and co-operation; we must seek a national recognition and national action on long-term agricultural policies, and a dynamic and active interest in the food markets of the world. We are and have been doing just this.

With your permission, Mr. Chairman, I would like to outline to this House the several avenues of activity in this all-embracing field, avenues of activity which are necessary for a sound foundation for the agricultural and food industry, and avenues of activity which our department has been vigorously pursuing. I would list them as follows:

1. The necessity for farmers to receive better prices for agricultural products.
2. A comprehensive research programme.
3. Expanded facilities for and encouragement of agricultural education.
4. Improved agricultural technology on the farm.
5. Larger farm production units.
6. Extension education.

7. Availability of qualified farm labour.

8. Expanded markets for Ontario farm products.

9. Consumer understanding and co-operation.

10. Co-operation within the agricultural industry.

11. Improved interprovincial and national agricultural co-operation and policies.

We are providing, and are continuing to implement, marketing machinery for farmers which will increase their bargaining power. Contrary to impressions which have been given, marketing machinery in Ontario to date has received greater acceptance, and is being utilized to a much greater degree, than in any other province in Canada. Thirty-five farm products are being marketed in Ontario through The Farm Products Marketing Act and The Milk Industry Act. Seventy-five per cent of all producers are organized under the various marketing plans, through which more than 60 per cent of the total value of agricultural production is sold within this province. The only major commodities not covered by organized marketing programmes are beef and some vegetables and grains.

The use and development of marketing legislation in Ontario has outstripped that of other provinces in Canada to the extent that the total of marketings in all other provinces combined is slightly less than 15 per cent of that in Ontario. It is evident that organized marketing is regarded by producers as an effective instrument to give them increased bargaining power in the marketplace. The Ontario farmer has accumulated a wealth of experience in orderly marketing. Yet, in many respects, it is a process of continual research and pioneering in the rapidly changing marketing channels, the purchasing power of fewer and larger buyers, the pressure for market expansion and the great strides in agricultural technology.

Our department and the producer marketing boards have welcomed and encouraged the frequent and current inquiries on marketing, and conferences with producer groups from other provinces on all aspects of this subject. We know that there has been considerable discussion on a broad national or regional approach to marketing plans. This may be the next step necessary to give the farmer more effective bargaining power in national and international markets.

Research is basic to the success of any industry. The entire agricultural research programme of Ontario is co-ordinated through the director of research who has the status of an assistant deputy Minister and who reports directly to the deputy Minister. He is assisted and guided by the Ontario agricultural research institute, made up of successful farmers and successful people engaged in agricultural business. In this way we are ensuring that the research projects and programmes carried out within Ontario are designed to meet the needs of the industry as experienced and expressed by those people who are actively engaged in the industry. To obtain further co-ordination of effort, late in 1964 a federal-provincial committee on agriculture and services was organized. This committee co-ordinates the service and research work within Ontario with the activities of the federal Department of Agriculture. It facilitates complete co-ordination between the deputy Minister in my department and the assistant deputy Minister of research under the federal Department of Agriculture at Ottawa.

Detailed and extensive agricultural research work is being carried out at the Guelph colleges and the Vineland research station, and applied or more practical research is taking place at the Kemptville agricultural school, the western Ontario agricultural school at Ridgetown and, to a limited extent, at the New Liskeard demonstration farm. The research and research service programmes carried out during 1964 represent a cost to the province of slightly over six and a half million dollars. The application of research in agriculture and food technology has always benefited the consumer and it is interesting to note that the cost to Ontario citizens has been approximately one dollar per person per year.

To judge the agricultural research programme fairly, recognition must also be given to work of the regional research stations of the federal Department of Agriculture within Ontario and to research carried out by industries related to agriculture. Taking this into consideration, our agricultural research within Ontario—which, as I mentioned, is receiving close co-ordination between our people and the researchers at Ottawa—is at a level of approximately one per cent of the cash income from the sale of farm products. This is approximately the same ratio as that of the United States, Britain, Holland and other countries with a dynamic agriculture.

It is of the utmost importance that research findings be assessed very carefully prior to general recommendation. It is in this regard that I want to pay tribute to various agricultural organizations which help our research and extension staff in assessing research findings from experimental stations, both here and elsewhere. Special mention should be made of the Ontario soil and crop improvement association, whose members have conducted field scale trials of new practices in soil and crop management for the past twenty-five years. This organization greatly increases the reliability of soil and crop recommendations published annually by The Ontario Department of Agriculture. Other organizations, like the swine improvement council, the Ontario beef improvement association, and the various purebred dairy cattle associations, and other livestock associations, have also played an important role in interpreting research results in relation to actual farm operations.

Agricultural education is the necessary key to open the door of agricultural success for Ontario farmers in the future. With this idea in mind, we are encouraging the attendance at practical agricultural courses at the Kemptville and Ridgetown schools. As well, it is intended, on a trial basis, to conduct a practical agricultural course for northern Ontario boys at the New Liskeard demonstration farm some time during the fall of 1965.

The change in status of the Guelph colleges, and their inclusion within the University of Guelph, will strengthen and broaden the educational opportunities for our rural people. The two-year associate course at the Ontario agricultural college will continue, sponsored from the standpoint of cost by The Ontario Department of Agriculture, and conducted by the Ontario agricultural college in the University of Guelph, under a contract with this department.

This will mean that there will be three agricultural courses of a practical nature conducted by The Department of Agriculture within Ontario: namely, Kemptville, Ridgetown and Guelph.

Recognizing the need of encouraging students to attend the Ontario agricultural college, the Ontario veterinary college and Macdonald institute to ensure a continuing stream of agricultural, veterinary and household science graduates, it is proposed that bursaries of $125 each, per year, will be provided for all Ontario students attending these institutions. In addition, entrance scholarships of $600 per student will be provided to Ontario students entering the three colleges, under certain conditions of academic standing, that is, first class honour standing in grade 13, written in one year. This is felt to be most necessary to encourage young people with keen minds to enter some phase of agriculture as their life vocation.

The research findings and information, which result in improved technological knowledge on the part of our farmers, are passed on to them through the extension branch and the county agricultural representative and his staff. The extension workers are aided, to a very significant extent, by the information branch of the department. We have recognized the business aspects of farming and have strengthened the farm management programme in the extension branch. Four highly qualified and competent farm management specialists were appointed during 1964 to provide training and advice in the specialty of farm management. They co-operate with each agricultural representative who has been providing valuable advice and guidance to the farmers in the respective counties on the matter of good business management. The department, in co-operation with the CBC, produced three one-hour television programmes in which our extension workers co-operated. Throughout the year, extension workers have co-operated with local radio and television stations and press in providing up-to-date information on the business of farming. Our agricultural representatives and other extension workers are actively engaged in their role of dedicated service to Ontario agriculture. Agricultural activities within a county circulate around the office of the agricultural representative.

As an example of some of the activities within the responsibilities of extension branch personnel, we could point up the making of approximately 60,000 individual fertilizer recommendations, based on soil analysis; the surveying and drafting of hundreds of drainage plans; and the designing and drafting of plans for remodelling and construction of new farm buildings to mention only a few. In addition to co-ordinating the department's various programmes and policies and providing outstanding leadership at county level, the agricultural representatives and other extension workers are actively engaged in the development of local leaders and rural farm people through the 4-H and junior farmer programmes. Approximately 4,000 volunteer local leaders gave assistance to 20,500 4-H club members who completed 30,200 projects in 1964. We must pay tribute to the dedicated service of these unpaid voluntary local leaders. Approximately 7,000 junior farmers are active in the various counties in 192 clubs across the province of Ontario. We continue to place a high priority and great emphasis on our junior agricultural and homemaking programme because we believe that this is essential to ensure a healthy and strong agricultural industry in Ontario for the future. It is of interest to note, as far as the value of this programme is concerned, that the majority of the officers and leaders in many of our farm organizations today were former 4-H club members and junior farmers.

It goes without saying that today's competitive conditions in agriculture and the capital overhead, which have resulted from the increased mechanization of Ontario farms, have increased the necessity, in some instances, for larger volume and a larger production unit per operator. This expansion has necessitated greater credit requirements for the farmer. We have recognized this and have expanded assistance available through the junior farmer loans administration. Here again, farmers contemplating expansion, and those who have expanded, receive the ready assistance of our farm management specialists and the agricultural representatives. In the fiscal year 1964-65, the average of 906 loans granted to junior farmers was $17,400, compared with 452 loans for an average of $12,576 the previous year. An increasing number of these borrowers are taking advantage of farm management assistance provided by the department. The increase last year in the maximum loan available, from $20,000 to $40,000, permits a larger and more comprehensive loan to young farmers and has enabled the young farmer to establish a larger production unit. We recognize that credit, under certain circumstances, can be as much an enemy as a friend. On the other hand, we recognize that our Ontario farmers must be provided with the means of expansion to meet the demands of present-day agriculture. Therefore, it follows that, in most cases, this will have to be done on borrowed money. It is also a fair and logical conclusion that the interest on this borrowed money be recognized as a normal farm cost when considering agricultural policies and, in particular, an equitable level for farm prices.

Our department has taken the initiative in the farm labour problem and has had several discussions with the national employment service of the federal government and The Ontario Department of Labour. At our request, a federal-provincial conference on farm labour was held on December 18 in Ottawa. The shortage of qualified farm labour is being experienced in other provinces as well. The overall farm labour picture continued to deteriorate in 1964. A number of factors have been responsible for this situation, the chief one being the slow-down in immigration, beginning in 1957, which resulted in a steady decline in the number of persons available for farm work.

Each year, more and more persons find their way to permanent employment outside agriculture, making it difficult to obtain satisfactory agricultural help. The situation is acute in all phases, for both year-round and seasonal work. It is most serious in cash crop areas, particularly at harvest time. In 1964, the federal-provincial farm labour committee organized various local committees in an attempt to deal with the situation. Through these efforts, considerable progress was made. Arrangements were made to move persons from unemployed areas in the Maritimes and Quebec to areas where labour was scarce. As well, a number of Indians were recruited in northern Ontario. National employment service figures indicate that a total of more than 30,340 placements were made in agriculture from the first of April to the end of October, 1964.

In planning to meet the situation for 1965, the following areas of effort are being stressed:

(a) A continuance and expansion, if possible, of the movement of workers from the Maritimes and Quebec.

(b) The stepping up of the use of northern Ontario Indians with greater assistance and guidance from the federal Indian affairs branch.

(c) Negotiations with the rehabilitation service of The Department of Health with reference to the employment of patients during convalescence and rehabilitation.

(d) Closer liaison with growers' committees with particular reference to housing, continuity of employment, wages and other conditions of work.

(e) Continued negotiations with federal officials towards the setting up of a more complete farm labour service under the national employment service at Ottawa.

(f) Housing subsidy for summer help.

We are in the process of developing a long-term farm labour policy for this province. Since this a national problem, I feel assured we will receive the necessary co-operation from the federal government.

During the past, the Ontario food council was given prime responsibility in the development of marketing opportunities for Ontario food products, with the following avenues of approach:

(a) Export development and import replacement.

(b) Market development in Ontario and throughout Canada.

(c) New forms in which agricultural food products can be merchandised.

(d) Aiding market stability by co-ordinated production, marketing and merchandising programmes to alleviate possible shortages and surplus situations.

Throughout 1964, studies were made of the United Kingdom food market and the possible demand of continental Europe. As a result of these studies, the Ontario food council concept was extended to the United Kingdom by the formation of an overseas food council committee in an effort to develop closer food relationships between Ontario's producers, processors and shippers and United Kingdom trade representatives. A meeting was also held in Ontario House, London, England, in October 1964, with Ontario trade officers from European offices, in order to develop as close a liaison as possible between all departments of the Ontario government, but in particular between The Department of Agriculture and The Department of Economics and Development with their offices in London, Dusseldorf and Milan. As an addition to staff, a market development specialist was appointed to the food council. He is located in The Department of Economics and Development, Toronto, in order to afford the greatest co-ordination of effort between the two departments in working with all segments of the food trade in Ontario and in helping to develop and promote expanded exports. Arrangements have also been made for the food council to assist in selecting Ontario agricultural food product representatives to be included in trade missions abroad, sponsored by The Department of Economics and Development.

The Department of Agriculture sponsored exhibits at the following overseas food and trade shows during 1964:

(a) The ideal home exhibition in Olympia, London, England.

(b) The Israeli international trade fair, Tel Aviv, Israel, held in June, 1964.

(c) The London food fair held in Olympia, London, in August and September of 1964.

In addition, the department sponsored a trade mission of United Kingdom food importers and distributors to Ontario in August and September, 1964. This was a confidence-building mission to enable members to visit growers, processors, suppliers and shippers in this province, to further cement their trade relationships and to make arrangements for new business.

During 1965, the department will be carrying on with the export programme. The food council again sponsored a food exhibit at the ideal home show this past March and, for the first time, will be sponsoring a show on the Continent at the Anuga food fair, Cologne, Germany, in September. We will also be bringing over another trade mission from the United Kingdom and continental Europe of importers and distributors of food products. On this particular mission we will stress new business.

A complete Ontario food products directory is now being prepared, covering products and companies and people in all segments of the food industry in this province.

Our department has embarked on a new concept to deal with the problems of marketing and merchandising Ontario's agricultural food products. Under the food council, we are bringing together the four main groups concerned, so there will be a co-ordinated effort to solve current problems and to aid in the development of long-term policies which will be in the best interests of all groups. We term this the "total approach" in maintaining and expanding a healthy food and agricultural industry in this province. The food council in its activities embraces all those, from the farmer to the consumer, who are concerned with agriculture and food. Co-operation and interest from all segments have indicated, in a most definite way, that this new approach is welcomed by all groups and that it will work.

The food council has adopted a philosophy, namely, and I quote:

The Ontario food council's purpose is to encourage the most efficient form of food production, processing and distribution, consistent with our ability to produce food and be as self-sufficient as possible in order to maintain and expand our agricultural food products industry.

We feel that this is a sound programme in the interests of all segments of the agricultural food products industry, especially in this age when all groups, producer right through to the consumer, are becoming even more interdependent. This philosophy referred to, "the total approach," is based on the premise of common aims and objectives. This is a development which is the first of its kind in Canada. We have been gratified to receive suggestions that this method could very well be part of the solution on a national basis and that possibly the food council approach should be extended to the whole of Canada.

Be that as it may, this is certainly the first time that all groups have agreed to sit down together; it is certainly the first time a real opportunity has been afforded the consumers to not only assist us in the development of our policies, but, at the same time, to be in a position to gain a first-hand knowledge of the problems facing the agricultural and food industry. The public relations and understanding impact of this policy are immeasurable.

We have added to the staff of the food council a graduate nutritionist and home economist. Her work is conducted in recognition that consumers are entitled to three basic rights:

(1) the right to be informed, (2) the right to make a choice, (3) the right to be heard, and I think we could add a fourth, that is, the right to protection and confidence in the food products which they are being asked to buy.

The nutritionist and home economist works closely with consumer committees and consumer organizations, and through this excellent two-way channel, the many phases of the food industry are becoming better known to consumers who are gaining knowledge of the problems, hazards, policies and other matters which affect the day-to-day existence of producers, processors, manufacturers and distributors of food products. At the same time, the food industry is being made more aware of the consumer's point of view and of the frustrations which are experienced from time to time. It has been gratifying and refreshing to note the change which is already taking place, through understanding, in the attitudes of the processors and handlers of Ontario food products. Such understanding within the industry as a whole and co-operation from the industry are most necessary to the future strength of Ontario's farmers.

This "total approach" is showing encouraging signs of success and is resulting in all groups working together with the aim of improving and strengthening the Ontario food products industry, both now and throughout the years ahead. We must recognize there is less true appreciation in Ontario and Canada, by the general public, of the problems of the agricultural and food industry and its necessary role in the economy, than in possibly any other country in the world, because we have never been short of food. It is essential to recognize that the agricultural and food industry is by far the largest industry in Canada and that it must maintain a healthy position in the dynamic economy which our province enjoys.

With preparations being made in all parts of Canada to celebrate Canada's centennial, there has been a great interest in the event on the part of the farm people of Ontario. I am happy to announce that, after Cabinet consideration, it has been decided to mark the occasion throughout rural Ontario in a manner which will express the feelings of the farm people in a way that, I am sure, will add a very great deal of attractiveness to the Ontario farmstead.

It is proposed to inaugurate a farmstead improvement competition in every county and district, with provision being made for a provincial competition open to first-prize winners in each area. These competitions will be ancillary to programmes sponsored by the various municipalities. Under the programme, farmers, townships and county groups will be asked to participate in a general improvement of the whole countryside.

To assist each county or district committee to finance a satisfactory prize list, The Department of Agriculture will make a grant to each county on the basis of an average of $8 per entry with a maximum grant to each county of $1,800. Provincial prizes will be awarded, with the first prize winner receiving $500 and a championship trophy, and the reserve champion receiving $400 and a trophy. Third- to eighth-prize winners will receive $300 scaling down to $25.

The competition will be divided into two categories: the farmstead improvement competition, open to all farmers and organized on a county and provincial basis; and a rural landscape improvement programme, on a cost-sharing basis with county councils.

It is hoped that by 1967, as a result of the programme, many buildings would be improved and painted, dead trees removed from the countryside, fences repaired and painted, along with renovation of some of our old cemeteries and the general removing of debris around the countryside.

I am sure that everyone will agree that the programme provides a very practical way of marking Canada's centennial. Not only will it encourage the beautification of our rural scene, but it will also provide an area of personal participation in marking this important milestone in our country's history.

We recognize, and this has been shown as a continuing thread through all my comments today, that Ontario cannot be an island unto itself. We have welcomed the many opportunities for consultations with the federal government and the meetings with other provincial Ministers of Agriculture and their officials. We are a willing and active participant, Mr. Chairman, in the philosophy of co-operative federalism and interprovincial relationships designed to strengthen the bonds of unity within our great country.

Mr. M. Gaunt (Huron-Bruce): Mr. Chairman, in rising to take part in this debate I want to say that I listened to my hon. friend very carefully as he reviewed the activities, achievements and plans of his department during this last year and for the year to come.

I could not help but think as the hon. Minister of Agriculture was talking, notwithstanding the efforts of the department to help agriculture in one form or another, that the basic agricultural problem remains unsolved. Indeed, it is becoming increasingly critical year after year. This year has seen a deterioration over last year, and the same applies to the preceding years since the war. The basic problem to my mind is lack of adequate income.

That may seem like a very ambiguous and perhaps oversimplified diagnosis. However, the more pressing problems facing agriculture today stem from and revolve around the fact that farmers want and feel they are entitled to an adequate income—not only an income based on fair interest for their large capital investment, but an income that would be more in line with other segments of the economy.

Before I become too deeply engrossed in this subject, let me point out that a number of things I will mention will fall under the purview of the federal government. Nonetheless, I intend to be no less critical in these areas because of federal responsibility or lack of it. It is rather obvious that such things as price supports, deficiency payments and subsidies of one kind or another fall under the federal government and are, by and large, federal programmes.

However, much can be done at the provincial level to stimulate the agricultural health. As each province becomes more conscious of its responsibilities to the agricultural community with the resultant aid in one form or another to it, this tends to raise provincial government participation in other provinces, because government assistance in any one province, over and above that given to the other provinces, places the other provinces at a distinct competitive disadvantage, especially in export trade. There is a tendency toward equalization, or equalizing government assistance in the other provinces particularly where the same commodities are involved.

I will relate this particular aspect of assistance to Quebec, the assistance that Quebec is giving to its farmers and how it affects us in the province of Ontario.

I would like to turn now to a speech made by Mr. Everett Biggs, the deputy Minister of Agriculture, at the annual meeting of the Ontario soil and crop improvement association this year. I do not want to read this in its entirety, but I want to read a good portion of the article:

Delegates to the annual meeting of the Ontario soil and crop improvement association were told today that serious consideration should be given to the current farm situation by farm organizations in co-operation with all levels of government, which would ensure an adequate return to agriculture and the farmer.

Speaking on the topic, "Focus on Agriculture," Everett Biggs, deputy Minister of Agriculture, said that while the farmer and government must give serious consideration to the current situation, the development of long-term policy was essential to the continued welfare of the industry.

If I may just interject, Mr. Chairman, I would say that that is absolutely correct. I noticed today that the hon. Minister mentioned long-term policies in connection with farm labour. I think this is good. I think it is absolutely necessary, but up until this point, we certainly have not had any long-term policies, at least they have not been evident in the agricultural field. If we have had them, they must have been stashed away on some dusty old shelf.

Mr. Biggs goes on, and I am quoting him again:

First of all, we must make sure of an assured and adequate income, not only based upon fair interest for their large capital investment but an income that would be more on the level with other segments of our economy, said Mr. Biggs.

"I am convinced that we can get a better public understanding of our industry, and I am convinced that through this we will get better financial returns for our Ontario farmers and help overcome the entirely unrealistic and unfair situation that has developed," said the deputy Minister, "a situation where the farmers' costs have progressed in pace with the general buoyant economy, which has resulted in the markedly increased costs which have tended not only to wipe out all his profits in some cases, but which, in all cases, have more than trebled over his increased income."

Mr. Biggs pointed out that following World War II and up until about 1952 the farmer experienced an expanding economy. Then it changed and he has seen a cost-price squeeze which has been getting tighter ever since.

"I am advised that since 1947, the cost of beef has gone up 25 per cent to the consumer and down 13.8 per cent to the producer. Wheat was $2 per bushel to the farmer and bread 17 cents to the consumer. Since 1947 the production per farmer is up 147 per cent, and the production for industrial workers is up 37 per cent. Since 1951, the prices that farmers receive have gone down 13 per cent, while the farmers' costs have gone up 13 per cent. During this decline of food prices to the farmer, food for the consumer has increased by 12 per cent."

Recalling that the Hon. W. A. Stewart, Minister of Agriculture, had said that there is no place in our present thinking and economy for a philosophy of cheap food, which has been placing the farmer in an untenable position, Mr. Biggs said that he, too, would like to reiterate the feeling of the Minister.

"There is no place for a cheap food philosophy in our present economy," said the deputy Minister. "Too many people for too long now have embraced a food philosophy which is not in the best interests of agriculture or our economy. That is one of the thoughts that we should keep in mind in our future planning."

I am delighted to see that my hon. friend has come out and said that he is against a cheap food philosophy, because to my mind, it was a cheap food philosophy that brought on the moratorium placed on milk and prevented the 19-cent increase—I believe it was last year. It was a cheap food philosophy that resulted in the changing of the formula which deprived the farmers of another increase of 19 cents per hundred.

And so, if the government has adopted an attitude which scraps the cheap food philosophy, I am delighted because I, too, would agree that there is no place for it in this country, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. Biggs concluded by saying:

It would be money well spent to retain a team of the best brains in the country to develop a long-term plan which would give full recognition to the needs of agriculture.

There, again, is a very worthwhile suggestion, and I hope that it is done. The obvious question now is, when are we going to start?

I think it is rather important that we take a look at some of the things in that particular article, because I think there were a good many which give food for thought and perhaps, if taken seriously, would result in something tangible being done for the farming industry in this province.

Mr. Chairman, it is something of a paradox that agriculture today is Canada's most important primary industry; it is the most efficient and yet it is the most troublesome. Historically, Canadian governments have been dedicated to a cheap food policy for Canadian people. Canadian people eat more cheaply than any other people in the world. If you include per capita costs of price supports and food, it takes less of each dollar of one's wages to cover the food budget of the average consumer in this country, than for the average consumer in any other country.

In Canada, an average of about 21 cents of every wage dollar is required to cover the food budget. In the United States, it takes some 23 cents in the United Kingdom it is 39 cents, and in Russia it is 60 cents. The largest subsidy ever provided for any purpose in Canada is that which is granted to the Canadian people by the Canadian farmers. This subsidy, of course, is in the form of cheap food.

Evidence everywhere has indicated that farmers have given much more to Canada than the Canadian people have ever provided for them in return. Of Canada's national budget, slightly more than two per cent is spent on agriculture, and this includes the expense of maintaining The Canada Department of Agriculture and all its research facilities—and they are many. The amount spent annually in supporting agriculture in one way or another, is slightly more than two per cent of the national budget.

The average for the United States, the United Kingdom, France, West Germany, Denmark, Norway, Sweden and Finland is slightly more than eight per cent. Indeed, George McLaughlin, vice-president of the dairy farmers of Canada, put it very well when he spoke at the annual rural appreciation luncheon which the Rotary club has reported in the Barrie Examiner. He said that Canadians ate better at less cost than any other people on earth. He pointed out that this remarkable feat is achieved at the direct expense of the farmer, whose income in relation to his costs, has declined steadily until it is now 30 per cent lower than it was in 1949.

In the same period, the figure for his fellow worker in industry has risen no less than 54 per cent. Mr. McLaughlin very rightly stated that this spread of 84 per cent represented the subsidization of the economy by the farmer, the biggest subsidy in Canadian history.

Of course, the same thing holds true in Ontario. Put it another way. If this discrepancy had not come about in farm returns in relation to costs and had kept pace with industrial wages, dairy farmers would have had an additional $425 million to spend in 1963. And they would have spent it on things like radios, furniture, homes, new tractors, machinery, milking machines, tires, water pumps and what have you.

Let me stress, this is only the dairy industry, an industry that has long been considered to be one branch of agriculture that is better off than most. It can be said, with some justification, that agriculture is industry's best customer, not only because farmers themselves spend over $3 billion annually for goods and services for their farms and families, but also because they have allowed consumers, other than farmers, more of their take-home pay to buy new cars, television sets, better health care and housing, as well as many of the luxuries which we enjoy today. And they have done this by providing them with cheaper and cheaper foods in relation to wages and costs.

You may well ask how a farmer in Ontario—indeed, in Canada—can stay in business? Many of them do not. Since 1956 more than 110,000 dairy farmers have stopped milking cows. Those who have remained have been able to do so only by increasing their efficiency.

Each farmer or farm worker produces approximately 150 per cent more food than he did in 1949. This represents a greater increase in output for a man than any other major industry. All the benefits from this—and more—have accrued to the Canadian consumer, and has benefited the farmer only to the extent that it has allowed him to stay in business.

Many farmers are deeper in debt today as a result. It takes an ever-increasing amount of capital to increase farm efficiency.

I should like to quote another remark of Mr. Biggs, made at the soil and crop improvement annual meeting this year. He said:

We must not allow the farmer to be sacrificed on the altar of his own efficiency.

Indeed, Mr. Chairman, he is being sacrificed on the altar of his own efficiency. Many farmers have been living on the money that should have been used to replace machinery and neglected buildings and houses. In other words, they have been living on their depreciation.

The two concluding paragraphs in the Barrie Examiner editorial in connection with Mr. McLaughlin's speech are worthy of noting, and I am quoting from the editorial that appeared in the Barrie Examiner in connection with that speech:

We believe Mr. McLaughlin to be exactly correct in every point. There can be no question but that cost of a policy of cheap food, traditional with all western governments, should be borne by the community as a whole, not simply by the farmers who produce the food. Mr. McLaughlin suggested that such spreading of expense could be achieved either by permitting food prices to find their proper level and subsidizing consumers unable to afford them, or by subsidizing agriculture itself, a less desirable policy from the farm point of view, but perhaps the most easily workable one.

And the concluding paragraph:

Surely it is time for Canadians everywhere to take stock of their agricultural industry and grasp the implications of its continued collapse, for without a thriving and prosperous farm industry of their own, this country must inevitably become a dependency of the United States, dependent upon American farmers for their surpluses and handouts. The Canadian farmers need help in the worst way, and they need it now.

Mr. Chairman, there can be no question that the cost of a policy of cheap food, traditional with all western governments, should be borne by the community as a whole, and not simply by the farmers who produce the food. Mr. McLaughlin suggested that such spreading of expense could be achieved either by permitting food prices to find their own level, and by subsidizing the consumer who could not afford that food, or by subsidizing agriculture itself—as pointed out in the editorial, a less desirable policy from the agricultural standpoint but perhaps the most easily worked out.

The predominant philosophy is that everyone in the population should be able to buy food, so it must be cheap. This is a reasonable and just philosophy, no question about that. It is reasonable and just but it is neither reasonable nor just to expect the farmers to sacrifice their living standards in order to make it work. It should be a charge against the whole population. In other words, we in this province and in this country as a whole have some catching up to do on our agricultural thinking.

Just to give the hon. members of the House an idea of what has happened to the farm prices, let me cite to you a few of the statistics for the different farm products sold on August 15, 1951, compared with the prices received by the farmer on August 15, 1964. I am quoting my friend, the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Villeneuve), who I believe used these figures in his Budget speech. I hope he does not mind if I use them also.

Commercial dairy cows of all breeds in 1951 brought $280 per head. In 1964 they brought $212 per head. These cattle were worth $31.67 in August, 1951; $20.93 on an average in 1964. Hogs, dressed, were $32.29 in 1951; $26.51 in August, 1964. Chickens dressed were worth 50 cents per pound in 1951, 32 cents in 1964. Turkeys dressed were worth 58 cents per pound in 1951; 41 cents per pound in 1964.

This is the picture facing agriculture in 1965. Is it any wonder that rural poverty, instead of being confined to small pockets in this province, is now widespread? Is it any wonder we face the farm problems we do? As a matter of fact, a similar situation in a number of other segments of the economy would have resulted in a revolution in this country and this province, but the farmer being the responsible citizen that he is has tended to accept the situation. Outside of a few faint cries for help issued through farm organizations, they have generally tended to hope that time would correct the situation. This just is not so.

Of course, there have been a number of factors which have tended to complicate the situation—namely, the difficulty of organizing farmers because of their large numbers, and second, as an outgrowth of the first, the lack of a unified, loud, clarion voice on behalf of the farmer. I am not saying for a moment that the federation of agriculture and the farmers' union organizations have not done a good job. I think they have done a good job. I think they have done a tremendous amount of work on behalf of the farm people across this province. All I am saying is that this work has been impeded by disunity, and the expression of different ideas and often conflicting opinions by the two groups and people within the two organizations themselves. For this reason, farm poverty, lack of adequate income, call it what you will, has not received the attention it deserves.

Michael Harrington in his book, The Other America, states:

Perhaps the harshest and most bitter poverty in the United States is to be found in the field.

Have we any reason to believe the situation is different here? I do not think so. Harrington goes on to say:

Technological advance has been of great service to the large corporation farmers and they exercise their powers in governmental circles to secure that which will further benefit them. They actually oppose some of the much-needed reform in the depressed rural areas.

Still quoting:

Farm poor are for the most part without a voice in the United States. The dominant voices are those representatives of the wealthiest conservative stratum of the farmers.

Is the situation drastically different here? I do not think so. Because of the underrepresentation of the poor in the circles of power, because they are by-and-large invisible to the middle-class conscience, there will have to be a vast social movement—a new period of political creativity, if you will—before there will be any large-scale abolition of poverty, either in rural Ontario or anywhere else. I am hopeful that Mr. Pearson's war-on-poverty campaign will create the political creativity that will cope with this poverty that we have, not only in our own province but certainly across Canada.

John F. Kennedy, in a letter to Lyndon Johnson on April 10, 1963, said:

Poverty in the midst of plenty is a paradox that must not go unchallenged in this country.

May I ask my hon. friends, are we going to allow it to go unchallenged in this province? I should hope not.

Professor A. S. Scott, professor of economics at the University of British Columbia, stated in a document, "A Policy for Declining Regions," which was presented at the conference that was set up by my hon. friend's colleague, the hon. Minister of Economics and Development (Mr. Randall):

In agriculture there is a continent-wide contraction in labour requirements of food production, coupled with a rather slower growth and demand for food and for other goods, and a high rate of natural increase among farm families and in rural regions generally which have tended to prevent a steady rise in farm income, and of course a steady migration to the cities and to other industry.

Within the last few years we have witnessed the transformation of farming from an art to a science and from a way of life to a business. Notwithstanding this, people are prone—and when I say people I use it in the general sense because I think that people in the urban areas tend to feel, notwithstanding what I have said, that farmers are doing very well financially—to forget that for the protection of the consumers during the war the price of Canadian farm produce was frozen at prewar levels. They forget that farmers were denied world prices, and they forget that the prices of farm commodities have never been able to catch up since the war to those of other goods and services.

So pronounced is this disparity between rural and non-rural incomes that Hedland Menzies, a Winnipeg consulting firm, took a survey of low-income farming areas in eastern Canada, and said that the low-income farmer constitutes the core of the agricultural problem in Canada. We have the Menzies report describing the low-income farmer as one with a farm cash income of less than $2,500. Half of these, the report said, are candidates for absorption or abandonment. Sixty-four per cent had cash incomes of less than $2,500. A publication by the Ontario federation of labour, Poverty in Ontario '64, points out that 27 per cent of Ontario farm families, or 131,000 farm persons, can be said to be living in destitution; 43 per cent of Ontario farm families, or 203,800 farm persons, can be said to be living either in poverty or destitution; 65 per cent of Ontario farm families, or 315,400 farm persons, can be said to be living either in deprivation, poverty or destitution.

It goes without saying that it is difficult in declining rural regions, to maintain facilities such as schools, roads, and what have you. Is it any wonder that the rural young people are tending to gravitate to the larger centres and to the cities? The schools are not well maintained. The families of farm operators are deprived of the opportunity to become well trained. Then eventually the cities will become affected, because these young people will eventually end up in the cities.

Poor people are not able by themselves to take advantage of the abundance surrounding them. They must be rescued, with public effort and with public funds. If farmers are to be expected to provide food at prices so that everyone can buy, the benefit is to all of the people, therefore all of the people carry a responsibility in providing agriculture the security and stability it requires.

To put it very simply, the people of Ontario, indeed Canada, cannot have their cake and eat it too. Suggestions have been made at various times that tactics used in other countries should be employed in an attempt to cope with our farm problems in this country, in this province. On more than one occasion I have heard responsible people say: "Well, they work very well in that particular country, but I am afraid they will not work here. Our country is too big. Our conditions are so much different. Those policies just will not work here."

I say to those people, perhaps they will not. Perhaps they will not work on a national basis. If they will not work on a national basis, try them on a provincial basis, on a regional basis. Try them. To say that something is not possible is an intimation of a conjured excuse rather than a legitimate reason. If poor farmers are to be rescued by public effort and public funds, as I believe they must, then I think one of the means employed can be the ARDA programme.

Maurice Sauvé, the federal forestry Minister who now has ARDA under his wing, has said that ARDA is an agricultural programme where necessary, but not necessarily an agricultural programme. He pointed out in his speech to the Ontario federation of agriculture annual meeting in November, here in Toronto, that as far as ARDA is concerned, Canada has three types of rural areas:

One—Farm areas of intensive commercial farming where rural development programmes are not needed. In other words, we do not need to worry about them. They will look after themselves.

Two—Farm areas that do not have a viable system of commercial farming and need help.

Three—Non-farm areas that are plagued by diminishing power and need a lot of help.

Mr. Sauvé also said, the types of programmes needed are:

One, the consolidation of the low income farms.

Two, creation of employment opportunity through the development of resources and the stimulation of industry.

Three, the re-establishment of people in certain areas and regions.

Last year, when I was discussing the ARDA programme, I recall advocating more local involvement. I think this has been done. I know the county councils have taken responsibility in this regard. I think the local involvement has been more or less given over to them. However, the success to date has not been what one might call earth-shattering. The big problem, of course, is how to get local people involved; how to get them to recognize that they have a problem in the first place. Certainly if they do not recognize that they have a problem, then it is almost impossible to sell them the fact that they need help.

It would seem to me at this point, and as we have progressed along in the ARDA programme, that we should be considering the need for what I might call an ARDA county co-ordinator, a community development officer, call him what you like, who would actually work with the county councils, the local people and the farm organizations in the areas. It is only by transposing the views and the ideas of ARDA into action at the local level that we are going to get anywhere, and that ARDA in the final analysis is going to mean better rural areas in Ontario.

To my mind, the function of this co-ordinator or development officer could be much the same as an EMO co-ordinator. Not only should he be involved with the local people, and the local organizations, he should have easy access to Mr. Crown's office here in Toronto; and the liaison should be an easy one. In a number of instances there has been a definite lack of co-ordination between the local organizations and The Department of Agriculture here in Toronto. I can think of the Bruce county area, for instance. Bruce county has been trying to get a community pasture for months. The project has been approved. Everything seems ready to go, and yet nothing happens. According to my information, Toronto says everything is okay. Toronto says it is Ottawa's fault, but Ottawa says everything is okay as far as it is concerned; yet nothing happens. They are not getting their community pasture programme, even though the project has been approved. The fruition of the community pasture has subsequently not been forthcoming. Indeed, there would appear to be a hiatus between the local people and the various levels of government. It is my feeling that the local co-ordinator would do much to relieve this situation.

When I say this, I am saying it with the full knowledge that a co-ordinator, or some person to co-ordinate the programmes and to establish liaison between the various organizations and The Department of Agriculture, has been functioning on Manitoulin Island. I know that my hon. friend and colleague from Algoma-Manitoulin (Mr. Farquhar) has done a great deal of work and

I know that the ARDA programme has been used extensively in Manitoulin Island. I realize that this local co-ordinator has been appointed, so I simply say to my hon. friend: "Could not this be an ideal across the province?" If my hon. friend thinks this is good in Manitoulin Island, could it not be emulated across the province, with a great deal more success than has been seen up until this point? I make that suggestion to him and I hope he will comment on it, because I think that ARDA has tremendous potential, and I think we better start working these things out.

As I indicated, economic planning is a very large undertaking. It takes the fullest co-operation of all levels of government. The people of this province deserve that, because in an undertaking such as this, one is dealing with the lives of people individually and in a community sense. So it follows that what is done will affect the present generation, as well as generations to come. It is interesting to note that the federation of agriculture has embarked upon an energetic programme of rural development. According to the federation brief presented to the Ontario Cabinet this year, it perceived the use of every means, plan, project and proposal to increase income opportunities for rural residents, to direct resources into their highest and best use and to improve community services of all kinds. The brief says in part:

We are concerned with poverty that demeans and breaks the human spirit. Especially are we concerned with young people who, raised in economic and social want, may have too little opportunity unless prompt action is taken to know any other conditions.

In short, rural development is a total programme. A total programme demands total effort, yet there are three paragraphs in the brief in connection with rural development which I find very interesting. I think I will read them for the benefit of the House. The federation brief says in part:

With the passing of time we are beginning to believe that our assumption concerning the amount and timeliness of government help may have been too optimistic. Provincially, the requirement of close communication and co-operation within and between government departments, so vital to the total concept, has not been realized, with one notable exception in our experience. Most government departments have displayed a singular lack of interest in what other departments were doing. Branches within departments erected barriers instead of bridges. A competitive rather than a co-operative spirit too often has been the prevailing attitude. In addition, there has been the problem of finding technicians to help perform the necessary job of appraising and cataloguing the fund of human and other resources available for development.

The brief goes on:

Were we not so sure that there our approach was sound, we might have been tempted to withdraw from the field, but we are certain of our ground.

Mr. Chairman, if I may just interject at this point: The federation is saying in effect, "We believe so strongly in the rural development programme that nothing is going to stop us. We have had no encouragement from the provincial government, we cannot get any co-operation from it; it is establishing barriers instead of bridges between the departments and between branches within the departments, and if we did not believe so strongly in it we would have given up long ago." I say it is most regrettable, Mr. Chairman.

The brief goes on:

But we are certain of our ground. The necessity of maintaining our present course is dictated by the quickening march of change. We are bolstered in our resolve by the existence of ARDA, whose published aims make it the most hopeful piece of farm legislation yet devised.

We urge the government of Ontario to recognize the need for a total effort and to provide in full for the mighty task of re-organization confronting rural society.

As I have said, Mr. Chairman, it is most regrettable.

Let me say to my hon. friend that this is no time to be plodding along with feet of clay. If my hon. friend has not already done so, he should be setting up lines of communication with other departments, and with his colleague the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management (Mr. Simonett) for one. He should be setting up lines of communication within the branches of his own department.

The brief says:

Most government departments have displayed a singular lack of interest in what other departments were doing. Branches within departments have erected barriers instead of bridges. A competitive rather than a co-operative spirit too often has been the prevailing attitude.

I say: absolutely inexcusable. This points up the lackadaisical, lazy attitude this government has toward ARDA.

In my opinion, it is just about time the government started to recognize the need for a programme of rural development in Ontario. It is just about time the people of the province had some revitalized thinking coming from this government in respect to ARDA and its potential. In addition to what I have already said, there is a crying need for a number of people to do some concentrated research on the human and other resources across the province.

This research should be interrelated with research done by the federal government on various projects. It should be carried out as a province, not on a piecemeal sort of approach. It should be carried out with the thought in mind, is there a need for ARDA in one area as opposed to another area? None of this to my knowledge has been done on a provincial basis. There has been a great deal of research done on the federal level, but no extensive research done on a provincial basis. Furthermore, such research should be done, as I have said before, in co-operation with the federal authorities to avoid overlapping and duplication. In other words, the government should be working toward a freely co-ordinated, research-oriented programme to ensure that the fullest and best use is made of the ARDA programme.

It is interesting to see what Leonard Gertler said when he presented a paper at the conference of regional development sponsored by the hon. Minister of Economics and Development. My friend, the hon. member for York South (Mr. MacDonald) read this particular paragraph when he was discussing the estimates of The Department of Economics and Development, as it related to regional development associations. However, I intend to read it again, if for no other reason than to underscore what it says:

One of the most striking demonstrations of the difference between the Quebec type of approach and the Ontario type is the relative importance placed by each on research in their ARDA programmes. In the figures released by federal ARDA this past summer on projects at the end of the first full operational year of the federal-provincial programme, Quebec's projects are shown to include an amount of $1,203,546, or about 23 per cent of the total, for research, while the amount for that purpose in Ontario was $187,405, or about six per cent of the total ARDA expenditures in the province.

The descriptions of the Quebec research project indicate that the greatest effort is being made in comprehensive studies designed to evaluate resources with a view to increasing income, employment opportunities and the standard of living of the population on the lower south shore of the St. Lawrence, to study the physical resources and their economic impact so that the first draft of an overall plan of action can be prepared and solved.

And the paper goes on to say:

The ARDA projects are not isolated phenomena but are what appears to be an increasingly systematic approach to the basic problems of economic development in the province.

How is this government going to know in what direction to go if it does not do research to find out? Then after the findings have been assessed and the course of action decided upon, there is a definite need for close co-operation between the various departments and the various branches within the departments. Up to this point, it appears that very little of this has been done in the province.

In Quebec, for instance, 80 specialists have been working on a research project; they have been doing intensive research, they have been working for more than two years now. I am told it will take at least another two years before their work is completed. They are spending approximately $4 million in this research project. It is commonly referred to, I believe, as the eastern Quebec planning bureau.

Completion of plans to build one of the finest ski resort areas in the world in the Gaspé peninsula is near. I am told that this ski resort is being built under the ARDA programme. It is in a low-income area and the area needs some lifting or some boosting in terms of money being poured into it. The research has indicated that this would be an economical project and one in which support would be forthcoming from within the area itself. In other words, the ARDA programme will build it, then the local people will look after it and it will be an economical and money-making project from then on.

Mr. G. A. Kerr (Halton): It is not farming.

Mr. Gaunt: The hon. member says it is not farming. Granted it is not farming, but in some of these areas you cannot develop good farms because there is nothing to work with. The land is not such that it is conducive to the farming operation and so you have to bring in something else. This is precisely what the Quebec people have done in this connection. This project is a very elaborate project because it includes an airport so they will be able to fly people in from New York and fly them back out again, Mr. Chairman.

I repeat, all of this is being done under ARDA, and millions and millions of dollars are involved.

I point this out simply to show that Quebec is doing and has done extensive research to actively assess the needs and the type of project required, taking into consideration the human and other resources. Then it is moving forward very quickly into the areas in which the studies have indicated it should go. In the meantime, this government stands around wringing its hands, carrying out the odd little project here and there, trying to look busy even though it is not too sure whether the project was the right one in the first place or not.

I am saying this with the full knowledge that the initiative has to come from the local people, but how are the local people going to make a wise decision if the relevant facts are not made known to them? The only way the relevant facts can be made known to them is to conduct a research study, and this has not been done on the scale in which I have indicated.

Certainly these things should be done and they should be done within the broad confines of economic planning, and surely that is a government responsibility. I dare say that more extensive use could have been made of the ARDA programme in the unfortunate, and in some cases rather drastic drought situation in eastern Ontario in the last three years, culminating as it did last year when this government declared the region a disaster area.

The Ontario Department of Agriculture has given aid to the area; it has given aid on a 50-50 basis with the federal government, to the extent of 75 per cent of the payment toward hay transportation up to $10 a ton. The government has guaranteed bank loans up to a maximum of $4,500, repayable over a period of three years, for the purpose of purchasing feed. Those who have junior farmer loans have had the principal amounts deferred for a year, as I understand it, or they can be amortized over the remaining period of the loan. In addition, the government offered freight assistance to farmers in eastern Ontario who wanted to ship their cattle from their farms to the stockyards. There was also help offered in the building of farm ponds, a policy which applies right across the province.

Having said all this, let me say further, in the light of this being declared a disaster area, that I think the help that was offered is peanuts. Of course, the people appreciated the little bit of help that was given to them, of course they would. Why would they not? When you are desperate, you appreciate anything. Anything looks good.

As far as the 75 per cent payment toward hay transportation up to $10 per ton is concerned, what happened in a good many cases was simply this: those who were doing the transporting moved their prices up accordingly, because they knew the Ontario government was subsidizing the cost of transportation. So, in the final analysis, very little saving was realized by the farmer—the man who really needed the help. It did not happen in all cases, but it happened in a number of cases.

The Department of Agriculture has guaranteed bank loans up to a maximum of $4,500, payable over a period of three years for the purchase of feed. In an article in the Family Herald of February 4, 1965, page 13, Mr. Suderman, in an article about eastern Ontario, says:

Sixty-four per cent of the farmers in Renfrew county make less than $2,500 per annum.

How, by any stretch of the imagination, are these people going to be able to pay back $4,500 in three years? I will tell you. They are not. They are not.

My hon. friend may say that if a farmer does not make any more than $2,500 per year, no one is going to lend him money, not even the government. If this is so, then it strengthens my argument, because, after all, there are 64 per cent of these farmers in this state in eastern Ontario, according to Mr. Suderman. It becomes obvious that this would be an area for concentrated research, and a fairly substantial ARDA project.

I realize that a number of smaller projects have been carried out in eastern Ontario. I do not know precisely what projects, but I know that work has been done. But it seems to me that up until this point it has been done in a rather piecemeal fashion.

I am looking upon this as a complete rural development programme project. This could be one way out for my hon. friend. I am suggesting to him that I think this could be one way out, since he did not see fit to give the eastern Ontario farmers the kind of help required to get them back on their feet after the area was declared a disaster area. The connotation "disaster area" in the United States means that large sums of public money are poured into the area in order to rehabilitate the area, because such things as this—

Hon. Mr. Stewart: By the federal government.

Mr. Gaunt: Yes, it is done by the federal Treasury. That is right. But it is done in order to rehabilitate the area, to get it back on its feet, because things such as drought, tornadoes and so on are acts of God. No one can help them. It is not the farmers' fault that they are placed in this particular position. Everyone is powerless to stop it. With all respect to the hon. Minister, and to what he has done, the kind of assistance he has offered certainly will not do this. Worse still, it will not even come close.

Even more far-reaching is that everyone in the community—not only the farmer, but everyone—suffers, because basically eastern Ontario is rural in nature, and the businessman, from the grocer to the druggist, the car dealer to the dentist, suffers because the farmer has not got the money to spend. At this juncture I would like to make one suggestion to my hon. friend.

Where guarantees have been made on bank loans of $4,500 or a portion thereof, and where a farmer has had less than $500 income over the past two years, after deducting expenses from gross income and allowing for capital depreciation on buildings and machinery, but not including his own labour, The Department of Agriculture should forgive the debt of that farmer provided he is a full-time farmer. This would be established either from his farm account books, or from his income tax returns. What could be more reasonable?

Where in this country would you find anyone willing to work as hard as a farmer has to work during the year, and do it for $500 or less? I do not think you would find too many. To me this is a very reasonable suggestion, and I hope the hon. Minister will give it serious consideration. Surely, that is the least the government could do for this stricken area.

I realize this is getting into an area dealing with the government's attitude and philosophy towards agriculture. It seems to me that this government has, over the years, adopted the attitude that if the farmers yell and scream hard enough and long enough, we will throw them a crumb or two. This philosophy towards agriculture over the years has hampered, in my opinion, impeded, yes, and almost made impossible the development of long-term planning needed for agriculture today and needed so badly.

Indeed, I am inclined to wonder whether this government has any policy other than a day-to-day, "eat, live and be merry for tomorrow we die" attitude towards agriculture.

In this connection I noticed an article in the Rural Co-operator in which Mr. G. F. Perkin, marketing commissioner with The Ontario Department of Agriculture, is reported as addressing a meeting of the county wheat committee members in Toronto last fall.

I want, first of all to take out a paragraph from Mr. Perkin's comments because I find them very interesting. This article, as I said, appeared in connection with Mr. Perkin's comments when he was addressing the meeting of the county wheat committee members in Toronto:

Higher prices are important, but higher net incomes for farmers can be obtained by several means. Ontario marketing boards have never made any effort to realize lower costs of production.

A most interesting statement. I realize that Mr. Perkin is a civil servant, that he is a very fine man, and presumably he was reflecting the government attitude, the government thinking and policy in this connection.

Let me read for you again:

Higher prices are important, but higher net incomes for farmers can be obtained by several means.

The key word in the sentence is "but." What Mr. Perkin is really saying, or was really saying at that meeting, was that higher prices are important, but I do not think you are going to get them, so you will have to get them through some other means.

Then he goes on to spell out the one other means that he thinks farmers can use in order to increase their income. Then he makes another interesting statement, he says:

Ontario marketing boards have never made any effort to realize lower cost of production.

In other words, Mr. Perkin is saying to the farm people gathered at that meeting, "You are not going to get higher prices, so one of the ways to raise your income is by lowering your cost of production. In other words, increase your efficiency."

How does this opinion jibe with the parting shot offered by the deputy Minister at the soil and crops improvement annual meeting in Toronto in January, when he said:

I do not think that the farmer should be expected to allow himself to be sacrificed on the altar of his own efficiency.

Those words by the deputy Minister are the words which reflect a realization that the farm problem cannot be solved by increasing efficiency alone, and neither it can. In the past number of years, all the advantages from increasing the efficiency of production have been more than wiped out. Is a farmer expected to increase efficiency in the next few years, and end up in, let us say 1975, in a worse state than he is today? Of course not, and this is what Mr. Biggs was saying.

On the other hand, Mr. Perkin comes up with what I would call an incredible piece of rationalization when he said, "Ontario marketing boards have never made any effort to realize lower cost of production." Of course they have not. That is not their job. The job of marketing boards is to market the product in the most efficient manner in order to obtain the best possible price for the primary producer in a market place where the bargaining power and the expertise of the buyer and the seller are closely aligned. That is the job of the marketing board. There are a whole host of farm organizations interested in increasing the efficiency of the farmers across this province. I can think of the soil and crop improvement association. I can think of the federation of agriculture and its many allied member associates. All these people are interested in increasing efficiency and in the increased efficiency of the farmer. Let these organizations do the job and let the marketing board do the job it is intended to do: Market the product the farmer produces.

As I say, and I will repeat again, Mr. Perkin is a civil servant and certainly he cannot be blamed for what he said, because presumably he was simply expressing government policy and he did it at this particular time. Yet there is another aspect of government policy that is expressed by Mr. Perkin, in the same address, which is rather interesting. Mr. Perkin talks about the fact that marketing boards should be broadened:

It is time for processors, retailers and consumers to be represented on producer marketing boards, according to an Ontario government official. The official, G. F. Perkin, marketing commissioner with The Ontario Department of Agriculture said: The best efforts of the Ontario department over the past five years to broaden the outlook and strengthen the membership of existing or new producer marketing boards have largely been rejected.

The editorial, Mr. Chairman, by Corinne Hughson, which appeared later in the Rural Co-operator in connection with Mr. Perkin's comment seemed to be appropriate at this time. It was entitled: "To strengthen which board?"

It is true that the farm products marketing board has been urging marketing board officials to add processors and even consumers to its board. To my mind the much superior way is to have the marketing board advised by an advisory committee, and we have already done that in legislation which has been presented to this House during this session. That, to my mind, is the way to do it. This, of course, is a matter of opinion and how I feel about it. I think that it is just about time the government stopped advocating this dual multi-purpose representation on producer marketing boards.

A few months ago Ellen Morningstar—I believe Mrs. Morningstar is president of the Canadian consumers association—stated:

The consumers association of Canada has never wanted or asked to be represented on producer marketing boards. In fact, the CAC would consider it has no right to do so.

How explicit can one be? Mrs. Morningstar says we, as consumers, do not want to be represented on producer marketing boards. We even consider that we would have no right to be on them. And yet her pleadings have gone unanswered. I am sure my hon. friend from Welland (Mr. Morningstar) would concur with what I have said. As I said, her pleadings have gone unanswered.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Give me an instance where they have gone unanswered.

Mr. Gaunt: Well, Mrs. Morningstar says that she would consider she had no right, or any consumer had no right, on a producer marketing board; yet she wants to be represented on the farm products marketing board, and as yet we have not seen the fulfilment of that.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Is the hon. member recommending that she should be?

Mr. Gaunt: I am not recommending it, I am just simply saying that Mrs. Morningstar has said that she does not want to be on producer marketing boards, but would like to be on the farm products marketing board, presumably as vice-chairman with Mr.

McCague. She would no doubt like to sit on that board to keep up with the—

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I do not blame her, as far as that goes.

Mr. Gaunt: —to keep up with the trends in the industry and inform the consuming public accordingly.

At the same time Mr. Perkin was down at the wheat producers marketing board asking to have the processors, retailers and wholesalers on the producers marketing board in order to broaden the outlook and strengthen the membership. My hon. friend, if he really believes what is good for the goose is good for the gander, should have had a member of his farm products marketing board over talking to Canada Packers—urging them to have a member of the hog producers association on their board. He should have been over at Campbell Soups urging them to have a member of the vegetable growers on their board. A tobacco grower as a member of the Rothman board. The farmer can expect nothing less. If there is going to be give and take it cannot be the farmers who do all the giving and the retailers and the processors doing all the taking. As a matter of fact, if we approach anything like that which I have mentioned, then in the next few years I would fully expect this government to ask Mr. Walter Reuther, president of the auto workers union, if Mr. E. H. Walker, president of General Motors of Canada, could be a member of the union executive.

To me, marketing boards are an implement of, or a method of, collective action on behalf of the farmers. I ask you how can collective action be effective on behalf of the farmers when sellers, when buyers and middlemen are all represented on the same board through which effective collective action must be taken on the farmers' behalf? It cannot be done.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): That is as much of a philosophic mishmash as the government's medical insurance bill.

Mr. Gaunt: I would urge the government—

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Give us an illustration of where this is happening.

Mr. MacDonald: One of your civil servants—

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Well, what he suggests and what the government does are two entirely different things.

Mr. MacDonald: I am glad to get that point clear!

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Quite clear.

Mr. Gaunt: Mr. Chairman, I am glad of the interjection of my hon. friend. I had presumed that Mr. Perkin was reflecting the government's policy in this connection; perhaps he is not, according to my hon. friend. I am willing to accept his word and I will leave it to his decision.

Mr. MacDonald: Maybe he was flying a kite—

Hon. Mr. Stewart: No kite!

Mr. Gaunt: Notwithstanding, it is my feeling, by and large, that farmers are in favour of marketing boards. I think this has been pointed up by the recent vote taken by the Ontario broiler growers. They have established a marketing board for themselves and they did it with a large percentage of the growers coming out and voting, and the percentage in favour of establishing a marketing board was quite large.

However, in some cases, it has been all too easy for farmers to imagine a market place which will enable them to set prices, just as prices are set for the items that they have to buy. Where this has not materialized, disillusionment has set in, and the farmer and the marketing board personnel have failed to recognize less spectacular gains. Despite this, requests for the setting up of new marketing boards continue to come before the farm products marketing board.

While a study of government philosophy toward farm marketing boards is an interesting one, so is the analysis of some of the trouble spots in which the government is trying to deal in the area of marketing boards. The bean board is a good example. The Ontario bean growers marketing board has been investigated by a firm of business consultants, and the consultants, Price, Waterhouse and Company, named to do the job by the Ontario government, have come up with a report. I saw this article in the London Free Press of Saturday, May 22. It says:

Complete separation of the Ontario bean growers marketing board from its wholly-owned subsidiary company, Ontario Bean Growers Limited of London, has been strongly recommended by an international firm of chartered accountants, it was announced today.

In a report to the Ontario farm products marketing board, Price, Waterhouse and Company said separation was essential if bean industry co-operation and harmony is to be obtained.

It said the separation is in the best interests of growers, the public and the industry.

In its bean report, Price, Waterhouse said the London company has not been influential in establishing a firm price for beans in the market place. It noted that the marketing board has the right to negotiate prices, so it would seem quite unnecessary to have a company to establish price.

Under the separation arrangement, the report suggested that the board should obtain separate office space and engage adequate staff and maintain appropriate records to carry out its basic function. The company was incorporated in 1952, but over the years it has been heavily subsidized by producer funds that were turned over to the company by the marketing board. The board has absorbed losses on operation of the company in the amount of $408,286.

In other words, the report of Price, Waterhouse and Company has confirmed what the government has already said, and has already indicated to the bean board. Obviously, the bean board takes the position that they would like to maintain the status quo.

Ironically, the dispute has come to a head at a time when unfair competition seems least valid. Apparently the Ontario Bean Growers Limited made a profit of $7,600 through normal competitive channels and operations last year. This was according to the secretary-treasurer. The secretary-treasurer has made it abundantly clear that no losses have been made up in the last three years.

A number of the bean growers have indicated that there were a few complaints from the dealers while the farmer-owned company was struggling, albeit with grower subsidies. Now the company is becoming successful and competitive without subsidy, there is a squawk from the dealers to the effect that this is unfair competition, and the government moves in and indicates that the bean board and the operation of the board and of the company must be separated.

Mr. Chairman, I move adjournment of the debate.

It being 6 o'clock, p.m., the House took recess.

Mr. M. Gaunt (Huron-Bruce): Mr. Chairman, when the House rose at 6 o'clock, I was discussing various aspects of the white bean board problem, and in this connection, I want to read part of an article that appeared in the Rural Co-operator:

The bean board is unanimous that it should continue to operate the processing plant. A recent annual meeting of the bean growers gave enthusiastic backing to this stand.

"We have no intention of splitting the two operations," Robert Allen, vice-chairman of the board, said last Saturday. "We will divorce the two operations only if ordered to do so by the government but we won't do it on our own."

Mr. Allen says the present operation best serves the farmer. The bean company gives the board a true indication of marketing conditions, profit margins, the situation on export markets and economic floor prices.

"The bean company also acts as a healthy price setter," the vice-chairman continued. "Early this season private dealers started bidding $6.75 per hundred for beans. Knowing market conditions, our bean company felt that the market could stand a more competitive price of $7. We started buying at this figure and immediately all of the private dealers matched us, getting this extra 25 cents for the farmers and putting another $300,000 into their pockets.

"We know the dealers don't like what we are doing. They say we are too keen in setting top prices," he said.

Ontario Bean Growers Limited handles only between eight and 12 per cent of the Ontario crop. Two thirds of the total crop is handled by one company, W. G. Thompson and Sons Limited, of Blenheim.

Recently dealers have complained that the bean growers' plant has been competing unfairly. This accusation comes at a time when the company made a small $7,600 profit under normal operations.

And I mentioned that particular aspect of it before dinner.

Also, the board has not subsidized the company's exports for three years, says Archie McMurchie, the secretary-manager.

Mr. Allen says he cannot understand the government's attitude. "Several years ago, after the supreme court findings, the farm products marketing board was suggesting that the bean board and company should merge their operations completely. Now it is the other way around." However, spokesmen for the farm products marketing board denied that the board made this proposal.

The board, according to my understanding, buys any surplus offered up until October 15. It buys a further 30 per cent up to the end of November. After that, the board buys beans only if the special committee agrees that the beans are truly in surplus at any time. The dealers would like the board to buy surplus beans, not only at the time the committee would like to buy them, but at any time, as does the Ontario wheat board with that commodity. The bean board prefers to buy only when the seaway is open, giving cheap access to European markets.

Without arguing the merits or otherwise of the bean board's buying pattern, the facts are that it handles only eight to 12 per cent of the crop, yet according to the article which I just read, it put more than $300,000 more money into the pockets of the farmers last year than would otherwise have been the case.

I would say, Mr. Chairman, that is a rather remarkable feat. Is it any wonder that the board refuses to separate the board from the company? It becomes rather obvious to me that the government is not going to change its stand on the matter. It is also rather obvious to me that the bean growers marketing board is not going to change its attitude toward this particular problem. It follows that we have here a collision course, unless a compromise can be reached.

It seems to me that such a compromise would be to turn the growers' company into a co-operative, which would have a special relationship with the marketing board. In fact, I cannot see why this special relationship could not include at least some of the same personnel, maybe even the same manager. It is my understanding that under the present marketing legislation, a marketing board has the right to name any company as its agent to perform specific functions, which would mean in this case that the bean board would name the bean co-operative as its agent, to process some beans and to provide designated marketing services. The co-operative could perform these functions on a fee basis, adequate enough to cover the co-operative's expenses.

Perhaps this would not be entirely satisfactory to the proponents on the bean board who insist that the company and the board should not be separated. Perhaps it would not be entirely satisfactory to the government which insists that a complete separation must be forthcoming. But I am suggesting it would be, in effect, a compromise of these two points of view. It would perhaps correct the government's charge of illegality and at the same time maintain for the bean board the advantage it now enjoys through what the government obviously looks upon as a common-law marriage.

In my opinion, farm market legislation and farm market legislators will have to reach the point where marketing boards have a very close relationship and liaison with processing and marketing facilities—not to the point of illegality, not at all, but most certainly to the point of allowing farmers through their marketing boards to control at least a portion of the end product. This is absolutely necessary because up until this point the expertise in the marketplace has been on the buying side, not on the selling side. Having said that, I realize well that marketing boards have done a great deal to increase the farmers' bargaining power in the marketplace and have been a vital step forward in the concept of collective bargaining rather than individual bargaining.

Nevertheless, the scales are still tipped in favour of the buying side. Never was this brought home so forcibly to me until I read an article in the Farmers' Advocate of December, 1964. It is entitled "Frankly Speaking We Can Sell More Ontario Food in Britain," says Honourable W. A. Stewart." I will read this article in part because it is rather interesting. It deals with white beans and that is the topic I want to deal with specifically in this particular speech. The article goes on:

An exciting opportunity for larger export sales in Britain awaits many Ontario farmers. In many cases, farmers themselves, through their marketing boards, can capitalize on the opportunities. In others, they will have to work closely with the processing companies.

I would just like to stop there for a moment. Let me say this. Of course my hon. friend is interested in increasing export sales of agricultural products, there is no question in the world about it. He states that farmers themselves, through marketing boards, can capitalize on export opportunities.

That is quite true where the marketing boards control the end product, as in the case of white beans, wheat, onions and so on. In these cases, there is no doubt that marketing boards are becoming more aggressive in the export field, with a great degree of effectiveness.

However, my hon. friend and I part company when he said, "In others they will have to work closely with the processing companies." Let me preface my remarks in this connection by saying that I realize work has been done in this area, and in many cases with a limited degree of success, particularly in the cases where the product had to be changed or altered before export as in the case of cherry pie fillings and canned peaches, tomato juice and so on.

However, the real problem here is that we are dealing with corporate companies, companies who have export buyers and sellers on their staffs, as well as the extremely competent people who have an abundance of business acumen. These corporate companies and their executives have a responsibility to their shareholders—and there is nothing wrong with that. But I am simply making the statement that these people have a responsibility to their shareholders to the extent that they must try to make as much profit as possible. It is, therefore, probable that these companies are not anxious to export, unless a fairly substantial surplus exists or appears to exist at any given time. They are more interested in maintaining a three to four to five per cent surplus in order to depress the price to the producer, which in the end means more profit to the company.

For one to think that the company is going to export quantities of a product in order to raise the price to the producer and lower its own profit picture, is simply naive. It just will not happen. Certainly there is more truth than fiction in the saying that a three or four per cent surplus sets the price. I realize that a slight surplus is absolutely necessary to maintain the continuity of supply, but not to the extent of substantially depressing the price.

If I may come back to my former point about the expertise in the marketplace being weighed largely in favour of the buyer and not the seller. That is why I say that before anyone can talk with assurance about increasing exports, the farmers, through their marketing boards, will have to control at least some of the end product. This is one reason why Danish pork has been so successful in the export market, and competing in world markets. The Danes can say to an importer, "We can supply you with 20 million pounds of pork," and mean it.

They can do this on a continual basis because the producers have control of the end product, to the extent that they can see all export demands filled and are interested in keeping within the confines of their own country only enough for their own consumption. That is one reason. The other reason of course is quality.

In summation of this point, I would say that in this province we should be giving every encouragement to marketing boards, to develop facilities to handle the end product—not in an illegal fashion but in an atmosphere where there is a very close working relationship between the board and the facility.

To continue the article:

The market has grown steadily for Ontario farm products since dollar restrictions came off. It is estimated we are selling $100 million worth of Ontario products in Britain now. If we can even get ten per cent of the UK import market, we can greatly increase this amount of sales.

There appears to be a market in Britain almost for the asking for thousands of more beans—bushels of beans—than we are now selling. Our export chances appear brighter with this crop than with almost any other, but we must do a selling job to take advantage of it. We have been export-selling beans only when we know we have a surplus; that is always too late in the season and there is no way to develop a profitable market. We must grow for a market, not just market what is grown. We must be able to guarantee a continuity of supply and quality within reason.

Besides, if we were to forward a price in the spring, shipping space could then be reserved for orders taken. We can set our price in the spring according to the US government's Commodity Credit Corporation price. Under the Commonwealth preferential tariff arrangement, we get an eight per cent tariff preference, plus the seven and a half per cent difference between the US and Canadian dollar.

Our main competitor in selling white beans in Britain is the US. Besides our price advantage over the US, our beans are also preferred by some processors in Britain from a quality standpoint. This year, with an Ontario white bean crop of close to 2,000,000 bushels, growers would have had an advantage in selling beans if a planned export selling programme had started in the spring.

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture): Pretty good speech.

Mr. Gaunt: I would say to the hon. Minister that at least I was in accord with that statement because I thought that this could be done, and that being so, I was all in favour of it.

My hon. friend is saying that in the spring a contract should be signed with the importer for so many bushels of white beans, in this case, at such-and-such a price, and for so many millions of beans to go to that particular country with all the arrangements being inherent in the contract which would be signed in the spring. In so doing, the bean growers in the province would have a price advantage, as I have indicated and as has been indicated in the article, because of the eight per cent tariff preference plus the 7.5 per cent difference between the US and Canadian dollars. In this way, the bean growers could actually produce for an export market.

Although my hon. friend does not say so in the article, I presume that he thinks such a contract would be conditional, pending yields, weather conditions and so on—the things that farmers are subjected to in the course of a growing season. To be perfectly frank and honest I thought this would be the case too, and I thought it would work well in the sense that planned export selling could be done in the spring, but if weather and crop yields were such that conditions of the contract could not be filled, then the contract was not in any way binding. However, I find out that this is not the case and I want to point out to my hon. friend that this is set out in a letter from Mr. Hugo B. Hammerslag, who is one of the most experienced bean dealers in North America.

It is a letter addressed to Mr. Archie

McMurchie, secretary, Ontario bean growers marketing board. I think I will read the whole letter because it is quite interesting and it sets out the arrangements which are made in the US by which the US exports beans to the United Kingdom and other places.

Dear Mr. McMurchie:

This will confirm our telephone conversation of February 6, dealing primarily with marketing practices of the Michigan bean industry and The United States Department of Agriculture in connection with export sales of Michigan pea beans.

As you indicated that officials of the farm products marketing board stated that buyers in the United Kingdom could purchase Michigan pea beans in the spring or summer for deferred shipment on the basis that the seller would not be required to make delivery on such contracts if growing and harvesting conditions resulted in production that was an amount that would not provide a surplus for export, the party or parties that made such a statement either have been deliberately or unintentionally misinformed, as nothing could be further from the truth.

I have been actively engaged in the bean business for more than 42 years, and to the best of my knowledge and belief, I have never known of a sale of beans to the United Kingdom or any other country made on the basis of the above statement. When we make a sales commitment, either domestic or for export, under normal peacetime conditions, the buyer in the contract, and by the same token the seller, expects the buyer to accept delivery regardless of market conditions.

It is apparent that some of your officials connected with the farm products marketing board do not thoroughly understand the bean support programme as administered by The United States Department of Agriculture. It might be well for them to secure a copy of the provisions and conditions under which this programme operates, from The United States Department of Agriculture, Washington, D.C., together with the standard beans storage agreement.

I believe that you have copies of these documents in your files and to expedite matters you might desire to forward these to the proper officials so that these documents can be properly evaluated.

The United States usually establishes the support price of dry edible beans during the spring prior to the time when beans are usually planted. This price does not become effective until September 1, and provides only for a loan to the producers at the support level that has been established. This is a non-recourse loan which permits the producer to borrow money from the Commodity Credit Corporation at the full support price, less storage and processing charges. The loans mature at midnight April 30 of the following year, which for the current crop would be April 30, 1965, and for the coming crop year would be April 30, 1966.

The United States Department of Agriculture does not take title until this time and therefore does not enter into any export or domestic sales, directly or indirectly prior to this date. Only producers are eligible to procure loans under this support programme. Bean processors or dealers have no rights whatsoever under this programme to borrow money on beans that they may have in their inventory, from either The United States Department of Agriculture or the Commodity Credit Corporation.

After the takeover date and when a determination is made as to the quantity of beans that the Commodity Credit Corporation may have in its inventory, they then determine at what price they will be willing to dispose of these beans on an export or domestic basis. At times there is no price differential between the domestic and export price. However, when there is a sizable surplus, beans designated for export are sold at a lower level than for the domestic market. The farmer or producer has the right to repay loans to the Commodity Credit Corporation at any time prior to April 30, and in such event he is required to pay the government interest on his loan; whereas, if the producer does not redeem the beans or repay the loan, interest charges are waived and as stated previously there is no recourse to the board.

A producer can only obtain a loan on beans that he actually produces and there are several penalties provided for any violation of this phase of the programme. Producers can also place beans under support of the programme without borrowing money from the Commodity Credit Corporation. This procedure is known as the purchase agreement arrangement, whereby the producer notifies the government that he is placing these beans under support and the government is obliged to take delivery of these beans at the support level prior to April 30 of the crop year involved. There are some slight technicalities involved with this procedure, but I am sure they would be of no interest to either yourself or your government officials.

I sincerely trust that this information will help to clarify a marketing procedure that exists only in the minds of individuals who have been grossly misinformed and I am sure that they will welcome information of this type. It will provide them with the truth and the sales practices that exist.

Sincerely yours,
Hugo D. Hammerslag

This letter, I am sure, produces an entirely different picture. When the United States government enters into the field of exporting beans it is for the previous year's crop, and the government knows precisely how many beans it has to sell. The only piece of speculation is the price at which they are sold.

If a comparable situation were to exist here, the federal government would have to provide for support prices, storage facilities, and undertake the negotiation with Great Britain or any of the importing countries for the sale of beans in the spring following the crop year.

None of these things exists here in this country. In view of this, the only alternative is for the Ontario bean producers marketing board to undertake an export programme more elaborate and extensive than is now the case, because even though the bean growers in this province have an eight per cent tariff preference, and a 7.5 per cent advantage between United States and Canadian money, they have to, in effect, compete with the US Mint.

Frankly, under these conditions I find it rather difficult to visualize the Ontario bean growers marketing board getting into the export business wholesale, unless there was an assurance that it could be done at a reasonable profit to the growers. Unless beans were supported federally—which they are not—at a reasonably high level, then the producers would not know what they would get for the beans until the following spring, if they were producing specifically for an export market.

Undoubtedly our export trade in beans is going to increase, because production seems to be moving up in rather a spectacular fashion, particularly this year, and it follows that our exports are going to increase accordingly.

However, it would seem to me that if my hon. friend can convince Mr. Hays to do these things that I have mentioned, then bean producers can produce for an export market. Barring that, it would seem that any major shift in the exporting of white beans could not take place, at least for a few years, unless the government was willing to move into the field.

I want to move into the final area that I intend to discuss at this time. This is the vertical integration problem. My colleague, the hon. member for Grey South (Mr. Oliver), talked about this problem two years ago, and documented a very convincing case against integrators and those who were moving into the field.

I am certainly not going to repeat what he said. However, this year there appears to be an alarming increase in vertical integration, notwithstanding the efforts of the food council. I am told by reliable sources that York Farms and Green Giant are moving into the field extensively, so much so that the vertical integration of these two companies is up one-third over last year. These companies are offering very attractive deals, so attractive that one could hardly turn them down.

They offer to rent the farm for 10 years. In some cases, as an added carrot, they say that they will tile-drain the farm. Campbell Soups, for instance, has moved into the field in a rather spectacular fashion, undertaking to produce much of its own produce. In the chicken and turkey field, the company is undertaking to produce its own feed for these operations.

Apparently the food council has been ineffectual in dissuading these companies from entering the field to this extent. Even UCO has been involved rather extensively in the integration field.

I do not want to be to the co-operatives what Pierre Berton is to the Church, but I do not think a little introspection does any of us any harm. To descend to the vernacular, it really burned my socks to see UCO and Tenderflesh Limited importing turkeys by the carload from the United States this past year. Not only did they import, but they were one of the biggest offenders. And yet officials of the company justify this action by saying that they have to compete. In order to be competitive, they say, and stay in business, we have to do this.

The obvious question then is, stay in business at whose expense? The farmers, of course! The very man the co-operative was designed to help. It is a strange paradox indeed, Mr. Chairman.

Another excuse given is that this sort of thing guarantees a continuity of supply. I say hogwash. Who is trying to kid whom? Why are they not honest enough to say that they are doing it because they want to make a profit? Do you mean to tell me that in this country we cannot guarantee continuity of supply? Of course we can.

If I were offering advice to my hon. friend, I would say that he should get these people together to re-examine their aims and objectives, because I feel that the farming community as a whole cannot, and will not, tolerate this kind of action. Perhaps this kind of thing is the reason why some farm people, and even a few farm leaders, are becoming disillusioned about the co-operative movement in the province.

I repeat that the co-operative movement has done a lot in this province for farmers, particularly in the fertilizer business, and in a number of other fields. But I think it is about time that a reassessment took place, because I feel the co-operative movement has become misguided over the years, and I hope my hon. friend will help the movement get back on the rails once again. I say that most sincerely.

One of the main reasons for the immense increase in the vertical integration, from the farmer's vantage point, is the steadily increasing cost-price squeeze, and the resulting decrease of income in recent years. The farmer has turned to something that is sure to guarantee him a steady income with very little or no work, and so the climate is created for the vertical integrate.

If it has not already become clear, the tenor of my remarks has been centered around the farmer's inadequate income, and the problems that have arisen through farmers collectively—with the help of government—trying to better their luck in the marketplace.

When one talks about government help for farmers in the provincial field, it follows almost automatically that one will look at Quebec and what the Quebec government is doing for agriculture. The province of Quebec realizes the importance of agriculture to the province's economy, and is determined to help it, even if it means spending public funds to do so. Five to eight per cent of the total budget in Quebec goes for agriculture.

Let us turn for a moment to see what Quebec is doing for its farmers and for agriculture. First, let me make another point. Needless to say, when aid is given to agriculture to the extent that it is in Quebec by the government, no matter what the circumstances, it places our farmers at a very decided competitive disadvantage when similar help is not given here.

Now then, let us take a look at what Quebec is doing for its farm people:

1. Quebec is giving farmers a direct cheque, amounting to 25 per cent rebate on school taxes.

2. Under the Quebec farm credit association, the counterpart of our junior farmer loan, the recipient of a loan is entitled to a remission of one third of the amount loaned, up to $3,000, if he proves to the satisfaction of the bureau that he has lived on his farm and cultivated it without interruption during ten years following the date of signature of the loan. This is granted only once.

3. The bureau charges interest at the rate of 2.5 per cent per year.

4. In addition, under The Farm Improvement Act, 1961, the government will pay the interest up to 3 per cent on a loan of up to $3,000, if a farmer borrows money in order to purchase cattle, pigs or sheep for breeding purposes, farm implements and agricultural equipment or machinery, or the improvement of land and buildings.

5. The government pays the interest up to 3 per cent on a loan of up to $4,000 for one or more of the following purposes:

(a) Underground or surface drainage or the improvement of the land in any way.

(b) The erection or improvement of buildings.

(c) Drinking water supply systems, or improvement thereof.

(d) Installing or improving electric wiring.

6. The government of the province guarantees loans under The Farm Improvement Act, including losses of principal and interest up to 10 per cent of the total amount of such loss.

7. The government subsidizes the cost of transportation of livestock to slaughtering centres in remote areas, far removed from markets.

8. Special assistance and encouragement is given to farmers for purchases of purebred heifers, premiums for the purchase of purebred swine.

9. A direct grant of $1,000 for those who really desire to establish themselves on a farm in order to make a living, the grant to be used for agricultural purposes.

10. A grant of 30 per cent of the purchase price of commercial fertilizers, up to a maximum of $100 per farmer per year.

11. Subsidization of milk going into manufacturing plants to the extent of 17½ cents in the summer and 35 cents in the winter.

These are the main subsidization programmes of The Quebec Department of Agriculture. Needless to say, it is much more extensive than exists in Ontario. In order that farmers in this province be given the kind of help that is so desperately needed; in order that farmers in this province not be kept in a situation of competitive disadvantage with its sister province, Quebec; and in order that an attempt be made to bring the level of farm income closer to that enjoyed by other segments of the economy, I would strongly urge my hon. friend to implement with despatch the following:

1. Forgive one-third of every junior farmer loan to a maximum of $3,000 if the borrower has kept up, within reason, his interest and principal payments for ten years, provided he is a full-time farmer.

2. Reduce the interest on junior farmer loans from 5 per cent to 3 per cent.

3. Pay up to 2 per cent of the interest on farm improvement loans with a principal forgiveness after five years of 10 per cent on the total amount of the loan up to $500.

4. Subsidize the cost of transportation of livestock to slaughtering centres in remote areas that are far removed from markets.

5. Provide payment of a direct grant of 20 per cent of the purchase price of commercial fertilizers, up to a maximum of $75 per farmer for a year.

May I stress again, that this is help that farmers desperately need in this province and I would ask my hon. friend to act accordingly.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Huron-Bruce has covered the agricultural waterfront pretty completely and well.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald: Much of what I intended to say, he has covered, in whole or in part, and I am going to attempt to avoid, on those portions that he has covered, undue repetition. I shall borrow from his remarks, add some that I have and try to drive home the point. My basic theme will be the same as his, and this is no accident, because anybody who knows anything about agriculture knows what the basic problem of agriculture is. The basic problem of agriculture is that farmers do not have enough net income. It is as simple as that. There are very few problems in agriculture that could not be solved by the farmers themselves, if they had sufficient income to do it, but they are in a cost price squeeze. Their costs are going up and their incomes are tending to come down, so that they are in a squeeze and they are simply not in a position to help themselves.

We have had this illustrated many times in this House in many ways, but perhaps the best one is the simple fact that agriculture represents some nine or ten per cent of our population and is getting some four, five or six per cent of our income. They are getting about half of a fair share of the national or provincial income. Now I think something has to be done about this. I was interested in my hon. friend's reference to that speech of the deputy Minister when speaking to the soil and crop improvement association. I noticed that he also reproduced some of that speech in this report from Queen's Park under the direction of Don Fairbairn and, in it, he pointed to the nub of the situation. He said:

I am advised that since 1947 beef has gone up 25 per cent to the consumers, but down 13.8 per cent to the producers. Wheat was $2 per bushel to the farmers and bread 17 cents to the consumer. Now wheat is $1.65 to the farmer and bread is 23 cents to the consumers. Since 1951 the prices the farmers receive have gone down 13 per cent while the farmers' costs have gone up 13 per cent.

Mr. Chairman, we need go no further than that. I know of no other business in the world where costs can go up and incomes can go down and they still stay in business. The explanation for it, of course, is a very simple one. Farmers net a wage per hour which is grossly in violation of the minimum wage of this province, if applied even to the owners of the farms, to say nothing about the hired help on the farm. They are living on their capital; they do not take out of their business what any normal businessmen would do—an adequate, fair return percentage-wise on the capital they have invested. This is the only reason that farmers are able to exist.

Now, we have to do something about this situation. I was rather interested the other day when the standing committee was considering the milk bill. One of the witnesses that came before us, a gentleman from eastern Ontario, referred to the same speech of Mr. Biggs, and said he had heard this many times before. In effect, he said: "I am getting tired of hearing about it; I want to see some action that is going to do something about correcting it." And this is going to be the whole thrust and purport of my remarks. Not in detail, because much of the detail has already been given by the hon. member for Huron-Bruce, but in the areas in which I think the government has got to move if it is going to restore agriculture to a position where it is getting a fair share of the wealth that is being produced in this province, and in this nation.

One way that it has to be done, Mr. Chairman, is to have a planned economic development. That means there has got to be some conscious decisions made by this government. It has to be willing to pump back into the farm sector of the economy some of the wealth that experience has proven that the farm sector of the economy cannot get for itself through its normal marketing procedures.

Now right here, Mr. Chairman, I think we might as well face reality. This government will be very inhibited in doing this.

Second, we have got to face the fact that we live in a climate conditioned by the editorial writers in the Globe and Mail and the usual "city-slicker" approach to agricultural problems, which magnifies far out of proportion any subsidy that is given to agriculture. Actually these subsidies have done very little but toy with the problem of redressing the balance between agricultural income and agricultural outgo, but the whole climate is such that the public is conditioned to oppose and to think that the farmers are living on handouts.

The fact of the matter is that you can call them handouts—you can call them anything you want—but in a planned economic development, which is going to restore agriculture to its rightful place in our economy, much more money has to be put back in various ways into that agricultural sector. Obviously you will have to pick and choose to create the greatest possible incentive for the farmer to do the job himself, and I know of no group of people who will do the job for themselves, who are more independent, who are more willing to operate on a private enterprise basis and do their own job, if they have half a chance.

The problem is they are living in a capitalistic economy, where they are licked both ways. When they go to buy the things they want, they are charged whatever the person selling wants to charge them; in many instances when they go to sell, they have to take what the buyer wants to give them. They have, through their marketing schemes, been able to correct that to some degree, but not enough to redress the balance.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us take a look, as my hon. friend has pointed out, at the kind of thing that has been done in the province of Quebec. You will see both what is done and the rather spectacular results that have been produced in a short time. When I was discussing The Milk Act, I pointed out that one of the difficulties in saying to the great body of producers in this province, who might want to bring their production up to a grade A level, is that they simply have not got the means, on the net income that they are living with, to be able to improve the standard of their plant to reach grade A production.

In Quebec you find that, for example, in addition to the federal subsidies, the Quebec government has recognized that something must be done and is giving 35 cents a hundredweight subsidy for grade A milk from October to April. It is giving from 15 to 18 cents a hundredweight during the summer months in addition to the federal subsidies.

In other words, this is bolstering the income of that group of people who have not been getting a fair price for grade A milk, because they were in the manufactured milk field, enough of an income that they get up to something approaching the grade A price. In addition to that, you have direct subsidies of $500 for building milk houses. You have subsidies for mechanical cooling, not on any uneconomic unit, but on a basis of at least four cans or more. You have general assistance in fertilizer and lime and feed grains. Now, this is pumping back into the agricultural economy something that they should have, but within our economic system, experience has proved they simply have not got the power in the marketplace to get it for themselves.

In a planned economic development, you acknowledge that it is desirable that they should have it and you make certain that they get it. The techniques you use can be as varied as you wish to make them. Once again, as I said, by giving as much incentive for the job to be done by the farmers themselves.

I was interested, for example, in looking at the results. I pointed out the other day that as a result of the kind of programme that has been launched in the province of Quebec, over the past year the dairy herds in the province of Quebec increased some 23,000. The increase in the province of Quebec is four times the decrease in all the rest of the nation, including the province of Ontario. Indeed, only one other province other than Quebec has had an increase in the dairy herd numbers over the past year, and that is the province of P.E.I. Now, when I made that comment the other day, the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher) interjected and queried as to what sort of a change this represented in terms of the absolute numbers that they had before. I was interested in checking on that. Mr. Chairman, it is rather significant.

I discovered, for example, that in the years 1960 to 1964, this is what has happened in the province of Ontario with regard to the number of milk cows on farms. In each of those succeeding years it has gone from 975,000 to 992,000 to 970,000 to 950,000 and to 954,000.

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): What is the production?

Mr. MacDonald: The production has gone up, I agree. But I am talking about the number in the herds.

Now, what happened in the province of Quebec in the same five-year period? It was 1,009,000; 1,006,000; 1,032,000; 1,048,000; 1,060,000. A slow, but consistent increase. In Ontario, the tendency is to a slow decrease. But in the one year, following the incentives that have been given, to try to meet the position of the dairy industry at the moment, we find that in the province of Quebec there is a jump of 23,000 in the numbers; four times the decrease in all the rest of the nation.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: 1964?

Mr. MacDonald: The figures I gave you are 1964. And the ones I am giving you now, the change over the last year, are the figures as compared with last year and they are found in the latest news report from the Ontario milk producers co-ordinating board, May, 1965.

I was not able to get the exact figures as to the budget in the province of Quebec, because I think the budget figures are deceiving in that the so-called Quebec agricultural budget is a resources budget and it includes, I think, forestry and some other resources.

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): It is completely separate.

Mr. MacDonald: Is it completely separate?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I would not argue with you.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, if it is completely separate, I have got a devastating piece of evidence here for the hon. Minister, but I think he is wrong. The fact of the matter is, that the budget in the province of Quebec for agriculture last year was $112.5 million. Now, if the hon. Minister cares to take his estimates out, he will find that the agricultural budget in the province of Ontario, in the same year, is approximately $21 million. Now, I say to the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs, I am certain that this includes other departments that would be separate in the Ontario government.

However, the interesting thing is that if you take our agricultural estimates, the total, including the federated colleges at Guelph, was $21,500,000. The total for Guelph is $7,400,000. In other words, other than Guelph—which I am not minimizing, but if I can separate it for a moment—the total agricultural budget is $14 million. Quebec's assistance to their dairy industry is precisely that figure, Mr. Chairman.

The government in the province of Quebec hopes that by 1975 they will have increased the economic units by 100 per cent. If I may give these exact figures: Last year there were 90,000 farms in the province of Quebec, of which only 20,000 were considered economic units. By 1975 Quebec hopes to increase those 20,000 to 40,000 economic units by its assistance programme. And subsidies—if I may use that horrible term in the presence of a Tory government and the editorial writers and how they will use it and misrepresent it—to the dairy industry alone in the province of Quebec are $14 million a year, which is the total budget of this Department of Agriculture, other than the federated colleges at Guelph.

Now, without going into any more detail, the simple point I am making is that there is no point in lamenting, as Mr. Biggs has done most eloquently across the province of Ontario, the position of agriculture; the unfair position in relationship to the rest of the economy. There is no point in lamenting about it any further, if the government is willing to start to plan an economic development which will redress that situation. That means pumping back into the agricultural sector of the economy millions of dollars so that they will get their fair share. Now I know the hon. Minister will say that he is doing some of these things. He introduced, for example, a housing programme which he announced a few weeks ago. I am glad we have gotten to the stage where we can frankly say that there are houses in the rural areas that are equivalent to a slum and we want to do something about it. Up until now if you said that, you usually offended the rural folk so that you would defeat your purpose, politically at least.

We have the hon. Minister, for example, announcing that he is now going to have a contest in which they are going to give a prize in each county for the best homestead, for the best farm. Now all of this is very fine, but I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that this is not getting at the root of the problem. The root of the problem is to get money back into the agricultural sector of the economy so that they can do something about improving their farms. You may perchance, with some little assistance that you are giving or you may give with this tantalizing prospect of a prize, encourage them to do something. However, farmers cannot do something if they do not have the money. And there is no point in setting up a contest if the farmers basically lack the means to be able to improve their farms so they can meaningfully enter the contest.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: You are telling a farmer.

Mr. MacDonald: Look, my good friend, you have sold cars all your life, I was raised on a farm.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: You are telling a farmer.

Mr. MacDonald: Sure, I am telling a farmer but I am telling a Tory farmer who is opposed to economic planning.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: I have been much closer to farming in the last 20 years than you have. If you do not believe me, come on down and I can prove it.

Mr. L. Letherby (Simcoe East): Aren't the farmers raising enough produce now? What is your beef?

Mr. MacDonald: You know, Mr. Chairman, that comment is—it is good these two are together, Mr. Chairman—

Hon. Mr. Simonett: I am telling the truth.

Mr. MacDonald: That comment is about on the level of those made when we discussed the plight and the social problems of the Indians, when our friend the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management said that the Indians were happy living in their tents.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: I did not say tents.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I have dealt with one aspect of what I think has to be done—planning the economic development and pumping back income into the agricultural economy.

There is a second thing that I want to draw to the attention of the hon. Minister, and that is the whole ARDA programme. My hon. friend from Huron Bruce once again has touched on it, and I do not want to repeat what he said, but let me try to illustrate my point this way. I have here the report and digest of the ARDA projects at the end of the first full operational year, June, 1964.

Again, if it does not become too irksome I want to compare Quebec and Ontario. I do so because these are the only two provinces that are really comparable in terms of the nature of our agriculture, the size of the province and everything else. If you look through this book you will find on page 19 the report for the province of Quebec and what it has done in ARDA. There were 100 projects approved, there were 22 projects withdrawn or not approved, one project is under discussion with the provincial government, and four projects were recommended—a total of 127 projects and a total sharable cost of $6.8 million, with a federal share of $3.4 million. This is at the end of the first operational year, June, 1964. And then you go through this book and there are literally ten pages of the details of the projects.

When you get to the end of those ten pages, you come next to the province of Ontario. And what is the position? Not 100 projects as in Quebec, but only 21 projects. Not a total amount involved of $6.8 million as in Quebec, but a total amount of only $3.4 million. Not a federal contribution, as there was in the province of Quebec, of $3.4 million, but in Ontario only $1.8 million.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, I think two things have to be pointed out. I said this before but I think in the context of what we are considering here tonight it should be repeated. This government has taken a narrow, purely agricultural approach to ARDA. In the province of Quebec and in most of the other provinces across this country, they recognize that ARDA seeks rural area development.

One thing that becomes more and more apparent to anybody who takes a look at our rural area is that agriculture is becoming a smaller and smaller sector of the economy within that rural area. You have to diversify the economy. In the terminology that we picked up when we attended the regional development conference, you have to find the “growth points.” Some of the growth points may be logical, they may be obvious, and you encourage their development. In some other rural areas, they may not be obvious, therefore you have to go into intensive research.

Here again is where you get a striking contrast between what goes on in the province of Quebec and in the province of Ontario. Leonard O. Gertler, in the conference at Queen's on areas of economic stress in Canada, pointed out about that first year, and just let me quote this paragraph:

One of the most striking demonstrations of the difference between the Quebec-type approach to the problems of economic development and the Ontario-type is the relative importance placed by each on research into their ARDA programmes. In the figures released by the federal ARDA this past summer on projects, at the end of the first full operational year of the federal-provincial programme, Quebec's projects are shown to include an amount of $1,200,000 in round numbers, or about 23 per cent of the total, for research, while the amount for that purpose in Ontario was a measly—that is my adjective, it is not in the report: —$187,405, or about six per cent of the total ARDA expenditures in the province.

Not only are we spending much less on ARDA because of our narrow approach, but only six per cent of the very small amount that we are spending is going on research; Quebec is spending much more, and 23 per cent of that much bigger figure is being spent on research.

In other words, they are not playing around on the surface; they are going into an area such as they have done in that eastern Quebec development area, with a team of 80 experts—economists, sociologists, and all of the various modern disciplines, and they study the economy, and they discover what can be done to improve the economic position. Furthermore, as we all, I think, will acknowledge, you cannot develop one ARDA programme if you have not the participation of the people in the area, so that they feel that they are part of it and it is their project.

Another thing that is done in the province of Quebec, you will find, is that of 80 experts, a significant proportion of those experts is going to be what you might call adult educationists, people—

Mr. Letherby: Deadwood!

Mr. MacDonald: Not deadwood.

Mr. Letherby: Nitwits!

Mr. MacDonald:—people in radio and TV and various forms of adult education who, in effect, are taking these projects out and holding literally, not just scores, but hundreds of study groups with the people, to have them brought in, to study the problem and what they are planning to do, to get them to understand it and to get them to participate. All of this is part of modern economic development. I do not know but I would hope, for the benefit of the rural areas of the province of Ontario toward which ARDA can make such a real contribution, that it is not beyond the capacity of a good, old Tory government—

Mr. Letherby: We will not go for it.

Mr. MacDonald:—to face up to what is required in modern terms and to tackle the job. I repeat, ARDA is the second important item and it is one in which you can tap the resources that are available on the federal level to a far greater extent than you are doing. I wish, for example, this government were tapping the resources available at the federal level from ARDA in half as effective a fashion as we have done on technical and vocational assistance training in the building of our technical schools across this province. The money was there and we have gone after it to meet an obvious need in the province. The only conclusion I can come to is that the government is not persuaded of the need. If it were persuaded of the need in ARDA, it would go and get that money and put it to work to try to solve some of these problems.

Mr. Chairman, there is a third area that has been touched on in various aspects by the hon. member for Huron-Bruce and that, of course, is the whole question of marketing. One of the best ways to help farmers help themselves is to assist them in building more effective collective bargaining procedures through our marketing legislation. I must say that the last year has proved pretty conclusively that farmers in the province of Ontario have got over a stage of non-confidence as far as marketing boards are concerned. I doubt whether there has ever been a year in the history of the province of Ontario where the results of votes in marketing have been as spectacular. Indeed, the latest issue of the Rural Co-operator which came to my desk just this morning, headlines a front-page story "Newmarket plans near—" and reports still others that are emerging and on which they are hoping to have quick votes, in the Niagara peninsula.

Let us take a look for a moment at what has happened in the last year. You had the tender fruit vote—90 per cent “yes”; the largest vote that has ever been held, I understand, in any plan in the history of the province of Ontario. What interests me, Mr. Chairman, is this: This vote was held to give the marketing board the power to fix prices. I want this good Tory government to pause for a moment and contemplate this horrible manifestation of socialism—or something of that nature—emerging in their midst; and presumably it must have been with your approval or with the approval of the Ontario farm products marketing board.

In other words, a group of farmers discovered that in the very difficult circumstances of marketing perishable fruit, tender fruit, negotiating prices did not give adequate power to get the necessary returns. Apparently they got permission from the marketing board, they held a vote and they have 90 per cent endorsement and are now armed with the right to go out and say that the price for this product is going to be this. Where is your free enterprise now? Out the window, and quite rightly so.

Indeed, the interesting thing here, Mr. Chairman, if we are dealing with the philosophic aspects of the things, is that for years we have lived on the continent where economists have assured us that something in excess of 50 per cent of the prices on this continent are managed prices. Almost ten years ago the economists of President Eisenhower—this has stuck in my mind and I repeat it to make my point—studied it and said that 52 per cent of the prices in the United States were managed prices. In other words, the market demand and supply had nothing to do at all with the prices. When General Motors decides what it is going to do, for example, this year, it decides that the price of a car is going to be X number of dollars, and it fixes that price because it comes to the conclusion in advance that it is going to make X number of hundreds of millions of dollars profit, and it works back to the prices it has decided on. There is no play between the forces of supply and demand.

Here you have a very extraordinary situation, and I commend it. I think it is very heartwarming to discover that a group of lowly producers, who are in a relatively defenceless position in the markets, have finally—I trust not unwittingly, not unknowledgeably—been given the power by this government to fix their own prices so that they can have a greater hope of getting a return for their products that would match their costs of production.

There was the first vote. There was another vote, for instance, in the broiler industry, and here, of course, I should let the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Connell) take over, because he knows more about broilers than I ever could. For years he has had a surplus and he has to have a Tory feed every now and again—a barbecue—to get rid of his surplus. But the rest of them do not have that means of disposing of their surpluses and they were going bankrupt. So this year they had a vote and what was the result? Eighty-five per cent said “yes”—the largest-ever recorded vote for a new board in the province of Ontario, and they are going to go out fixing quotas to try to cope with this surplus. Here you have a board faced with surpluses, the problem that had wrecked the stability of their markets, which is now going to have the power to fix the quotas and try to get some orderly marketing established.

The wheat board, one of our old established boards, during this last year set a record. It bought some 5,000,000 bushels of wheat—all the surpluses have been disposed of. They had a plebiscite during the last year; they sought a major increase in their check-off; from ten cents up to 16.5 cents, and there were a lot of doubting Thomases who said, “Oh, the farmers in the secrecy of a ballot box when they have only to mark an X are not going to agree to this additional check-off. They will not have the wisdom to strengthen their collective position to market even more effectively in the future.” But the fact of the matter is that they had a 70 per cent “yes” vote. In this area they recognized what they needed.

You have a turkey vote set for June—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. member for Huron-Bruce was applauding in his “farmer” capacity, rather than his “professional” capacity as a member of the Legislature.

We have the bean problem. Again, my hon. friend has done me the service of spelling out most of the detail, but, Mr. Chairman, there is one thing that really puzzles me in relation to the bean board. Here is a board which has set up its own company to buy and cope with its surpluses in this particular fashion and this company has been in existence for some years. It has lost money consistently; indeed, it lost something in excess of $400,000 down through the years, up until three years ago, and all the time it was losing money, the independent dealers did not object. Three years ago, it started to make money. For the last three years it has consistently made money.

The additional fact that I draw to the attention of the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions (Mr. Grossman), in his new and intense interest in agriculture, is that the bean company has control of ten to 12 per cent of the beans—that is all—so it is only a small part of the market. Yet suddenly, Mr. Chairman, when the trade had no objection to the farmers strengthening their position and stabilizing the market all down through the years, it changed its mind, and you have great protests. Suddenly, the government begins to lend an ear to the protesters—those who were marketing 90 per cent of the product. Suddenly we have comments—rightly or wrongly I do not know, because I understand that some of the comments that got into the press were inaccurate—but you have comments from spokesmen of the Ontario farm products marketing board saying that the operations of the bean board were unethical.

The government suggested that they should separate the company from the marketing board. They had their annual meeting and the growers said in effect, "No, we have no intention of separating our company from the marketing board, unless we are ordered to by the government and then, in effect, under the law of the land." So what did the government do then? It brought in Price Waterhouse, and Price Waterhouse, of course, brought in a report which was precisely what the government wanted.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Are you suggesting that we dictated the report?

Mr. MacDonald: I do not know whether you dictated it, but I can tell you that if you were to take what you were saying before Price Waterhouse went in to study the matter and just elaborate on it, you would have an accurate prophecy of what was in the report.

But my point is simply this: I suggest to the hon. Minister that Price Waterhouse does not know anything about farm marketing.

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Minister of Highways): It knows something about accounting.

Mr. MacDonald: It may know something about accounting. I am not denying that it knows something about accounting, but Price Waterhouse does not know anything about farm marketing. This is where I get these interesting contrasts in the marketing scheme.

The hon. Minister, as late as last week, praised the record of the Ontario cheese producers marketing board. Let us not argue about little legal differences, but what, in essence, is the difference between the approach of the Ontario cheese producers marketing board—in which a co-op that it set up, handles its surpluses and if it at any time the board is not going to get an adequate price on the market, the co-op will step in and take the product off the market. What is the difference, in essence, between that kind of approach and what the bean board is attempting to do?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: All the difference in the world.

Mr. MacDonald: I suggest to you that "all the difference in the world" is merely on legal technicalities, and the government—in my view, quite wrongly—is willing to hang its hat on these legal technicalities. The result is that you are going to weaken the position of a group of farmers.

Let me state it in general terms, in the philosophic terms that seem to be becoming part of the whole considerations of this House, and this is really my basic point, that farmers have the right to develop their marketing procedures; farmers should have the right to accumulate money collectively by a democratic decision through a check-off so that they have the assets to develop a stable marketing. If stable marketing requires that they have to go into processing or that they have to have a separate company or a co-op to be able to cope with the surpluses, I think that farmers are entitled to do this kind of thing. If the law, at the moment, makes it illegal for them, I say the mistake is in the law, not in what the farmers are doing.

Let us be blunt about the situation, the bean board is under attack today because a well-known Tory in southwestern Ontario, W. G. Thompson—one of the bag men, the fund raisers for the Tory Party in southwestern Ontario, and the biggest dealer in the area—who did not object when the bean board was losing money, is objecting to it now that it is getting in and becoming more and more effective. Just as this government was willing to lend its ear to the packers in the hog-producing battle a few years ago so the government takes a stand today in which it is going to weaken the position of the bean marketing board and the company that the board has set up to strengthen its position in the marketing field.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. MacDonald: It is political influence. Indeed, I am interested in all the varied arguments about getting into the export market. The fact of the matter is that not only does W. G. Thompson dominate the market here domestically, but W. G. Thompson dominates the Canadian export market in Britain. When representatives of the bean marketing board went over to see about the marketing they found that all of the Canadian beans were handled through one or two brokers—the buddies, the business buddies of W. G. Thompson. And what, of course, angered W. G. Thompson—and the anger has been picked up by the whole Tory machine, the farm products marketing board and now Price Waterhouse; they are all converging on the board—is that the board went over and found other brokers who were willing to market some of the beans. In other words, they were willing to break the monopoly position that W. G. Thompson had in the British market.

This is the kind of thing that angers farmers; when they see other farmers who are more politicians than they are farmers willing to work with the government—forgetting what their basic interests and the basic needs of agriculture are. So I come back to my basic proposition that farmers are entitled to build their marketing schemes, to develop their collective bargaining procedures. They should have the right to raise money by a democratic decision, their own money, so that they can build the necessary machinery, including processing, if it is their desire to move into the processing field to cope with a proportion of the product which may become a surplus and wreck the stability of the market.

This government would not think for one moment of stepping in, for example, to the operations of W. G. Thompson and saying: "Look now, we are not going to permit you to use some of your own money to develop a new aspect of your marketing because that is going to give you an unfair competitive advantage!" But this government does not hesitate to step in with a group of farmers and say: "You cannot use your own money to develop your own marketing position so that you will be in a better competitive position." This is what baffles me when I watch Tories in action, and they have to make a choice between the producer and the middlemen or the processors in the field. When the chips are down and the processors crack the whip, this government goes along with them whether it was the packers in the hog deal, or whether it is W. G. Thompson and the dealers in the bean marketing situation at the present time.

Mr. R. K. McNeil (Elgin): Tell us about the hog deal now, how is it working?

An hon. member: What about FAME?

Mr. MacDonald: I will come to FAME in one moment.

Mr. McNeil: Tell us about the hog deal now.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: What you have just said is categorically untrue.

Mr. MacDonald: Pardon?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Categorically untrue.

An hon. member: What is?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: What he just said about one man. Absolute nonsense.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, I will say to the hon. Minister of Highways that if it is categorically untrue, you will have to talk very fast to persuade a lot of the farmers in—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. MacDonald: Now, I have listed three things: Planned economic development and pumping more money into the agricultural sector of the economy; the whole ARDA programme and a really full development of the ARDA programme; and the whole question of marketing, as three of the ways and means by which you can improve the position of agriculture—improve it at the net income level—give the farmer adequate money so that from that point on he is in a better position to look after his own problems.

I want, finally, Mr. Chairman, to deal with two isolated incidents or problems in the same general context. The first one I want to deal with is the question which I raised briefly during the consideration of the estimates of Hydro, namely, a small group of farmers—half-a-dozen farmers up in northern Ontario led by Carl W. Moore in Cochrane.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Oh, why worry about that?

Mr. MacDonald: Why worry about him? I will tell you why I am going to worry about him, because all you Tories have washed your hands of him and now I will explain why.

I have read the pile of correspondence. Sure he has had letters from the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs and letters from the hon. Minister of Agriculture and he has a file of letters from the hon. member for Cochrane North (Mr. Brunelle). He ought to publish a book—"My Correspondence with Queen's Park."

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): If he listens to you he will get no place.

Mr. MacDonald: He has given up trying to get some assistance from the Conservatives, and I do not blame him. The essential point is this, if I may just tidy away one little item in which the hon. Minister and I had a little difference of opinion. When I quoted the hon. Minister as saying, during a meeting up there, to the effect that it required five to six units to be able to run a beef farm in that area, the hon. Minister bounded to his feet like a missile off the launching pad at Cape Kennedy—

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Do not flatter me!

Mr. MacDonald: —and said that simply was not the case! Well, I have written to Mr. Moore and this is what he says:

You mentioned that Mr. Stewart denied ever saying that a farmer needs from five to six units in this area to beef farm. On the 28th day of April, 1965, I spoke to a number of farmers at an agricultural meeting in Cochrane, Ontario, and most persons were not sure whether Mr. Stewart said four to five or five to six, but he did state one or the other. One farmer, a Mr. Clarence Wilson, where Mr. Stewart and Mr. Biggs and associates had dinner, said that Mr. Stewart was stressing at the dinner that the farmer in this area needs four to five hundred acres to beef farm. As far as written documentation I cannot obtain this as it was mentioned in a verbal speech at a banquet held in Mr. Stewart's honour at the Commando Hall in Cochrane in June, 1964—the approximate date, I believe, was the 14th of June.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): What does that prove?

Mr. MacDonald: All it proves is that I think Mr. Moore was correct and it slipped the mind of the hon. Minister of Agriculture.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Do you not think the Minister was correct?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Can I explain what happened?

Mr. MacDonald: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: At the time that you raised the point I think that you said I had advised Mr. Moore by letter or had said this to him directly. Now, I said, I had not done that and I did not. I did make that statement, and I cannot remember where it was because I have said it quite often, that large units were required for a successful farm operation in northern Ontario.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): So who was right?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I do not deny that at all, but I did not say what you said at the time and I think, if you check Hansard which I have not done, you would find that is where I disagree—not in what I said.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. member for Woodbine is correct. In other words, when the hon. Minister got up he was not denying the substance of what I said, he was quibbling over a technicality and implying the substance was wrong. Now he concedes the substance was right.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Who is right there, you or the hon. Minister?

An hon. member: It is pretty obvious.

Mr. MacDonald: I was.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I withdraw my interjection!

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: The Minister is right in what he said, and you know nothing about it.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, the problem here is a simple problem, but it is a problem which is illustrative of many of the difficulties that agriculture faces. Here is a group of farmers who rightly or wrongly got into an area where they have not got hydro.

Mr. McNeil: How many farmers are there?

Mr. MacDonald: I do not know how many there are.

Mr. R. J. Boyer (Muskoka): There is just one.

Mr. MacDonald: Oh, no, there are more than one. You go back and look at your files, there are more than one but at the moment I cannot tell you exactly how many. Just let me make my point.

The farmers got into this area, they have established themselves in beef farming. The rules of Hydro are that you cannot go more than two-thirds of a mile for each farm in lining up the poles to be able to take electricity to the farm. When we debated this with Hydro in the Hydro estimates, I said this figure of two-thirds in various contexts has been changed many times down through the years.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Only once!

Mr. MacDonald: All right, only once. Let us change it once more to meet these particular circumstances.

Now, the answer of Hydro—and this is taking sort of a narrow, businesslike approach as far as Hydro is concerned—Hydro said we cannot within the framework of our law and the regulations do more than that. If there is anything more to be done there should be a development fund. Indeed, the hon. member for Cochrane North two years ago assured Mr. Moore that this was the answer and he was going to push for it. Indeed the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources wrote a letter to Mr. Moore in which he said this:

I fully appreciate your need and desire for hydro service, but under existing regulations this can only be supplied under certain definite conditions which compare favourably with those in any other province in Canada.

Now, let me pause right there: "T ain't true"—in the vernacular, "T ain't true." Because Mr. Moore wrote a letter to the Toronto Daily Star in which he spelled out his problem and unsolicited there came back to the Toronto Daily Star, all the way from Pilot Butte, Saskatchewan, a letter from one Mrs. Alice Ellis, who says:

As a resident of Saskatchewan visiting Toronto I was amazed to read Carl Moore's letter and the cost of getting power to his farm in Cochrane.

Which, incidentally, is going to be $14,000.

I own a farm in Saskatchewan 8½ miles from the nearest hamlet and 35 miles from the closest town.

I have had power on my farm for seven years. At that time the distance between outlets was 1½ miles. We paid $100 down and the balance of $500 in six payments with interest. A neighbour of mine who is 2½ miles from the closest line has had hydro extended to his farm at some extra cost but nothing like $14,000. We are charged the same amount if we are 1½ miles away or if the line goes directly over the farm.

We have very little hydro power until the Saskatchewan dam is finished. Cost per power averages about $10 to $12 a month. This was all planned by the CCF administration under the direction of David Cass Hayes, manager of the Saskatchewan power corporation, who was fired by the Liberals.

Let me go back to the point I was making. The hon. Minister's letter is simply in error.

Mr. Boyer: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the hon. member for York South would mind if I make this comparison between the province of Ontario and the province of Saskatchewan, that naturally construction costs on the prairies are going to be a great deal less than they are in the province of Ontario with the type of terrain that we have here. It does cost a great deal more to build a mile of line in the province of Ontario than it does in Saskatchewan. Furthermore, the type of line that is built, with the greater security of service in this province than I understand is the case in many of the rural areas in Saskatchewan, such matters naturally increase the cost of lines that are built throughout the rural areas, and particularly in the north, in Ontario.

I have not at hand further comparisons with Saskatchewan except to say this, that my understanding is that there will be a payment required of a group of people in a community, in what we here might call a township, and everybody pays in a certain amount of money to get the line built. This is not quite comparable with the system that we have in Ontario.

I think the hon. member might go into this a bit further and satisfy himself that conditions between our province and between the province of Saskatchewan in the matter of rural electrification are very different and Ontario is far ahead of Saskatchewan.

Mr. MacDonald: If the conscience of the hon. member for Muskoka drove him to stand up and give such a weak case that he underlined the validity of what I was saying, I welcome his interjection. There may be differences in costs but let us get down to the point, let us not be sidetracked on this. Why cannot we get the electricity to the farmers?

Mr. Boyer: There are few farmers in Ontario who are not served by our rural electric system.

Mr. MacDonald: All the hon. member has to do, Mr. Chairman, is to change his regulations, the same as he has already changed them to meet the changing conditions. If Hydro is so hidebound that it cannot change them, let us come back to the proposition which the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management put in his letter to Mr. Moore, and which has been suggested in many other quarters—namely, to have a development fund to assist in the development of the north. Indeed, let me give you a voice from the north and this is going to get pretty close to the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs. In the Daily Press, Timmins, of January 12, 1965, an article headed, "Farmers need electricity," says:

The farmers complain they cannot encourage more farmers to settle within an area that would conform to Hydro requirements for electric service because much of the land is tied up by absentee landlords or by The Department of Lands and Forests. The department administers Crown lands and can refuse to sell if it considers the property better suited to other uses.

This is actually in the best interests of the farmer since he does not become burdened with land that may have no value for farming but could be good for other development such as pulpwood production. Since the law permits anyone to buy land if he can negotiate the sale and can afford it, expropriating land from the absentee landlord would not please everyone and it would not guarantee the development of new farms.

What the government should do through its own hydro-electric commission is to subsidize the farmers to the extent that electrical power is brought to their property. This would mean meeting the initial cost of line installation plus whatever extra expense is met in keeping up the service until sufficient settlement ensures a paying proposition.

And later on in the editorial:

More areas of the north are going to have to be electrified to promote development. Coal oil lamps have disappeared in the towns and they should have gone from the farms also.

In other words, if within the framework of Hydro this government does not seem to understand what economic planning is, as it has had difficulty in conceiving of how it can use an agency of the Crown such as the ONR or Hydro as a genuine development agency to take amenities to the people who deserve to have these things, then let it set up a separate development fund, because you see, Mr. Chairman, this is the interesting thing.

I trust Mr. Moore has not been led up the garden path on this, but he has been assured by the hon. member for Cochrane North that this summer, if he will just bide his time and be a quiet boy, the men from ARDA will come in and talk to him and ARDA will move him elsewhere.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Wouldn't that be sensible?

Mr. MacDonald: I am not certain it would be.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: The hon. member does not know anything about it, though.

Mr. MacDonald: Just a minute with "he does not know anything about it." Just do not toss off statements like this.

They will move Mr. Moore to another area at a cost, and I venture the prediction that the cost may be more than to get the hydro in to Mr. Moore and the farmers—who are happy with the farm, which is a good farm except that it does not happen to have electricity.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Wait until the hon. Minister tells us about the farm.

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. Minister is going to get up and say it is a bad farm, is he?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: He is not going to say that at all. There are other considerations. It is not just a question of getting hydro lights to Mr. Moore. There are many other considerations in the north country and I suggest with very great respect that the hon. member knows little about it.

Mr. MacDonald: I suggest with just as great respect that I have visited the north more than any other hon. member of this House, certainly more than—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. MacDonald: Oh, yes, I have, and when this session is over I will be back to the north again. When I visited the north this was precisely the kind of thing that was in an editorial in the Sudbury Star, to the effect that I know something about the problems of the north because I go and see them at first hand. So I am not interested in this rather cheap effort to draw a red herring across the trail.

The fact of the matter, Mr. Chairman, is that we are talking about an area, we are talking about Carl Moore's farm which the ONR track runs through; and there is a railway station on the farm. It is not miles and miles out in the bush. All I am suggesting is a little bit more flexibility, a little bit more willingness to use these agencies of the Crown to assist to develop northern Ontario, would meet the problems of northern Ontario and you would not get them so excited when you suddenly have news stories about bringing all the Italians over and getting them established in northern Ontario, when you were not doing anything for the farmers themselves there. Indeed, Mr. Moore rather caustically said he thought he would emigrate to Italy so that he could come along with the Italian immigrants for the new beef farms in the north, and get all the subsidies you would likely give them to establish a new venture.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Yes, you would say that, you never think of who will pay for all these subsidies.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, if it were not the hon. Minister of Mines, who is impervious to a new idea, I would be most discouraged at this point. I spent the earlier part of my remarks trying to prove to a Tory government that if they were going to fulfill something of the preaching of the deputy Minister for redressing the imbalance of income and outgo for agriculture, there will have to be subsidies. Now he says there are going to be no subsidies. In other words, they are going to do nothing about the farm problem. Perhaps he knows nothing about it, and silence would be more appropriate.

I want to deal, finally, with a very delicate issue: to a degree, it is sub judice, if you will, because it is an issue that is being investigated. I am referring to FAME.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: It is sub judice.

Mr. MacDonald: It is not really sub judice. I say in a fashion it is, but it really is not sub judice.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: How can it be in a fashion something? It either is or it is not.

Mr. MacDonald: It is not before the courts.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: It is before a commission. Who is splitting hairs now?

Mr. Chairman: Order.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I want to say this also at the outset. I proclaim a conflict of interest. I hold two shares in FAME; I am proud to hold two shares in FAME. At least I put my money in a project, along with 13,000 farmers, to try to develop something. I did not, like some people whom I cannot see because I have not got eyes in the back of my head, put it in some fast-buck mining stock down on the stock exchange and lost their shirt on it.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Never mind. They are not here tonight.

Mr. MacDonald: They are not here tonight? Seriously, Mr. Chairman, there are many hon. members in this House who are shareholders in FAME and therefore they all have conflicts of interest. I am not going to be inhibited, because I never had any idea when I bought the shares that I was going to make money on them, I am less certain that I shall at this point than I was originally. But I want to speak on behalf of this project.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: You talk like a regular NDP'er. You invest money in the hope of losing it.

Mr. MacDonald: If you are accusing me of talking like Mr. Wintermeyer, your point is well taken.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I want to be serious about this, because this is an extremely serious matter.

I concede that until the report comes down, this government is not in a position to act. My hope would be that when this report comes down, it will do something to rebuild confidence, not only among the shareholders of FAME, but among the public in general and the farming community in the feasibility of this project, so that you can rescue a group of 13,000 farmers in the province of Ontario who have put some $2.5 million of their money in the project that I think is very worthwhile. I think it should be saved.

As far back as last December, after I had the privilege of attending the York county shareholders' meeting, and reflected carefully on what was happening on this issue—the kind of issue about which one could be tossing press releases once a week, but I did not want to follow up the situation—I made a public statement. I made three points, which I think are still valid, and I reiterate them for the hon. Minister's consideration—indeed, for the whole government's consideration. One is that when farmers are seeking to build this kind of project, and they have shown evidence of good faith to the extent of putting up $2.5 million of their own money, I think they are entitled to assistance from the government by way of extension of credit. I make that statement confidently, because it is a pattern that can be documented elsewhere. If you go, for example, to Nova Scotia, where the farmers sought, through co-operatives, to build hog slaughtering plants, the government of Nova Scotia has matched at least dollar for dollar; I even heard $2 for $1. And they have never lost a single dollar, notwithstanding arguments to the contrary sometimes from government spokesmen.

In other words, here is another Tory government that is willing to go into partnership with the farmers in building their own slaughtering establishments, their own packing plants.

Secondly, in this province a year or so ago, when the tobacco producers had a problem of marketing their product and how they were going to store it, and even were considering processing, this government was willing to advance, and ultimately advanced, $11 million. Indeed, on this I think they lost something.

I think if the hon. Minister were really honest and above board, this is not really a secret of his. I think everybody is entitled to know what the loss is.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Are you suggesting I am not being above board?

Mr. MacDonald: Efforts were made a year ago to find out how much had been lost.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I said I would tell you when the tobacco sales were completed, and you will be told. I resent being told that I am not acting above board.

Mr. MacDonald: Very good. The hon. Minister has made his initial statement, when he had an opportunity to tell us. I think the tobacco has been sold.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: That is not the case, it will be made when the tobacco sales have been completed. I have nothing to hide—

Mr. MacDonald: On the sales of two or three years ago they have not been completed?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Yes, sir. They are sold on conditional basis, and when the tobacco is all sold the report will be tabled. I have nothing whatever to hide, but until we know how much tobacco is in those warehouses and the weight of that tobacco and the grade of it as it comes out of those warehouses, we cannot yet determine how much tobacco is being sold and for what dollars.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, we will look forward to hearing from the hon. Minister. But my point is that the hon. Minister has been willing—this government has been willing—to advance $11 million to this group of farmers when they were faced with a serious problem. I am not objecting to it, but I wonder why the double yardstick? Why, when another group of farmers was seeking assistance, was the government so hesitant?

Thirdly, this government, two or three years ago, under the direction of the dynamic Robert Macaulay, set up the Ontario development agency. We have been informed already this year of quite a number of the companies for whom this government has underwritten credit needs that have actually gone bankrupt, and you have lost money. I would suggest that if anybody takes a look at, for example, the project up in Owen Sound, if you want to get a shaky project, this one was shaky right from the outset. Why is the government willing to assist marginal projects in the industry, when they were not willing to assist even a project that they might consider to be marginal?

In other words, all I am saying at the moment is that the case is pretty solid for the government assisting a group of farmers who have given such evidence of good faith on their part. However, I will add that clearly one of the problems involved in this whole project is that there was some deficiency in managerial know-how, if I may put it as kindly as that.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. MacDonald: It may well be that when the report has come down, some means may have to be sought in conjunction with farm organizations, or conceivably with co-ops in the field, to get an assurance of the degree of managerial know-how and, at the same time, protect the interests of the shareholders, and now the bondholders of FAME. But I hope that the tendency to almost a personality conflict—let us be frank about it—that existed in an earlier stage of FAME, between certain personalities in FAME and this government, that the government will be big enough to let bygones be bygones. Because if the hon. Minister has a genuine concern for agriculture—and I know he has—and if the hon. Minister has a genuine concern for the future of co-operatives in this province—and I know he has—he cannot stand idly by and let one of the biggest projects, involving 13,000 farmers, collapse completely. You will not only destroy and lose the money that has been invested in the project, and destroy the confidence, you are going to undermine the whole approach and the whole attitude towards co-operatives. As my friend, the hon. member for Huron-Bruce said, because co-operatives tend more and more to operate within the confines of the free enterprise system as though they were just another business, big business, with profits being their main incentive, and even though they import and compete with the turkeys produced in Ontario, I think that we have got to a pretty dangerous stage in terms of confidence in co-operatives in this province. There is widespread concern as to whether or not we are losing sight of the original objectives of co-operatives. And I think you would add further to this rather alarming and disturbing situation if you let this go down.

I repeat, before I sit down, that having set up a commission you have to wait for the report, but I hope the government will be able to be big about this, and will be willing to underwrite credit needs. You are not handing them money; you are only underwriting credit needs, as has been done by ODA. Assure yourself, if you must, in co-operation with the directors of FAME, that you get the necessary managerial know-how, but get this project on so that the farmers in this field can gain a greater collective strength in the marketing, power in the marketplace, because this is what they need if they are going to increase their net income.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, this afternoon and this evening we have been treated to many ideas and a review of ideas, policies and programmes on agriculture in the province of Ontario.

There are certain things that I think should be set straight on the record. The hon. member for Huron-Bruce, to my mind, made quite a detailed and lengthy talk on the status of agriculture in the province of Ontario. No one could agree more than I with his philosophy concerning the undesirability of having the continuance of a cheap food philosophy in the province of Ontario at the expense of our farm people. I have said this on the public platform; indeed, my deputy Minister quoted from the speech I have made, the one to which he referred. And I make no apologies for this whatsoever.

But as I said this afternoon, one of the reasons why we have a cheap food philosophy in Canada—and I could enlarge that to include the United States—is because we on this continent have never been short of food; we have never known what it was to have anything but a surplus of food. On the contrary, there are those countries in the world where a shortage of food is a perennial problem and where the governments of those countries feel that it is in the public interest to subsidize, out of the public treasury, food production in order to provide it for their own people. Now this does not for a moment suggest that we have not to face this kind of problem in this country, because I would be the first to say that the farm people of Canada—and certainly this includes Ontario, where one-third of the total agricultural production of all Canada takes place—should not have to bear the burden of this kind of subsidization at their own expense.

But I want to point out one further thing, and this has to do with the remarks made by the hon. member for York South. When we talk about planned economic development, and we acknowledge the fact that farmers are in a cost-price squeeze and we say that we should pump money into the farm price structure, we must take into consideration the fact that as soon as this is done surpluses will inevitably occur.

And I think back to the days in 1939 when I attended a conference on agricultural marketing in Montreal, when one of the leading agricultural economists of Canada of that day said that a thimbleful of surplus was controlling a tubful of product. And that statement is as true today as it was then.

Now, then, this brings me to one other conclusion. I think, following as naturally as day follows night, that if we are to avoid this kind of a problem then we must, as agriculturalists, be prepared to have production controls on all food produced in Canada. But I say to you, Mr. Chairman, are the farmers of Canada ready for that kind of controlled production?

Mr. MacDonald: The burley tobacco farmers did not even grow a crop one year.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I am referring to food production in this country. And I will say to the hon. members of this House, Mr. Chairman, that the farm people of Canada—and in particular Ontario—will not buy food production controls today. I do say this: We must—and I think this applies to us as Canadian citizens of the province of Ontario—recognize our responsibility to nations of the world where food is needed. I think that it is wrong for us to talk about production controls and the enforcement of production controls to create artificial scarcities on our own markets in order to bring up a price structure that will be more remunerative to the producers. I frankly believe that this is unnecessary when we know that there are all kinds of needs for food throughout the world.

Some people may say to me: "Well, this is a cloud nine philosophy." I do not think it is, frankly, because I think we have a responsibility to people other than for our own interests. How we accomplish this, to me, is not the responsibility of provincial governments but of federal governments, with all of us participating in that programme at all levels of our economic society.

This afternoon the hon. member for Huron-Bruce, and again tonight the hon. member for York South, referred to ARDA and compared it with ARDA projects in Quebec. I am not here for one moment, Mr. Chairman, to debate the merits of The Department of Agriculture either in Ontario or in Quebec, because I have a high regard for the agricultural programme in the province of Quebec and for the Minister of Agriculture in that province. What they do in Quebec, as far as agriculture is concerned, is their business and their affair. But I think it is only fair to point out that when our ARDA programmes were being discussed at the federal level—and I have attended every conference where ARDA has been discussed since it was first inaugurated—the province of Ontario has been used as a blueprint for the national policy on ARDA. These things that have been mentioned today about the natural resources of the province of Quebec being dealt with under the ARDA programme have been dealt with in the province of Ontario for 40 years under policies of this government, and of other governments within our province, Mr. Chairman.

I refer to farm drainage, for instance, as a typical illustration of this. I refer to our water conservation programmes. All of these things are being done under ARDA in Quebec today, but they were done under the auspices of this government for years and years and years. The county reforestation projects we have in Ontario today, projects that have been going on for years within this province, are now being duplicated in other provinces—using ARDA funds to do it. But this province paid its own way long before anybody else ever thought of it.

And we talked about projects being carried on in other areas, and reference was made to the research projects that are in operation in the province of Quebec. I admire these research projects; they are necessary. In fact, I was the first one in the province of Ontario to suggest that we should have research on the various projects before they were initiated. There is no use in plunging into the stream and starting to swim unless you know where you are going and whether or not the project is going to meet a need in that community.

But I want to say to the hon. members in this House through you, Mr. Chairman, that the province of Ontario has been continuing, and has carried out, research on these various types of projects for years. The data is now available and all we have to do is to use it and employ it, and this we are doing.

Now then, about local involvement, and I could not help but agree that we should have local involvement of our people. To have a successful project it must involve local people. And what did we do in Ontario? A year ago in co-operation with my friend, the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management, we called a meeting of the wardens and the chairmen of the county council agricultural committees of every county in this province, and brought them to one of the downtown hotels in order that we could have a full-scale meeting on the involvement of local people in ARDA projects. We suggested to them that they set up, in each county and district of this province, an ARDA committee; comprised, or headed up I should say, by the county council agricultural committee chairman—drawing into the service of that ARDA committee the various responsible farm organizations within the county borders in order that we could have complete involvement. And we said: "Make your scope as wide as you will." We suggested they should include the soil and crop improvement association, the conservation authorities, the county forest groups, the women's institutes, the junior farmers, the chambers of commerce—any organization—in order that they could all be brought in to make it a full-scale community project.

The result has been that, in many counties, these committees have been set up and formed. We have now the closest co-ordination between these county groups and our own ARDA directors.

Now I was dismayed this afternoon, in fact I was shocked, that my friend, the hon. member for Huron-Bruce, for whom I have a high regard, was not fully aware of the co-ordination that exists within the department and within this government of Ontario as far as ARDA is concerned. I would like to refer to him, and surely he must have known this, that the ARDA directors of this province—and I want to take the time, Mr. Chairman, to read the names of the ARDA directors as presently comprised. It has as its chairman Mr. H. F. Crown, who is director of our ARDA branch in our Department of Agriculture. The vice-chairman is Mr. Ken Lantz, assistant deputy Minister in charge of services of our Department of Agriculture. It includes Mr. T. R. Hilliard, deputy Minister, The Department of Energy and Resources Management; Mr. A. S. Bray, deputy Minister, The Department of Tourism and Information; Dr. H. L. Patterson, director of our economics branch in The Ontario Department of Agriculture; Mr. Orville Schnick, director of special research and surveys branch, The Department of Economics and Development; Professor N. R. Richards, Dean of Agriculture, the University of Guelph; Mr. A. L. S. Nash, The Department of Municipal Affairs, retained for special research and assistance on the ARDA project; Mr. F. A. MacDougall, deputy Minister of Lands and Forests; and Mr. Hugh E. Brown, deputy Treasurer.

This is the ARDA directorate, their task is the co-ordination of Ontario government activity in ARDA projects within this province. When I went to the ARDA meetings, the national ARDA meetings, and advised the national ARDA people of the co-ordination that we had between our departments in the Ontario government on ARDA projects, they held it up as a model and asked me for a copy of the outline that they could take home to their own provinces and implement. This is what we are doing in Ontario.

I am disturbed to know that my hon. friend referred this afternoon to the Ontario federation of agriculture brief when he referred to the supposed barriers that exist.

Mr. Letherby: He did not know what he was talking about.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: He referred to the OFA brief and the barriers that are supposed to exist between departments, and in fact went so far as to say, quoting from this OFA brief, that there seemed to be barriers between various branches of our own department.

Mr. Gaunt: I was just quoting them.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: He was quoting this brief. Well now, I have the brief right here and I had the brief the day that this group from the federation of agriculture came to the Cabinet council and presented this brief. During the presentation of the brief, the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) will recall that I turned to him and said "Mr. Prime Minister, I would like to ask these people just what they mean by what they have said here, because I think that we must recognize the fact that if we are going to have an effective government it has to be a government that works together and this is what this government does."

Quite frankly, Mr. Chairman, I have a question mark right beside that and I have it underlined. When we came to that, I stopped at that question mark and referred to the hon. Prime Minister and he allowed me to ask them that question. I said, "Can you name me, sir, one instance where there has been a barrier between departments of this government relating to these matters that you have referred to here?" There was not one single instance that could be referred to, not one.

An hon. member: Not one, that is right! I was there.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I asked them again, what do they mean by the barriers that might exist between the branches of our department and they could not give me an illustration.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think it is only fair to put this on the record.

I would like to refer to the last paragraph of the federation of agriculture brief, because I think it should be read into the record of this House today. The conclusion of the federation of agriculture brief:

It might seem to those who are unfamiliar with the tenor of presentations to Cabinet or with relations between the farm organizations and the government, that this brief has offered rather large amounts of complaint and criticism and but little praise. The true situation is that the prevailing climate in which government departments, especially The Department of Agriculture, and the farm organizations work together is cordial and co-operative. In the interest of brevity, we have omitted reference to the highly satisfactory and progressive efforts, say, of The Department of Agriculture in such fields as farm management, extension, marketing, disease control and so forth. The government may be assured that the OFA and farmers generally are warmly appreciative of the several programmes which work towards the improvement of agriculture.

Respectfully submitted.

The Ontario Federation of Agriculture.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Leader of the Opposition): Just like saying, "Yours sincerely."

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Indeed it is. I think they would have been pleased to add that; I am sure they would, because I am convinced of the sincerity of the OFA brief.

The hon. members for Huron-Bruce and York South today referred to farm marketing and to the bean board investigation. I would like to say just a word about that to set the record straight, because I am as much interested in a successful marketing plan in the province of Ontario as anybody else, in fact I think perhaps even more so. It alarms me no little to think that there are people who feel, and it has been said in this House today or inferred in this House, that I would stoop to political pressure to do something that would destroy the power of a commodity marketing board, especially one that means so very much to the farmers of the riding which I have the honour to represent. Nothing could be further from the truth that I have, under political pressure, instituted anything that might be construed as having anything to do with the wrecking of the bean board and the company.

The hon. member for York South referred to the dealers suddenly protesting and the government lending an ear, and there was reference to the fact that Price Waterhouse does not know anything about bean marketing. He said the farmers should have a right to market them, to handle their own products. No one could agree more than we in the Ontario government who support farm marketing legislation and who are pleased to note the support that has been given the farm marketing legislation by the various groups that have voted on plans this year.

But when he talks about Price Waterhouse mouthing the words that I have said, I think it is well for us to look back over the record and see an extract that is taken from the report of the agricultural marketing inquiry committee of Ontario in June of 1961. This report was submitted in June of 1961, after, I believe, what, two years, of study or something like that.

I would like to read part of this report, but first of all, Mr. Chairman, I would like to tell you who is on the committee, because I think this is important. Fred W. P. Jones, dean of the school of business administration, University of Western Ontario, London; Professor Ralph Campbell, head of the farm economics department, Ontario agricultural college, Guelph; Dr. Frank Palmer of Vineland experimental station; Gordon Greer, president of the Ontario federation of agriculture, Ottawa; and Gordon Hill, president of the Ontario farmers' union of Varna.

That was the committee that comprised the agriculture marketing inquiry committee of that year; and this is what they had to say:

The tendency over the period in which marketing boards have operated in Ontario has been for them to extend themselves further into the marketing process. It has been claimed that it is not enough for them to negotiate prices and establish conditions of sale, but they must also have exclusive assembly and selling powers and acquire and operate marketing facilities.

Should all this become an accepted practice, it would become a bitter area of conflict with co-operatives. Furthermore, it would evoke strong resentment from other business members of the marketing chain, whose goodwill is needed for producer welfare. There is the possibility that proceeds from compulsory producer levies might be used by a marketing board to make up losses from uneconomic agency operations.

Most important, it is a principle of democratic government that an organization to which have been delegated special selling powers by the Legislature, cannot be permitted also to enter the market as a buyer in competition with regular buyers who are not so privileged.

That was in June of 1961.

Mr. MacDonald: I just do not agree with that reasoning.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Well, maybe not, maybe not, but why are you saying that I and the Tory government of Ontario are the ones who are opposed to all this? This is the point I am trying to make. The farm products marketing board has said the same thing, and has said this for a good many years.

I would like to quote what has happened in the Ontario bean growers marketing board. I have the history of the whole organization right here. Back as far as 1960 there had been continuing discussions with the bean board regarding the operation of the company. Now, these are the kind of things that have been going on. How ridiculous can anyone get by saying that it is because of political pressure that this government is moving on a situation that has been under discussion for years and is directly associated with a decision of the Supreme Court of Canada, handed down in 1957? This is the thing that we cannot understand. For goodness' sake why should people say the like of things that the hon. member for York South has said here tonight?

I want to report what the Price Waterhouse committee said:

We believe that the foremost objective of the growers board should be to ensure that a market is found for all beans produced at the best possible return to the grower.

Naturally, this must be their price.

We do not believe that the company has been influential in establishing a firm price in the marketplace.

This is what Price Waterhouse has to say. They go on to make recommendations here, and I think this is very important and pertinent to what we have said.

We have concluded that it is completely impractical for the growers board to carry out its broadest useful function in promoting the marketing of beans in Canada and abroad at a reasonable and stable price as long as it owns the company. We have come to this conclusion because of the obviously bitter feeling among dealers toward the growers company, and it is our belief that it is essential to have good relationship between the growers board and licensed dealers if the best and most flexible marketing arrangements are to be worked out.

And they go on to recommend various things that should be done.

Mr. MacDonald: Will the hon. Minister permit a question?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Yes, I will permit a question.

Mr. MacDonald: Is the Supreme Court decision directed to the fact that the farmers cannot, in effect, have a levy—which was deemed to be an indirect tax—and use that to build the marketing scheme? The supreme court did not say that they could not go into the field—merely, that they could not go in by using money that was raised in what they deemed to be an unconstitutional manner. Am I not correct?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: The supreme court decision, as I understand it, said that the levy, the licence fee, could not be used to offset losses of a company that was purchasing the product in competition with the private trade.

Mr. MacDonald: A federal levy?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Yes, a federal levy. But this federal levy is given on the extension of power recommended by the farm products marketing board of Ontario to any commodity group. This is how they all operate on products that are marketed outside of Ontario. The company and the levy fee can be used to construct the warehouse in which the beans can be stored, and marketing facilities, but not to offset losses of the company. This was in the supreme court decision, and this is one of the legal technicalities. There is no question about that.

Reference has been made here tonight as well, to things that I have said concerning the pricing of beans, and the hon. member for Huron-Bruce quoted from a speech that I had made concerning the marketing of white beans at Ilderton. I thought it was, too, because they were the facts of the whole matter as I saw them.

We went to Great Britain last fall and came back from there after having talked to importers of white beans in Britain, completely convinced that there was an enormous opportunity to expand the sale of beans in Britain. The hon. member quoted from me, saying:

There appears to be a ready market for Ontario white beans, of canned baked beans and tomato sauce.

They are very popular in Great Britain—one of the most popular canned vegetables there is. They are being bought and used by 68 per cent of all the housewives, according to a recent survey.

I want to quote the following figures and put them on the record because I think they indicate something that happened that should not have happened in Canada. In 1953 the total value of the baked bean market in the United Kingdom was £12 million sterling; in 1963 it was £26 million sterling, an increase in sales of well over 100 per cent achieved in 11 years. From figures we obtained, we were interested to note that, during this period of expansion in the white bean industry in Great Britain, Canadian exports of white beans have increased in varying amounts: From 10.3 per cent of the United Kingdom white bean imports in 1953 to 17.9 per cent in 1963, an increase of 7.6 per cent; while the proportion of white beans imported from the United States by the same United Kingdom market increased from 13.5 per cent in 1953 to 69.4 per cent in 1962, an increase of 56 per cent. This in spite of the fact that we had an eight per cent tariff on United States beans compared to no tariff on beans from Canada, and in spite of the fact that we enjoyed a 7.5 per cent difference in the Canadian and American dollar—15.5 per cent advantage thrown our way and what were we doing?

I would think that when I talked about this matter of establishing forward pricing of beans, that I was only outlining a programme, a method of sale of farm commodities that is as old as agricultural trading itself—it has been carried on for years. My friend, the hon. member for Huron-Bruce, who was one of the largest exporters of seed in Canada, has been doing this for years and years, until he got into the government service. There is no reason in the world why this could not be done and why it cannot continue to be done if they would only sit down and do it.

My hon. friend referred to our friend, Hammerschlag, from Michigan. Now who is Mr. Hammerschlag? He is a Michigan bean dealer, exporting beans from Michigan to Great Britain—one of the largest exporters of the United States. And what service does he provide for the bean dealers of Ontario? He is their export broker. I ask you, Mr. Chairman, can a man serve two masters? And I leave it at that, and will say no more.

Mr. Gaunt: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. Minister permit a question? As far as I am concerned, I would be happy to concede the point that if we can, in this province, sign a conditional sales contract with the United Kingdom, or any European country, then this is fine. I was simply pointing out that the United States does not do it. If we can do it, fine, by all means, go ahead and do it. I was simply pointing out that they do not do it in the United States.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: My hon. friend, I have a copy of the letter that he read right here in the file, and I have a copy of the letter that was sent by the man who asked for that letter to be sent, right here in this file. So there is the story, and I do not think my hon. friend knew just what was behind that letter, or he probably would not have read it into the records of this House tonight; but this is the other side of the coin.

I would suggest, in reply to what my hon. friend from York South has said about the bean board having sent people over to Great Britain and having found dealers willing to handle beans—dealers who were not getting beans from Ontario—why did not the bean board see they got the beans to sell? This is something I would like to know.

Here we are bombarded by the farm organizations coming to us saying, "Look, why do you not expand the sale of Ontario-produced agricultural food products?" and this government has done everything possible in its power to do just that, and we shall continue to do that. But you have a farm organization, a commodity group, that goes out and says to the farmers from the public platform, "Look boys, do not grow too many beans, now look, do not grow them too much, just keep this production down here, because we do not want too many beans grown." This is what is happening right across this province by the bean board, and then I am faced with the federation of agriculture saying to me: "Let us expand the opportunities for the growth and sale of Ontario farm products."

Mr. R. Gisborn (Wentworth East): How about the cherry crop?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Now just where does this work in? I would like to know.

Mr. MacDonald: It has expanded over the years.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Sure; has it not indeed expanded this year? It expanded this year because the farm people would not listen to the request of the bean board itself not to expand production. That is why it expanded.

Mr. MacDonald: The old problem of trying to separate the leaders from the rank and file.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Here you have this group saying to me, through you, that we have not even been using the dealers that want to handle our beans overseas. Why were we not selling beans to these people overseas when we let the Americans increase their sale to the United Kingdom by 56 per cent, while ours increased seven per cent? These are the questions that remain unanswered. These are the things with which we are concerned.

Mr. J. P. Spence (Kent East): Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. Minister a question with regard to the bean situation?

There are many factors connected with this increased production of beans. The hon. Minister knows, I believe quite well, that if soy beans are up to a certain price and corn is up to a certain price, the farmers are going to grow soy beans and corn instead of beans, because there is not such a great risk.

Another factor, Mr. Minister, is that of setting a price in April. If they set the price too high here in Ontario or in Canada, would not the American beans come in here and saturate our market if we raised it too high in the spring?

I wonder if the hon. Minister could answer those questions?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: The first question my friend has referred to is the natural inclination of a farmer to plant, bearing in mind the price of the commodity after harvest in relation to the risk involved in the growing and the harvesting of the crop. This has no relationship to anything I have said whatever; I have not even referred to that. Farmers, being good businessmen, will grow the crop that they can harvest and market to the best advantage. That will always be the case.

This is why white bean production in the hon. member's part of the country is decreasing; soy bean production is increasing and corn production is increasing. But white bean production is increasing up through the north end of Huron county. It is expanding over into Wellington, into Perth, and will probably go into Dufferin this year. This is a trend of cash crop production.

As far as the pricing of beans influencing the import of beans from the United States is concerned, this, of course, is a possibility. But we do not have to set the price so high that it will attract beans in from the United States. Bear in mind that we have that 7.5 per cent difference on the money, and this has a very great deal to do with controlling importation of beans into this country.

But the point I was making, and it was a very valid point, is one that is completely substantiated by the Price Waterhouse report. It was said tonight that they do not know anything about marketing. Those men have put people on this report who understand the whole implications of marketing farm commodities to prepare this report. And they completely substantiate the theory that we advanced—that they should be priced in the spring. This is why it is so simple, so basic and so reasonable that I do not see how anyone could not buy the theory that whenever the Americans set the price of beans in the early spring, that price is immediately relayed to the importers in Great Britain. Those import brokers go to the various processing companies and they say, "Here is the price, laid down in Britain." They take the American price and add on whatever costs are necessary, and that is the price laid down in Britain. So they get the signed orders and the beans flow in.

It could be next fall's beans; it could be beans that are in storage. That is the price of beans.

Now what happens to us? We set our price after the bean harvest, in some instances, has started. As the import brokers told us in Great Britain last fall, what chance have we got to go out and compete for the market the Americans have already been exploiting all through the summer months? All they ask is an even break of time on this price, and I think this is reasonable. I see no reason why it cannot be done.

Of course, we understand, as my hon. friend from Huron-Bruce, being a reasonable man, suggested today that these are conditional contracts—that when something happens weather-wise you cannot deliver the beans. We recognize these things. But what could happen is that when that product was sold in Great Britain, shipping space could be booked, arrangements could be made to move the product right through and get it onto the boats and away and not have us waiting, as we were last year, for weeks and months, to get shipping space to move beans out of the province of Ontario.

This is the problem that I think we have to face. These are all reasonable, sound, commonsense projects that can be dealt with. I say to you that there is nothing in this whole misunderstanding that cannot be resolved by people sitting down around the same table, all interested in the betterment of this commodity marketing plan for the farmers of Ontario—not just for the few that are growing beans today, but for the countless hundreds of farmers who should, and could be growing beans in this province and marketing them at an advantage. I say that there is no reason why we cannot do this, if we sit down in good faith and attempt it. But we will not do it by running around backbiting against one another, and by doing the things that have created these misunderstandings and have perpetuated them through the years.

That is about all I have to say on the beans. The situation must be resolved, and it will have to be resolved. As the Minister of Agriculture, and as a member for Middlesex North, in whose riding countless hundreds of tons of beans are growing, and in whose very area the bean board company exists and operates, do you think I personally want to see that bean plant closed up? I was interested in what my friend from Huron-Bruce said about turning this plant into a co-operative. I made this proposal to the bean board myself and suggested to them that it should be done. On that bean board is the vice-president of United Farmers Co-operatives of Ontario, and he would not buy the idea. Now, what more reasonable suggestion could one make than to turn that plant into a co-operative? Owned by the farmers who are using it? I suggest that it should be used for much more than just white beans. I would like to see the plant used for the storing of wheat and corn; soy beans, if necessary. Let us make it an efficient, effective instrument of the farmers in that area. This is what I want to see done.

Does this sound like the things that have been said about me, trying to wreck the bean board and the bean company of this province? I rest my case on that.

One more point I want to make, Mr. Chairman, and that has to do with reference that was made to my good friend Carl Moore. I cannot let this go by without saying that I would have greatly appreciated it if Carl Moore had gone to our agricultural representative in Cochrane when he came from Windsor to the north country to start farming.

I well recall the first time I met him. I went into the agricultural representative's office in Cochrane with our deputy Minister and others from our department. When I went in, I met Mr. Raoul Portelance, who was the representative there—one of the outstanding agricultural representatives in the province of Ontario, in my opinion. And he said: "Mr. Stewart, I would like you to meet a farmer of the district, Mr. Carl Moore, who has a hydro problem. He cannot get hydro to his farm." I sat down in the office and chatted with him for, I suppose, half an hour. I said: "Mr. Moore, I would like to go out to your farm." We got into his truck and drove out to his place, two and a half miles off the highway, and saw the farm. The railroad does run through the place. I did not see the station—probably it is there, I do not know. I walked over his farm, I saw the cattle on the farm, I saw the land and the potential. I think I know something about farming, and I said something to the man to this effect: "Tell me, why did you come away back in here to buy this property? Did you go to the agricultural representative and ask his advice about the availability of farms that were in service areas? By service areas I mean where there is hydro, where there is a paved road, where there is school bus service by the gate and the general amenities that can be expected in a rural community?" And he said: "No, I did not." I said: "Well, with great respect I find it strange why you did not do this, because I am sure that our agricultural representative could have found farms for you that were in locations that were much more satisfactory, certainly from my standpoint, than what you have found for yourself."

Now he admitted to me that this might have been a good idea, but he did not do it. You see he went up there and got this land—and I assume paid for it—then he went to the agricultural representative and then he went to Ontario Hydro and he went to the municipal council and he said, "Look, I have this land; now I want these services." I may be wrong, but to my knowledge he is the only farmer living on that two and a half miles of road who wants Hydro. There are other farms there; but I must confess that I could not find any other farmers there. I cannot recall any other farmers living on that road.

Mr. MacDonald: I am sure there are a few others.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: There may be, I cannot recall. I refer back to the Angus Hill report on Glackmeyer township that was published back in 1957, 1958 or 1959, somewhere in there.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: About 1959 or 1960, I believe.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: About 1959 or 1960! In this Glackmeyer report—and I read it, as a matter of fact I have a copy of it in the office right now—it advised no more farm development in the unsettled areas of Glackmeyer township until the presently serviced land which was then vacant was inhabited. I think that was pretty sound common sense and logic.

I think we have to judge these cases on their own merits. This man wants Hydro put in there. Fifty per cent of the Hydro costs are now paid, as I understand it, in northern Ontario; but the costs are so much greater to provide service to this one man that Ontario Hydro feel they cannot go along with this proposal.

I know he is greatly distressed. Frankly I feel sorry for him. I feel sorrier for his family, quite frankly, because here is a young wife with a small family living back there two and a half miles off the main road without Hydro. I ask the question: Should the public Treasury of Ontario subsidize Hydro to that farm when there were farms on a paved road, along which a school bus passed every day, along which there were hydro lines and telephone service and all of the other delivery services that go with rural living today that could have been bought, and perhaps bought as reasonably as that farm was bought?

Now these are the things I think we have to ask ourselves and answer.

The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs suggests—and this is news to me—that the ARDA boys are supposed to go up there and buy Mr. Moore out. Is the hon. member suggesting they should not do this?

Mr. MacDonald: Not necessarily—but it may cost even more to move him elsewhere.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: This amounts to the same thing. I would think that would be a very reasonable thing to do, but my hon. friend seems to oppose that kind of a suggestion.

Mr. MacDonald: No, I do not oppose it; but you would spend more money that way than getting the Hydro in to him.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: This is the one that is under discussion anyway, Mr. Chairman. So much for the Carl Moore case. Believe me, I hold no personal animosity towards Carl Moore. He has my complete and whole-hearted sympathy, but I think we have to be reasonable in the administration of the public Treasury.

Now then, as far as the FAME thing is concerned I just want to point this out to my hon. friend. He referred to the great packing plant in Nova Scotia. I can say to him that if he is holding up the packing plant in Nova Scotia as an example of efficiency to the farmers of Ontario, he just does not know the facts, because that plant has lost money ever since the day it was opened and it is costing the government of Nova Scotia $500,000 a year today to keep it open. This to me is completely ridiculous.

Mr. MacDonald: I rise on a point of order. I do not happen to have the documents here today, but I can get them. I was assured earlier today that the hon. Minister had made the same kind of statement earlier, and it is not true. I repeat, I have not the evidence now, but I have been told by people who should be in a position to know and who have letters from Nova Scotia to vouch for it, that the government of Nova Scotia has not lost a single red cent.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: All I can do is report the Nova Scotia Minister's word, and I take his word.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Will the hon. member resign if he is wrong?

Mr. MacDonald: Will the hon. Minister of Labour jump in the lake if he is wrong?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I have nothing more to say about it than that. I leave it on that ground. But I would like to say to my hon. friend that all that glitters is not gold.

Mr. Chairman, I will be quite prepared to discuss the estimates of my department and to go through them item by item and I hope we will be able to resolve them with dispatch.

Mr. Gisborn: Mr. Chairman, I was going to rise, just before the hon. Minister got up, on the question of marketing the commodities.

I seriously want to get an answer to the question of the cherry crop. I understand last year there was great concern about the sale of the cherry crop in the Niagara peninsula. Apparently the processors were taking 50 per cent less in some cases and in some cases were not taking the crop in at all.

Mr. Chairman: Order! We have had the three introductory speeches and the Minister has replied. We must now deal with the items in order and the item the member is now speaking on can be dealt with under that particular vote.

On vote 101:

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, I would like first to ask the hon. Minister a question dealing with one of the items under No. 4, the agricultural economics research council, $7,500. Much has been said tonight about the need for infusing the farm section of our economy with prosperity. I wonder if he is aware of a project that is being carried on by the ministry of agriculture, or whatever its proper title is in the state of Michigan, which is referred to as "project 80."

This name is based upon the fact that all farmers are aware of the great changes that have taken place in our industry in the past 15 years and they want to know what the best statistical evidence indicates will happen in the next 15 years. In other words they want to know what the state of the industry will be by 1980. Now the hon. Minister himself has said that under his ARDA programme and some others, he has the capability at his disposal to send teams of experts into certain areas to give concrete recommendations where difficulties arise in a certain part of the agricultural industry. I think what we need, and I hope that he would agree with me, is an overall plan on a statistical prediction of what the industry is going to face in the 15 years that lie immediately ahead.

If it is going to continue as it has in the past 15 years, a good many farmers want to know about it so that they can get out of it right now. If it is true that farm size is going to change, as some people with partial knowledge predict, if farm investment is going to go up at the rate that has been necessary in the past, if difficulties associated with the thimbleful of surplus that the hon. Minister refers to are going to continue to plague our market, then surely it is within the competence of the hon. Minister to set up some sort of a commission, or committee—I hesitate to suggest this to him, in those words—that would be able, in co-operation with the farmers and the farmers' organizations, to give a competent prediction of what the industry faces in the 15 years that lie ahead.

Now I would like the hon. Minister to comment on the state of research in his department, with my suggestions specifically in mind.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, I must confess I do not flatter myself with the wisdom of being able to predict 15 years in the future, but I would say that we are very much aware of the necessity of trying to foresee, insofar as it is humanly possible to do through research, the things that may come about in agriculture; not only in Ontario but throughout Canada, because what happens across Canada affects Ontario.

It is for this reason that we in the government of Ontario agreed to co-operate on this agricultural economics research council project, to which we make an annual contribution of $7,500, in order that we could have these far-reaching policies discussed and researched at federal level, and their findings relayed to us in order that we might best determine how we should gauge our activities in The Ontario Department of Agriculture.

Our research institute here in Ontario, to which I referred this afternoon, comprised of successful farmers and successful businessmen, is dealing with a budget of about $6 million or $6.5 million, something like that last year, and is dealing with things that I feel are essential to the every-day up-to-date farm management necessities and requirements of the modern farmer. I do not see how one can do more than that, really. If one is to launch out into something that is liable to happen 20 years from now, or even 15 and suggest carrying research projects on that, I think one is getting so far away from the problems that concern Ontario farmers today that one might be criticized for having gone too far too fast.

Mr. Nixon: I do not think we would ever criticize you for that.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I certainly think that one should, in every way possible, get the answers, and this we are attempting to do. We felt that a co-ordinated approach through the federal programme, on a Canada-wide basis, with all the provinces and the federal government participating in this agricultural economics research council was the way to do just that.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, I am glad to hear the hon. Minister's views on this. I am aware of the good work done by the applied researches that are controlled by his department. They have largely to do with the improvement of production. Unfortunately, our farmers have proved themselves as really more efficient than they may be for their own good. I was impressed and pleased with the hon. Minister's comments about production in general, and the fact that our responsibilities are broader than those we see within the confines of the province. I was a little less than impressed that once the hon. Minister stated this general altruistic purpose of helping to feed the world, he immediately shifted the problem to the federal level.

Primarily, I suppose it does lie there, but I fail to see how he can, in this House, take unto himself the aura that accompanies this sort of a statement without also taking the steps to solve the problems that are before us at the same time. I think it is great that he is able to say our farmers must not limit their production, but surely it is within the responsibility of this hon. Minister to tell the farmers what they do face, if not in the 15 years that lie ahead, in the five years that lie ahead, so that their planning can be made appropriate to this.

I feel that the administration of the department is based on a seat-of-the-pants philosophy—a crisis arises, so appoint a committee. Then, as you have done, and as you have shown in this session, having to do with the milk industry, the hon. Minister has taken the action he saw fit. This has not always been the case, and I feel that there is a patchwork approach to the problem of agriculture that cannot be solved by the committees that have been presently advising the hon. Minister. He has made a statement on this, and I would like to ask the hon. Minister, specifically having to do with these committees, and this may have been asked on some other occasion, to what extent the two major committees that have reported to the hon. Minister in the past two years have been a financial burden on the province. I refer to the tobacco committee and the milk committee. I wonder if we could have a statement on that?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I have them here. Costs of the milk committee were $162,000, over the whole period, and that includes the printing of the report.

Mr. Nixon: And the Stinson committee?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: The Stinson committee, I think, was somewhere in the neighbourhood of $56,000. I do not think this applies in this particular vote.

Mr. Nixon: Was money provided for that committee in, let us say, the dairy branch, or farm products marketing branch?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Market development branch.

Mr. Nixon: Then I would ask my hon. friend, Mr. Chairman, a question concerning the farm labour service. If you will permit me, I would like to make a few remarks associated with farm labour, because it appears that this is the only place in the estimates where the government is attempting to alleviate the situation of the shortage of farm labour in Ontario.

It is interesting to note that we are asked to make available $24,000 for the operation of a farm labour service office, and that two years ago, looking in the last public accounts available to us, $25,000 was allotted, of which $17,000 was left unspent. Now I realize that the responsibilities of this office are somewhat limited. I suppose it involves searching out those in other areas of Canada, and perhaps overseas, and giving some assistance, I suppose, to having these people come to Ontario. But the problem is really taking on acute proportions, and this applies not only to those parts of the agricultural industry that have crops that require a lot of labour and seasonal labour, but even in the milk industry and beef-raising industry, where even the most advanced mechanization does not cut down labour requirements sufficiently so that proper help can be found.

I would say that the hon. Minister's decision, in collaboration with the labour department, taken at this session to extend workmen's compensation to the farm workers was a good decision. It has been criticized by some groups that the hon. Minister of Labour has had an opportunity to speak to—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Yes, I have heard of one or two.

Mr. Nixon: —but in general, it is the sort of thing that is going to upgrade farm labour to the point where people are going to consider this as at least a possibility.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Well, we are glad to hear you say that. This is why it was advanced.

Mr. Nixon: And we certainly supported it, in the House and in committee.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Your earlier remarks in the session did not indicate what you are saying now.

Mr. MacDonald: He was just speaking on behalf of some constituents.

Mr. Nixon: Not so. Certainly we voted in favour of the government's proposal, and we have been presented with objections from many groups, just as I am sure the government has been presented with objections.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: The decision was right.

Mr. Nixon: My point here, Mr. Chairman, is that this is a step in a direction that will upgrade farm labour. I submit to you, Mr. House Leader, since you are taking an interest in this particular aspect of the debate, that there are other steps that should be considered in the immediate future.

I have heard the federal Minister of Agriculture deal with this and some of the hon. members, not present tonight, criticize him for this. He has a very colourful way of describing these situations, and he says that, in general in Canada, and I suppose that this applies in Ontario, there is a tendency to look down on anybody who takes part in agriculture at the labouring level. As Mr. Hays says, "we do not have them in to Sunday dinner." He is making the point that they are still regarded as third- or fourth-class citizens.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Not by this government.

Mr. Nixon: I certainly hope not. I wonder why the policies of this government have allowed the farm labour force to descend to this level? It seems to me that if agriculture is going to progress we have to have people with some training in agriculture, and who have an eagerness to take part in this industry.

I would say that there are many things associated with this, and bad housing is perhaps one of the most important. When we were discussing the housing responsibilities of the hon. Minister of Economics and Development (Mr. Randall) I brought to his attention that the slums of Ontario are found in other areas than Metropolitan Toronto. He has only to travel through some of the less frequented areas of the province in order to find that this is true.

Now here is one problem. Wages are another, but certainly supply and demand, in this case, are bringing the wages of farm labour somewhere near what their efforts are worth. A good many farmers are recognizing the value of the help that is available by, on their own account, providing them with hospitalization, medical insurance, proper housing, workmen's compensation long before it is made compulsory by the government; and other amenities that have made the position attractive. But in general, the proposals that have been put to the government to make available the farm labour that we need have not been acted upon with any despatch, and I would say that this is one of the immediate emergencies that we are going to have to do something about.

Last summer I believe it was, when the hon. Prime Minister and the hon. Minister of Agriculture were touring Europe, there were reports that indicated that they were trying to deal with this in some manner so that immigrants to the country would be able to fill these requirements. I feel that there is something wrong, if we are going to look on this as sort of the lowest possible level of employment, where you have to bring people in from a lesser society who will begin their life in Ontario at the low level to which this work has descended under the enlightened regulations of this government. We should have an overall plan to upgrade farm employment and there should be some definite initiative on the part of the government to assist the farm community in this.

I think that if $24,000 is appropriated again this year there is every expectation, if we are to go by what the government has done in the last few years, that over half of this will be left unspent. Perhaps the government has no plan in this, but I would ask the hon. Minister if he would care to comment on it and tell us what the government intends to do.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, all I can say is that if the hon. member had been here this afternoon he would have heard me say what the government has been doing, and it is a very creditable record, in farm labour procurement.

Mr. Bryden: According to your impartial judgment.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Of course, but I did not hear you object to it. I think we have a very strong and a very favourable record as far as this government is concerned. I would point out to my hon. friend that it was at my insistence that a farm labour conference was called last December 18 in Ottawa. I advanced the idea of a national conference of the Ministers and their deputies at Ottawa. It was accepted and the meeting was called for December 18. This was a direct result of our request. We recognize the importance of farm labour in this province of Ontario.

I think we have a creditable record. Last year, working with our federal-provincial farm labour relations committee headed up by our assistant deputy Minister Gordon Bennett, we had 30,340 placements in agriculture from April 1 to the end of October, 1964. You cannot say that we are doing hardly anything as far as farm labour placements in Ontario are concerned.

Mr. Nixon: I did not say that.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: It certainly was implied.

Mr. Nixon: I certainly did not say that. All I said was that you asked us for $24,000 and there is every reason to expect that you will not spend half of it.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I would like to point out to my hon. friend that the federal government provides a like amount; it is not quite so insignificant as he would have us believe.

Mr. Bryden: Why do you ask for it if you do not intend to spend it?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: We certainly intend to spend it, if it is necessary to spend it. But I am not going to go out and throw money off the rooftops if it is not necessary just to please the hon. member for Brant.

Mr. Nixon: Why would you ask us to appropriate the money if it is not necessary?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: It is not always possible to gauge every vote to the last dollar. If my hon. friend feels we are spending too much on farm labour, then of course, we will have to reduce the vote. Is this what he wants us to do?

We feel that it is important to put it in there and do everything possible to try to help the farm labour situation in this province. And I would say this: If we could get as much co-operation on every angle as we are trying to give in the province of Ontario, I think probably we would be much more successful in the procurement of farm help throughout Canada, and from other areas as well.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, I thank the hon. Minister for providing us with this information. Finally, I would like to ask him a question under item 12, the $8,000 we are asked to appropriate in connection with the historical publications. It appears that it is a general policy now in the Cabinet to have an historical review of what the department has done for some years past. I know that we have had one from the hon. Minister of Highways and I understand that the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests (Mr. Roberts) has undertaken a similar project. I do not believe that any announcement has been made about this, although there may have been one this afternoon, and I wonder if the hon. Minister would explain this for us.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I would be pleased to do this, and very happy to do it as a matter of fact. We think this is an excellent idea. Approaching the anniversary of Confederation, in 1967, we think it is important that there should be an historical record of The Department of Agriculture, since its early beginning up to the present time. We have employed the services of W. K. Riddell, retired agricultural representative of Middlesex county for this job. Along with him will be a committee comprised of Mr. J. A. Carroll, Mr. Frank Perkin and Mr. A. H. Martin, all three of them now retired from The Department of Agriculture. Mr. Moff Cockburn, also retired, will assist Mr. Riddell in the procurement of the historical information and compiling the report. We look forward to this and I think it will be something that we will all treasure and be very proud of.

Mr. Spence: Mr. Chairman, with regard to the farm labour situation, the hon. Minister has given assistance to farmers who will build accommodation for seasonal farm labour. It seems to me that there are some complaints that The Department of Agriculture is going to hold some strings on this accommodation, that the farmer builds with assistance from your department, for ten years. Would the hon. Minister enlighten us as to what strings are attached to the building if the farmer gets assistance from The Department of Agriculture for housing for seasonal farm labour?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, I must confess that there are no formal legal strings attached but we will certainly do everything we possibly can to make sure the buildings that are erected with these grants are used for the purpose for which they were intended. I do not think we can go much further than that.

Mr. Spence: Suppose that they sell the farm, Mr. Chairman, has the department any strings on that farm?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: He is at perfect liberty to sell the farm, but the cabins must be used for farm labour.

Mr. Spence: There is another question I would like to ask the hon. Minister. We hear quite a few complaints from the processors that farmers who grow cash crops such as tomatoes and others, are going to have help and the processor is not. Some of them feel the farmers will be in a bad position, because they cannot take their produce. I wonder if the hon. Minister has heard complaints, no doubt you have, from processors along that line such as I have.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: This is a technical matter. Our federal-provincial agreement only covers the grant being made to bona fide farmers as such. Now, I admit that there may be a problem in the southern areas. However, I think with the public relations contacts, and the public relations that most of the canning companies have, they will be able to do the same as they have done in other years; and that is in some areas provide housing accommodation for help they have brought in and used in their plant or sent out to farms, as the case may be. Some of them, of course, have vertically integrated operations and they employ the same labour wherever it is possible to do this. But our grant only applies to actual farmers.

Mr. Spence: Another matter I would like to bring to the attention of the hon. Minister, I do not know whether it comes under this vote or not, Mr. Chairman, but we have in the province of Ontario a number of mink farmers. Of course, the mink farmers come under The Department of Lands and Forests. I have no bitterness, or any regrets, or anything to indicate that the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests has not been very fair in assisting these mink farmers, but, of course, last year the mink farmers had a great loss with their young. Some of them have come to me to say that they would be far better off under The Department of Agriculture rather than under The Department of Lands and Forests, because they could make use of the junior farmers' loan board, they can make use of other branches of The Department of Agriculture. This is not anything bitter against the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests. I wish he was in the House tonight. But I have had some requests that these fur farmers would like to be taken under The Department of Agriculture, and make use of some of the loans to assist this industry.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Well, there is a co-ordinated programme at the Ontario veterinary college insofar as research on wildlife, and we work with The Department of Lands and Forests on this. I have no comment to make on the administration of this type of farming coming under The Department of Agriculture. I suppose it has merit. I assume it must have been placed under The Department of Lands and Forests since it deals with fur production in the province, and we have nothing to do with that in our department. I would think for administrative purposes it is probably in a good position where it is, but there may be good merit to what my hon. friend has said.

Mr. D. A. Paterson (Essex South): Mr. Chairman, I have one or two comments to make concerning the farm labour problem. First of all, I would like to comment on the farmstead improvement competition, as announced by the hon. Minister this afternoon. I assume that this would fall under the main office.

I might draw to the hon. Minister's attention that Essex county ran a forerunner of this same type of competition some three to four years ago; I am sure that the local agricultural representative can give the hon. Minister a great deal of information in this regard. This, initially, was sponsored by the Essex county tourist association—working through the women's institute of the county and the county council. I think this is a very commendable announcement of the hon. Minister today, for we who are interested in the tourist industry and especially in the gateway to the province of Ontario—the garden gateway to Canada, the Essex county area—like to see our farm buildings and farm lands upgraded and made attractive to our many visitors, and we certainly wish you well in this project. Unfortunately, we were only able to carry on in this project for two years. There was a lack of interest on the part of our farm folk to get into this competition, but we hope that your advertising and work through your officers will be successful.

In regard to the farm labour service, item six, the hon. member for Kent East was referring to the shared ownership by the farm labour committee for the period of ten years. I posed this question to the assistant deputy Minister: That I had had representations made to me that should a farmer wish to put up a large building or greenhouse on an exact location he would want an assurance that he could pay off his indebtedness to this farm committee. I would just like to have the hon. Minister clarify this point. Would this be possible?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I am not sure that I follow what the hon. member said, Mr. Chairman. Are you suggesting that if other uses are required for the land on which the cabin is located, that if the owner of the land paid the government back the amount of the grant originally paid there would be no strings attached?

Mr. Paterson: The grant less certain depreciation for the number of years that it had been in existence.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Well, I would think that could be worked out. It sounds like a perfectly reasonable suggestion. I see no reason why it could not be done.

Mr. Paterson: Fine, that is the assurance that I wished this evening.

The hon. Minister brought up the area of discussion that he was in Europe and I noticed a headline in one of the papers where he was seeking workers from Ireland. I have had a great number of discussions on immigrant farm labour.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Great country.

Mr. Paterson: Great country. Do we have many of those great Irish workers coming into our fair province? Have you been successful at all?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I beg your pardon?

Mr. Paterson: Have you had any success in attracting any of these great Irish people to come into our fair province?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Well, my hon. friend suggests Ireland, and, of course, with my grandmother having been born in Ireland, I have a naturally soft spot in my heart for Ireland. I would say that we have been fortunate in attracting about a dozen families to come from the United Kingdom. Not all from Ireland, but a good many from Scotland. We are very pleased with our success with this project to date.

Mr. Paterson: In many discussions on this farm labour problem there has been a certain amount of pressure, certainly in my area, and in the constituency of the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Welch), for offshore labour to help meet our demands at this season. We realize from statements made by the federal authorities that this will not be given this year, unless the NES prove workers cannot be brought into our areas from other parts of Canada. But I just wonder if all the paper work and other necessary negotiations to allow these workers to come in on a moment's notice—should this situation arise—has been pursued by your farm labour committee; to have this all set up and prepared to swing into action should the disaster hit the market gardening areas.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Essex South well knows that he has the wholehearted support and co-operation of the government of Ontario to bring in all the immigrants that are necessary to do the job that has to be done in harvesting Ontario's crops. I think he has a copy of a letter that I addressed, under date of April 1, to the hon. federal Minister of Agriculture, bearing this out; a letter that was given wide circulation, I understand.

We are disappointed to know that the request was not favourably regarded by the Immigration Department at Ottawa, or whoever had to make the decision at Ottawa, but we have taken the necessary steps to do everything possible to encourage the immigration of necessary farm labour should the national employment service not be able to meet the requirements of the respective areas.

Mr. Paterson: I thank the hon. Minister very much. I would just like to thank the hon. Minister for all his efforts, particularly in Essex county, and the deputy and his assistant in the area for all the work they have done specifically for our area. I do have a file some inches thick, but I could possibly make the major address on farm labour problems.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: We are just waiting on the federal government to do—

Mr. Paterson: I believe the federal government is doing its share, Mr. House Leader but I do wish to compliment the assistant deputy Minister for the co-operation he has extended to my farmers.

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Chairman, item 13 in this vote asks for $360,000 for student bursaries and scholarships. Apparently this is a new item in the department. Is this to assist students in furthering their agricultural education?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Yes. This is to make available bursaries and entrance scholarships to the students attending the Ontario agricultural college, the veterinary college and Macdonald institute because the fee structure of the new university has been raised to come more closely in line with other universities throughout Ontario. Those students who are now there—in the agricultural courses, the veterinary course and Macdonald institute—will pay the difference between what they entered at and what the costs will now be, providing they meet their grade requirements.

Mr. Newman: So this does not actually supply any additional scholarships?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Oh, yes. I want to say that, because we feel that one of the ways to get the best brains in agriculture in the future—as my hon. friend from Brant was talking about a few moments ago—is to try to entice these young people into the field of agriculture. So we are providing bursaries for these young students, scholarships in the amount of $600 a year for a student who achieves in one year 75 per cent in grade 13 subjects.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, is there any provision at all in this for exchange students, or for students from foreign countries—say, the African continent?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: These bursaries and scholarships are available to Ontario students but, like all universities, I fancy the University of Guelph would be extending the opportunity to students from other countries to come in, just as we have done at the agricultural college, the veterinary college and Macdonald institute through the years of their existence.

Mr. Newman: This does not provide any assistance to a student who might want to further his agricultural education by attending a foreign university?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: No.

Mr. Newman: No. Thank you.

Mr. Spence: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the hon. Minister has examined Bill No. 144. An Act to impose a tax on consumers of tobacco? We see that there is one cent per ounce or part thereof of any tobacco purchased by him other than cigarettes and cigars. But on any purchase under this clause the minimum tax payable is one cent, and every fraction of a cent shall be considered as one cent.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Chairman, might I point out to the hon. member that the effect of the tax to which he makes reference has no effect on either the producer or the consumer? It has to do with an exchange of the tax from one area to another to simplify the merchandising of the product. It will not affect either the producer or the consumer.

Mr. Spence: I quite understand that, Mr. Chairman, but it looks to me as if we are paying five per cent on domestic tobacco—tobacco grown here—and on tobacco that is imported we are only paying two per cent. So where is this “Buy Canadian” deal?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I think the hon. member is raising a question which embraces several factors. This, I think, is not the time to go into it.

Mr. Bryden: Why not?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: We are now on the use of tobacco, and if the hon. member is suggesting that we advance or restrict the matter, then the debate would take on some other aspects. The point here is that this does not affect the present status quo; the matter of tariffs and the import of tobacco from the United States or other countries is a matter for the federal government.

Mr. Spence: I thought, Mr. Chairman, that if the hon. Minister had looked the bill over he would see that we have a five per cent tax on domestic tobacco, whereas we have only two per cent on imported tobacco.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, I fancy I received the same kind of a note as did the hon. member, concerning this very matter; this is likely why he raised it. I find it difficult to understand why it has been raised by the hon. member in this particular estimate when it passed second reading of the House and is now in committee of the whole House stage. I would think, with great respect, Mr. Chairman, that the time to debate that issue is when the bill is in committee of the whole House.

Mr. Gaunt: Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a few remarks in connection with the Royal winter fair as it applies to 4-H clubs. Of course, we all know that part of the Royal winter fair and part of the 4-H show is part and parcel of the Royal winter fair as such, and the Queen's Guineas class has become well known across the province over the years. I understand that this year there were a number of complaints in connection with the catering services. I understand—and I think it is the same system under which we are operating now as was the case when I was a 4-H member—that the catering system is paid by the government, and the 4-H members are actually given little tickets which they present at the door. I am working from memory, but I think that a breakfast is worth $1, and dinner and supper are worth something like $2.25. The reason I raise the matter is on the principle of quality of the food. I have had a number of 4-H leaders who have come to me this past year and said that last fall at the Royal winter fair the quality of the food put up by the catering service was not of the highest quality; they optioned out and went downtown rather than eating at the Royal winter fair building. This certainly cost The Department of Agriculture a considerable amount of money—I would not know how much, but it certainly cost them a considerable amount—and I am wondering if the hon. Minister knows about this. If he does, I am wondering if he would consider doing something about changing the catering services, or telling the people that they had better improve the quality of the food that they put up.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, I know my hon. friend, having been a former Queen's Guineas winner, would know what we are talking about, but I suppose when he was in that group he may have objected to the standardization of the menu even at that time, although I do not suppose he did. But I think that the complaint he has raised is one that is probably quite logical, but I do not think it is too valid or of too great importance. There may have been objections raised to the fact that everybody gets the same meal; where you are serving 200 youngsters or more, they all get the same meal. But I have never heard a word of criticism concerning the quality of the food, and I have been out there on numerous occasions. The same catering service is provided for the young people in the 4-H club who are attending as for anyone else. However, I would be very happy to look into this, but I cannot see any reason nor have I heard of any real problem in connection with this.

Mr. Gaunt: Mr. Chairman, may I say to my hon. friend that I have heard complaints over the past number of years about the quality of the food? I have also heard complaints about the standardization of the menus. Some people do not like it, and I suppose it is a personal preference. You cannot please all the people of the province—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Pheasants' tongues under glass?

Mr. Gaunt: May I say, Mr. Chairman, to the House Leader, that the department has not gone in for pheasants under glass, nor have they gone in for anything in the way of a good turkey feed. They have not seen fit to do that. But, in any case—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: You are not thinking of making an election issue out of this, are you?

Mr. Gaunt: No, really I am not. In any case, I would suggest that my hon. friend take a look at it and see if the quality of the food is such that the complaint is justified.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, one year ago I brought up the grant situation with this department. I think it has some merit from the fact that before any of these grants are actually given to the organization, a financial statement be presented to the department to show that there is a need for the grant. If the association has sufficient moneys, I do not see why a grant should be made to the association. The grant should be given to associations where need is shown rather than just given. Does the department require a financial statement from an association before giving a grant?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Yes, Mr. Chairman. We examine, very closely, the structure of these various organizations. They budget very closely. They depend upon this grant, which is provided by this government, and they are in need of these various types of assistance in order to carry on their routine programmes.

Mr. Newman: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. Minister if any of the funds provided under item 13 are made available to the students at the University of Guelph who would be entering, say, in a coming year? There is no thought of maintaining the status quo as far as fees are concerned, is there?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: It is the honour students you are talking about. Commencing September 1, 1965, all students from the province of Ontario who enrol and are accepted at the Ontario agricultural college—wishing to work toward a Bachelor of Science in agriculture degree—will receive $125 for each of the years after the completion of their course, paid toward their next year's tuition. That is the students who will be coming in, not the ones who are now enrolled.

Mr. Nixon: Do they have to maintain 75 per cent—

Hon. Mr. Stewart: No, they just have to pass. We want to be sure that they pass. If a student fails, he just does not get paid.

Mr. Nixon: In this connection, does the milk and so on provided there at the residences mean that there is an advantage to attending that university in the way of cheaper board?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: The milk that is provided there is paid for by the commercial company that is providing the catering, and it is paid at the market price.

Mr. Nixon: I was interested in the bill that passed the Legislature some weeks ago having to do with brucellosis testing, and I believe that one of the clauses in it allows a veterinarian to assign the responsibility for doing some of the routine work of testing to a person who is not a veterinarian. It seems to me that people who have this amount of special skill are hard to come by, and it is true that you cannot expect a qualified veterinarian to do all of the jobs that would come under the jurisdiction of this department. Is there any thought that some sort of a technical course could be provided for young people who might want to take part in what you might call paraveterinarian services, and would there be any discussion between the hon. Minister and his colleague, the hon. Minister of Education (Mr. Davis), in having this form part of, let us say, the new community colleges?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I think that is an excellent suggestion, Mr. Chairman. As a matter of fact, we have a committee working on it right now. We have already had some meetings concerning it and we think that there is a real opportunity here to provide a service, and we intend to do so.

Mr. Nixon: I would say that as well as the assistance to veterinarians, there is every indication that in the dairy branch, or whatever it eventually becomes under the new Act, that a large number of people with semi-professional backgrounds for inspection and quality control are going to be required. I believe that Professor Hennessey, in his report, indicated that there was some shortage of qualified staff in the branch for that very purpose and I would say that a course that would be provided for young people, particularly from agricultural areas, along these lines, would be most useful.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: This is being considered.

Mr. W. E. Johnston (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, while we are on vote 101, I notice a grant of $15,000 to the Ottawa winter fair. I wonder if any consideration might be given to increasing that grant. I am sure you are familiar with the Ottawa winter fair because I know you have been there on one or two occasions, and it seems to me that a delegation has been to see you regarding this very matter of an increased grant.

I also notice that the Royal winter fair gets a grant of $50,000. I do not want to suggest that anything should be taken away from the Royal winter fair, but I want to say that I believe that the Ottawa winter fair serves as an exhibition in a local area to a lesser extent commercial than does the Royal winter fair. I think you will agree with me that the 4-H show at the Ottawa winter fair is second to none, not only in Ontario, but on the continent. This is a recognized show for the juniors and a recognized show for the breeders and I would suggest, Mr. Minister, that you would think very carefully and consider increasing that grant to the Ottawa winter fair.

Mr. Gaunt: Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a few comments about the sheep industry and also about the—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Which vote is this?

Mr. Gaunt: This is 101.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: There is also competition between you and the hon. member for Brant.

Mr. Gaunt: Mr. Chairman, I may say I was not aware of any competition.

Mr. Chairman, my comments on the sheep industry are in connection with the fact that, as I understand it, there are no designated brands for mutton in the retail trade. I am thinking of designated brands as we have in beef—red and blue brand and so on. This makes it rather difficult for the consumer who goes into the store to buy mutton, because she has no way of telling what the quality is unless she is a real connoisseur of mutton herself. I would suggest to the hon. Minister that I do not see anything wrong with establishing brands. Perhaps they could use the same brands—the red and the blue brands, and so on, that are used for beef cattle, because it seems to me that this would be a way to encourage and increase the consumption of mutton. I saw an article in the paper the other day where the per capita consumption of mutton had slipped and slipped rather badly. I put it down to this reason; perhaps it is something else, I do not know, but in any case the people of the province and the people of Canada are not eating as much mutton. I am just wondering if this is not one of the reasons at any rate.

The other thing is that—and I am sure my hon. friend from Prince Edward-Lennox (Mr. Whitney) is interested in this, because he is in the sheep business—I understand that in this country the wool manufacturers are not able to get enough wool. As a matter of fact, some members of the industry have indicated to the breeders of sheep in this country that they could handle 8,000,000 more sheep than we have at the present time in order to supply the demands for wool. I believe, at present, something like 90 per cent of our wool needs are met by importation and it seems to me that a great deal of encouragement could be given to this industry if the hon. Minister would take up the challenge.

The other thing I wanted to talk about is the beef cattle industry, and the fact that for a number of years we have had what I might term two rather distinct types in the beef cattle industry. Let me explain. First of all, the purebred breeder has gone and has stuck with the low-set blocky animal that has a nice appearance in the show ring and looks well when dressed up. He has more or less shied away from the large animal, the animal with a great deal of size and bone and scale, as we call it in the industry. Because of this, because of the two standards, it seems to me that the beef industry has suffered.

I say this because first of all artificial insemination came in a number of years ago and certainly cut the sales, cut the bull sales, of the purebred breeders to the commercial men. That was the one thing. Then the other thing is the fact that we have the double standard. The purebred man breeds and actually carries on with a breed and a type of animal that is smaller, that is actually in terms of the industry a pony in some cases. They are smaller, they are not the large, rugged type; and the commercial man is just not interested in this kind of animal for breeding purposes.

As a result the commercial men have tended to shy away and have gone to cross with a Holstein perhaps, or something with much more size and scale, in order to get: First of all a crossbred hybrid, vigour; and second, to breed into their crossbreds the size and scale needed for them to make money in a commercial operation.

So I say to my hon. friend that I think it would be a good idea if in some way—and perhaps this could be done with the agricultural representative service, I do not know. There are ways, I am sure my hon. friend could work it out. But I feel that the standards of type in the beef breeds should be made well known to all the beef breeders —the breeders of Hereford cattle, the Aberdeen Angus cattle and the Shorthorn cattle.

The standards in the show ring should be exactly the same as the standards commercially, or very closely allied to them, so we get away from this kind of thing where you have a double standard. In the long run, in my opinion, it certainly hurts the industry. I would be interested in the comments of the hon. Minister in that regard.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, I would like to answer the hon. member for Carleton, first in his request for increased grants for the Ottawa winter fair. I would like to say that I would agree with him that the Ottawa winter fair provides a very useful function in the Ottawa valley, and I would certainly endorse the commendation which he has made concerning the 4-H show there. It is a sight to behold, that 4-H show.

In this connection I would like to say that we make, in addition to the regular $15,000 regular grant as itemized here under this vote, an additional $6,000 grant in connection with the 4-H show, so the total grant to the Ottawa winter fair is $21,000 instead of $15,000.

In connection with what the hon. member for Huron-Bruce said in regard to, first of all, the sheep industry and the grading of mutton: Grading standards, of course, are established and provided by the federal Department of Agriculture inspection services. He mentioned the fact that mutton consumption was dropping. I can understand that because there are less sheep in Canada than there have been for a number of years, this automatically follows.

On the other hand, lamb consumption has gone up. The per capita consumption of lamb has increased, and along with this we have the importation of New Zealand lamb. As a farmer myself, a few years ago I must confess I had great reservations about the introduction of New Zealand lamb to Canadian markets, but there appears to have developed an appetite for lamb among Canadian people that has driven the price of domestic lamb to the highest record figure in the history of the lamb business in Canada to my knowledge, pertaining to these last few months.

I would agree that there is an excellent opportunity for large flocks of sheep in Canada, but like all types of farm enterprise, perhaps, sheep in particular must be kept in numbers larger than we have been used to keeping them in the past. The sheep man of the Ontario Legislature, the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox, would agree, I think, that you must have a sizeable flock of sheep to make it a worthwhile venture. As a matter of fact, the federal Minister of Agriculture, the hon. Mr. Hays, on a programme just last Sunday, I believe, mentioned this very point, and he used that as an illustration of the number that must be kept to make it an economic unit. So I would agree that the opportunity does exist. As far as the beef industry is concerned, he makes a very valid point in connection with certain types of beef animals not meeting, I believe he said, the requirements of the commercial cattlemen. This, I think, is something that is a responsibility of the individual breeder concerned.

If he chooses to breed that type of an animal for a specific market, then that is his business, we cannot force him not to do it. But we have introduced, through The Department of Agriculture livestock branch, the performance registry international, which is really an ROP, a record of performance of the gaining hereditary characteristics of beef animals. This has, we think, served a very useful purpose in providing an indicator to a commercial cattleman wanting to buy beef herd sires so that he has some idea of the gainability of that animal and the potential possibilities of his transmitting that characteristic to his offspring. This to me is the answer that has been provided and is being very well accepted by a great many commercial cattlemen.

Mr. Gaunt: Well, Mr. Chairman, I just want to make one comment. I will certainly readily admit that the form of testing of beef bulls has a lot of merit and I am glad to see the department carrying it on. One thing in which I am interested in that connection is the fact that when a performance-tested bull is put up for sale at the Ontario bull sale here in Toronto, the government gives a grant—I think it is 75 per cent up to a maximum of $150, something like that in any case! But the point I am trying to make is that the department gives that grant if the farmer enters the bull in the bull sale; but if a performance-tested bull is taken back to the farm and sold to a farmer, a neighbour or anyone who might purchase the bull, there is no grant given.

What I am saying is, that I think it should apply on what might be called a private treaty deal, as well as a bull that is put through the Ontario bull sale. I would ask my hon. friend to consider this, because I think it is a valid point. There is no reason why, when a man puts his bull through the Ontario bull sale, the buyer gets a premium, a subsidy from the government; and when the farmer goes in, drives in the farmer's yard and buys a performance-tested bull in the farmer's yard, he does not get the subsidy from the Ontario government, even though the two bulls, in terms of performance, were perhaps equal.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the hon. member for that suggestion. It is one to which we will give consideration.

Vote 101 agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree moves that the committee rise and report certain resolutions and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report it has come to certain resolutions and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow morning we will proceed with the committee of the whole House, and thereafter estimates.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 11.40 o'clock, p.m.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Introduction of bills.

Orders of the day.

THE MUNICIPAL ACT

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs) moves second reading of Bill No. 146, An Act to amend The Municipal Act.

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in a general way, the main components of this bill indicate a desire on the part of the department to place greater authority and responsibility in the hands of the local municipal councils. A number of other items are to give greater explanation to certain functions of the local municipal councils with respect to the publication of the auditor's annual report. Then we have developed what we think may be a new method of dealing with the council representation in townships where a number of hamlets, or what I sometimes call police villages, exist. After a hearing by the municipal board, the board may, by its order, divide the townships into wards of varying sizes, bearing in mind the representation that may be required to satisfy the needs of the residents of the area.

Other amendments deal with the question of the qualification of candidates who qualify as tenants of property and who qualify for a position, as councillors, as tenants of property instead of as owners of property.

A new section has been added dealing with the matter of the situation which may exist where there is an equality of votes. After a recount by a county judge, it was never thought that a situation would exist where there would be an equality of votes after a recount, and we are taking care of that situation. It has not occurred in the past; it has occurred in the case of election to a school board.

Then we have provided also for something we think is desirable with respect to the matter of the constitution of boards of control. At the present time, this is permitted only in cities. We have amended the Act to provide that boards of control may be instituted in cities and towns of not less than 45,000 population, and in other municipalities of not less than 100,000.

The question of the destruction of records is also authorized by this amendment. I think it is quite clear in the amending bill. We have also provided for the clarification of the problem of the transfer of pension funds. There are also a number of other sections of this bill dealing with methods of obtaining the assent of electors to county bylaws, corrections to certain references that are in the Act at the present time, the matter of the establishment of landing grounds, and the question of the operation of lands that are dedicated for parks purposes, where the council wishes to operate this feature, a project by a council committee instead of through a parks board.

Hon. members may remember, sir, that we, I think it was last year or the year before, placed an amendment before the House dealing with the establishment of parking lots in certain defined areas. We are now amending this legislation to provide that where the commercial area is extended beyond the original area, a reallocation of the costs of these special charges could be charged to be levied on the extended area.

Another amendment provides for the licensing and regulating of lodging houses, and we have clarified the section to indicate that lodging house means a nursing home as well. We are providing that the licensing of nursing homes and lodging houses generally may be by bylaw, if there is no bylaw of the local municipality.

Another section deals with the keeping of domestic animals within a municipality.

One of the important amendments in this bill deals with the authority of a municipality to acquire either by negotiation, by purchase or by expropriation, industrial sites and thereafter any sale or disposition of the land so acquired. I believe that this is a matter now that can be handled by the local municipal councils without the permission of the Minister of Municipal Affairs, and councils have for quite a number of years been acquiring land for industrial purposes. I do not think that there have been any instances where the municipal taxpayers who have an investment in these projects have not had good results. I would think that, at the present time, it is desirable that this authority should be entirely in the hands of the municipal council and that the council may proceed to acquire and dispose of sites without the permission of the Minister of Municipal Affairs.

A question which has created some problems in the past has been the matter of racing and speeding on privately owned parking lots and in this amendment, we provide the authority for the municipality—with the permission and consent of the owner of the parking lot—to undertake certain controls.

One of the important amendments to the Act is contained in section 28 of the amending bill and it deals with the matter of store closing hours. I might say, Mr. Speaker, that in studying this subject, we have had the benefit of the advice of the large number of persons interested in store closing hours and we also have had representations from merchants' associations and others of similar interests. We believe that this amendment will provide the municipalities with the authority which, unfortunately, in the past has been found to be not quite as strong as it should be.

Another important part of this Act, sir, is contained in section 29 and deals with the matter of special charges required to provide additional sewer or water supply capacities. This section will now authorize municipalities to pass bylaws making special charges with relation to buildings that impose or may impose a heavier than ordinary load on the services of the municipality; and this relates to what are commonly called high-rise buildings or high-rise apartments.

At present, highways in a municipality may be stopped for purposes of the municipality. We wish to broaden this somewhat by providing that the municipality may stop off a highway for a limited period or for various periods of time.

We have deleted from The Municipal Act the sections which relate to the formation of police villages. It is the opinion of the department and myself that police villages, today, are not required. We think that those that are in existence now may continue, unless the township council or the citizens themselves make application under the new section of the Act dealing with the division of the township into wards. However, we believe that, at the present time, with transportation facilities as they exist within the province generally and all of the other features that have become involved in municipal administration, that police villages today are no longer required—that is any new ones.

There are a number of other correcting sections of the Act, sir, but I think these are the main and important sections.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Speaker, this is as comprehensive an amendment of The Municipal Act as we have had in some time. It takes the scatter-gun approach; there is no real theory that comes out of this at all. The hon. Minister has listened over the years to complaints and, every now and then, he plugs the odd gap.

Here is one obvious instance of plugging one—and that is with the licensing of assessors. It sounds great, as it is written in the statute, but how serious is the government about using the machinery that it has now given itself? It was interesting, Mr. Speaker, to note comments that were attributed to the hon. Minister after he gave this Act first reading. If he is going to be as tough as the newspapers indicated he said he was going to be, I think that is good; and it is important. But I think we should hear, as he embarks upon this new procedure, the licensing of assessors, just how he is going to go about it. What is the training programme going to be? What are the conditions for the licence? What is he going to do with those people who are not able to bring themselves up to the standard? How frequently are courses going to be given to all of the assessors over the province, in this and that region, and so on?

Are we in fact, with this step, beginning to move toward a regional type of government and where—I do not suppose we will find it in this Act; we have been pressing each individual Minister—are we going to get the co-ordination of regionality that the government apparently appears to believe in? In isolated little pockets? Now these are things I think we should begin to get. I do not hesitate to compliment this hon. Minister on the fact that he is, for the first time, beginning to pay attention to some of the criticisms that have been addressed to his department and coming before government for many, many years. He is beginning to listen, and for that I give him credit, but it is not enough. There is no plan; there is no method; we do a bit here and a bit there and the municipality will be able to say that you need not have two horses in your backyard—you can have one horse. I think that is in here. That is a great advance in municipal procedure. It might be hard on the horses and the cattle, but it is an important thing.

He says that there will be no new police villages. This is fine, and I think it has been recognized by those people who think they are students of municipal law that the institution of a police village is perhaps outdated. What are you going to do about the ones that are still there? Instead of taking the initiative himself, he says that the local municipalities can deal with that, if they want to. What is he going to do about improvement districts? He does not mention that at all. Not too many years ago, his present deputy sent out a letter to many improvement districts suggesting that it was high time that they stood on their own feet and, by and large, the letter was ignored and the improvement districts are still carrying on.

Substantially, Mr. Speaker, I am very disappointed that we see so much of the responsibility continue to be shuffled off on the municipalities. This government is here to lead. The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs has the substantial responsibility by statute for municipal organization and, instead of leading, he is throwing the ball back to the municipalities.

The store-closing hour section is in here. It is very interesting. It cleans up a lot of loose talk in the law and perhaps now a municipality is going to be able to pass a bylaw that the courts will uphold. But he has not really approached the problem, because he knows, and I know and we all know, that insofar as closing hours are concerned, if a municipality has an enforceable bylaw, the merchants who want to stay open later hours would just move across the municipal border. If he is serious about making available the ability to enforce store-closing hours, then it is obvious that we can no longer stick to municipal boundaries. He avoids this. Hamilton had great difficulty, for instance, in enforcing its bylaws because of the peculiar wording of the statute, which has now been cleaned up. But the merchants who are interested in keeping their establishments open later hours than Hamilton will allow them to do are just going to move across the Hamilton municipal border and set up operations in a township on the outskirts of it. So is the hon. Minister really tackling these problems? I suggest that he is not. It is a delaying action; it is a shuffling off action.

Then he talks about the ability to be given now to municipalities to be able to levy special sewer charges on apartment buildings and I am wondering how, with a completely straight face, he can stand up and say this—because he and I and his legal adviser have argued for half a dozen years in committee that what was in the Act was fine.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: There was a court case—

Mr. Singer: Yes, but we argued that what was there was fine and there was enough power—and now we have changed it. This is fine, too, but Mr. Speaker, there is such a lack of consistency and such a lack of planning that we wonder if The Department of Municipal Affairs is moving in any direction. It is very hard to find the direction it is moving in from reading this Act.

We will support the Act because what is here is better than what is in the statute, but he is only nibbling at the most serious problem that is facing the province of Ontario and, at this moment still, there is no indication that the government is willing to take on the problem of municipal organization of regional government and the general improvement of our administrative procedures in the province of Ontario.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, I have one or two comments with regard to this bill. Like my friend, the hon. member for Downsview, I take the view that this is a bill designed to patch the leaks in the roof rather than to rebuild the structure. It is perhaps too much to expect that at this session the hon. Minister would be in a position to bring in legislation to act upon the recommendations of the select committee that inquired into The Municipal Act and related legislation, or to act upon the studies that his own department has been conducting. I would not criticize him for not moving forward immediately. I hope that he has in mind some sort of action that will attack the problems of municipal government at a more fundamental level in the next session of this House. We can only wait and see about that.

I think the bill itself indicates the inadequacy of our whole municipal organization and underlines once again the need for a new approach to a municipal organization, as has been recommended in the select committees' report. The question of the store hours is an outstanding case in point. Some of us may remember a battle royal that took place in one of the standing committees a few years ago—on the question of the regulation of store hours—when it was proposed, and ultimately enacted, that this would be a matter that would be dealt with in The Municipal Act. It had previously been dealt with in what was then, I think, called The Factory, Shop and Office Building Act. It was a matter of responsibility of The Department of Labour. I argued the point at the time, and I still think that the move to put it under The Municipal Act was a retrograde step. I think experience has demonstrated that.

It is a matter that simply cannot be regulated adequately by municipalities under our present municipal organization. Now, if the hon. Minister is going to proceed with a large-scale reorganization of municipal boundaries, then this matter might very well be left to the municipalities or at any rate, to the senior level municipalities, if the type of plan proposed in the select committee report is undertaken.

But if the hon. Minister is not going to do that in the near future, then I suggest to him that this matter should become a matter of provincial responsibility. True, in the amendments that are now before us in the bill, a gaping loophole in the previous legislation has been plugged to a certain degree—a loophole that made the section totally unenforceable even within the boundaries of a single municipality, as experience in Hamilton demonstrated. That loophole is being plugged, but the main problem is not being faced—that in this day and age a municipality simply does not have a wide enough geographic jurisdiction to be able to handle the regulation of store hours adequately. We can see that every day in the city of Toronto, where the city may have a bylaw regulating hours for stores or service stations and other cognate matters, and the next municipality, which is indistinguishable from the city of Toronto to any person driving along the street, does not have a bylaw and the stores are wide open. Thus, in the Toronto area one more serious burden has been placed upon the small businessman. We hear so much lip service paid to the small businessman, yet our laws perpetually permit situations to exist that drive him to the wall. He is in the situation where he must be open night and day, or else lose business to stores out in the suburbs that are open night and day. This cannot be corrected by the type of legislation we now have, that gives power to regulate the store hours only to local municipalities.

You can see the problem very clearly in the service station industry. At the corner of Bathurst and St. Clair is a service station which is partly in the city of Toronto and partly in the township of York. At 7 p.m., when the city of Toronto bylaw takes effect, they simply close up the pumps that are in the city of Toronto, but keep open the ones that are in the township of York. This has been going on for a long time.

There is another service station a block away which is entirely in the city of Toronto; it must close up at 7 p.m. There is another one a block to the north that is entirely in the township of York; it stays open 24 hours a day. These three service stations, within a quarter of a mile of each other, demonstrate the futility of trying to regulate hours by municipal bylaw.

I know there are people who claim to be great champions of free enterprise—we had a great raft of them at the committee session of a few years ago, to which I referred—who take the position that if a man wants to work himself to death he should be entitled to do so. Well, perhaps he should. But I do not think he should force other people into the position where they have to work themselves to death, too. I think there should be reason in all things, and it is reasonable that people who run small shops, probably without employees, should have some opportunity for rest and recreation. They cannot get that if competitors relatively close at hand are open night and day. What the small merchant, of course, is up against is the discount store, the department store, and so on, which in the suburbs, on the basis of what I would consider exploited labour, stays open for intolerable hours. This forces the little man into the position where either he must work these intolerable hours himself, or else lose business.

The tragedy of it all, Mr. Speaker, is that if they all stay open 24 hours a day, they do not really get any more business, the business is just spread over a larger period. The only way a merchant gets an advantage by staying open longer hours is if the other fellows do not stay open the longer hours. But, of course, as soon as one does it, the others are slowly forced into the same position. All of them find themselves working under what could only be described as inhuman hours, and none of them really get any increase in business—indeed, they probably lose money, because their overhead is greater. They have greater expenses in keeping their places of business open for longer hours.

I would suggest to the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs that if he is not planning in the near future to create municipal units that can regulate this problem rationally, then he should, in agreement with his colleague, remove the whole matter from the area of municipal jurisdiction and make it a provincial matter, so that it can be regulated on a zone basis rather than on the basis of antiquated municipal boundaries.

Mr. W. B. Lewis (Humber): Mr. Speaker, speaking to this bill, I would like to make a few comments after listening to the hon. member for Downsview and the hon. member for Woodbine. I would suggest that this bill, and this government in projecting it, is entirely right. It is high time we started to stop whittling the rights and authority away from the municipalities. I believe it is the right of the municipality and the police village to settle their differences. This government should not wield the big stick over all small municipalities.

Relative to closing hours, I believe the municipalities should have the right in their area to decide when they wish to open and when they wish to close. The small man has the same privilege. The small man's business and success was built up on hours that were convenient to the public to purchase his merchandise. I support this bill.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Speaker, I would ask that this bill be forwarded to the committee on municipal law. It will be heard Tuesday next at 9.30 a.m.

COMMUTER SERVICES

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister) moves second reading of Bill No. 147, An Act to provide for the establishment and operation of commuter services.

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, in rising to make comments on this bill, I would like to commend the government in setting up such commuter services, but at the same time to remind them that there are other areas in the province that would like similar consideration. This government could, at this time, show that consideration, possibly by eliminating the diesel fuel tax, so that the municipal transportation systems would have some advantage and be able to provide better services to the residents of that community. My own local paper editorialized quite strongly concerning the subsidy given to this type of transportation system; by the same token, they recommended that other areas of the province receive similar treatment.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, I would say that this bill is the most constructive and intelligent step that the provincial government has taken in the field of transportation in living memory; I suppose at any time. Apparently the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs disagrees with me, but I still stick by my statement.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I agree with the hon. member.

Mr. Bryden: I am happy to note that the government is slowly, but I hope surely, getting over its predilection for highway and expressway transportation. I am not suggesting that highways and expressways do not have a role to play in the total transportation picture of the province, or of metropolitan and urban areas. I do suggest—as I have many times in the past—that the government was giving an undue emphasis to that particular form of transportation, and was thereby distorting the total transportation situation in a way that is bound to create difficulties in the future.

Its first hesitant and tentative move away from that antiquated position came in the exigencies of the last election campaign, when it agreed to provide a subsidy—an inadequate subsidy, I may say—for the construction of the east-west subway in the Toronto area. It did not adopt a general policy of assistance to rapid transit transportation, as it has had for a long time in regard to highway transportation and expressways, but it did give grudging acceptance to the integral role that rapid transit necessarily has to play in a developed and congested urban area.

This bill is another step in the same direction. It is just a step, but it does provide the basis whereby the government can provide assistance in the establishment of an alternative to highway transportation. I believe, if I understand the bill correctly, that it would make it possible for the government to do this in areas other than the Metropolitan Toronto area. The first experimental step that it is undertaking relates to this area, but I think the bill is broad enough that the government can undertake further steps in this area and also extend the principle to other areas, if it deems it advisable to do so.

I certainly think this is a step to be commended. I would say it is long overdue. The problem of congestion in the Metro Toronto area has been obvious, in fact has been of crisis dimensions, for about ten years. It is rather melancholy to think that it takes a Tory government ten years to deal with a critical problem. However, one can be thankful that even Tories act ultimately, and they are acting in this case.

I would suggest to the government—and it may already have this in mind but I think it may be worthwhile putting the suggestion forward in any case—that it is going to have to undertake quite an extensive educational campaign in conjunction with its experiment relating to the commuter service along the lakeshore area centering on Toronto. People have become accustomed to using their cars to get downtown and I think it is essential, in terms of public need and public welfare, that they be persuaded that this is not in either their own best interest or the best interest of the community at large.

It will not be easy; there is no doubt that it is very handy to be able to jump into your car at your own door and get downtown. I suppose you have to pay about $25 a month for parking, but a parking place that may be within a block or two of your place of business is handy. The only trouble is that if this continues, and it is bound to unless we provide alternative methods of transportation, the downtown area of Toronto will ultimately become nothing but a vast parking lot. The people will not be very close to their places of business because the places of business will be driven out by the parking lots.

I think people have to understand that, they have to recognize a certain public interest in this matter and undertake to leave their cars at home if they are going to go downtown into the Toronto area, particularly at the periods of heavy congestion. However, they will not do that unless a large-scale campaign is undertaken to persuade them to do it, and the basic factor is to provide them with reasonable alternative transportation.

This bill, if it is fully implemented and full advantage is taken of it, will provide that alternative service. There then should be an advertising campaign to persuade the people of the desirability of using the service and of the advantages to themselves in using it.

The service itself, of course, should be made as efficient and attractive as possible so as to attract custom. Above all, I would suggest to the government that it should ensure that there are adequate parking facilities in the immediate vicinity of the stations on the commuter service. This is one of the great problems of the Toronto subway. The parking is very poor in the vicinity of the subway stations. If a man wants to come in from Oakville, shall we say, and if he lives a mile from the commuter station, and knowing what public transportation is in Oakville, he is not going to walk a mile to get the commuter train. He is going to get in his car, ride along the Queen Elizabeth and the Gardiner expressway and clog them up as they are at present clogged up, and then try to put his car into the downtown area of Toronto which is already incapable of accommodating all the cars that want to go there.

So the answer obviously is to provide parking facilities at the Oakville station so that he can drive his car to that station, park it for a reasonable rate, get on the train to downtown and thereby relieve the congestion downtown. I think that fares on the commuter service should be offered on the basis of combined parking and transportation for those who want it. If that type of programme is undertaken, I feel certain that the government's experiment will succeed.

I have no doubt that it will be necessary to subsidize the service, as the government apparently envisages will be necessary. This, however, will be an economy in the long run in terms of public expenditure, because the degree of subsidization necessary to make this service successful will be very much less than the degree of public spending that will be required to build still more expressways and still more parking areas with the ultimate result of destroying the core of the city of Toronto.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I welcome the bill. I consider it a step in the right direction, even though overdue. I hope that now that the government has seen the light on this matter and has abandoned its previous one-sided policy, it will really get wholeheartedly behind this idea and make a special effort to persuade the people to use the service so that it will be successful and will accomplish the purpose which the government and the Legislature in general has in mind.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, this bill has been long awaited by the people who reside in Metropolitan Toronto. I can recall that several years ago the leader of the Liberal Party of that day, Mr. Wintermeyer, laying forth a plan of study that should be embarked upon and suggesting several actions that could and should be taken in regard to providing some sort of commuter service. The government moves slowly in these things, Mr. Speaker. It took a great deal of effort on behalf of the Opposition to shame and embarrass the Toronto members of the Cabinet—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Singer: It is getting to them, Mr. Speaker, you can see that. I can remember the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions (Mr. Grossman) saying that we did not know how difficult it was being just one member of the Cabinet.

Mr. Speaker, as I said, the government moves very slowly. They set up this committee; the committee sat for some three years and then they discovered that there was a man named Donald Gordon around and he had something to do with railways. I suspect that Donald Gordon had a great deal to do with setting up the planning and organizing the method of procedure in it. I think he should receive some very substantial credit for this work that has gone on.

I think, however, Mr. Speaker—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that these remarks of mine bring forth so many comments from my hon. friends over there. They are very sensitive this morning.

Mr. Speaker, close attention should be paid to the remarks of my friend, the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville. We should not have to get to the point where the government legislates only in time of crisis. We had the crisis that brought about the organization of Metropolitan Toronto; we had the transportation crisis that finally brought about the study programme, and then this bill. It seems to me that the only time this government moves is when the administrative system in any field you want to name seems to be on the verge of collapse.

There has not been the same sort of pressure, perhaps, or criticism addressed to the government from the rest of the area of Ontario, insofar as their very serious problems are concerned. There should really be, without the pressure that has to be brought forward, apparently, a series of studies going forward as to how to help all of the other municipalities.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Singer: And I do not think that the government should have to wait—

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): It is being done.

Mr. Singer: I know. Everything is done in the fullness of time—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Right now these studies are being done.

Mr. Singer: I am glad that the hon. Prime Minister has interjected here, because when his colleague, the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs, in the introduction of his estimates, listed 10 to 12 municipalities in which studies were going to be undertaken, he admitted that perhaps only two or three could be done this year because there are not enough people available.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I did not admit anything of the kind.

Mr. Singer: I think if we refer to Hansard, I can get you the exact quotation.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I tell you this, if Hansard states that it is incorrect because that is not my contention at all.

Mr. Singer: Well, Mr. Speaker, the record speaks for itself and my opinion is that the hon. Minister is still faltering.

To my mind, the government should be prepared, and should have been prepared for many years to say to the whole of Ontario that they are interested in problems of transportation, sewers and water, and financing. But it is only when the situation boils up into a crisis, when it becomes emergent, that finally we get some sort of action.

This is a good step. It is a good bill, but it is long overdue and I am glad that the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions finally got his way in the Cabinet meeting and impressed his colleagues that this sort of action was necessary.

Mr. Speaker, the note I want to sound this morning is this: Let the government get off its comfortable chairs and get into action to help all of the municipalities of the province of Ontario, in addition to Metropolitan Toronto.

Mr. T. L. Wells (Scarborough North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to add my words of commendation on this significant step that has been taken in the field of commuter service. I would like to say, coming from an area where commuter service is of the utmost emergency and importance, that the Opposition has missed the point as to how the government arrived at this step. Very often in this Legislature we have heard the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Thompson) stand up and ask that more research be done; that we have research projects in this field and in that field. This was what was done in this field. No one said: "I think we should have a commuter service line," or "perhaps it is needed." A committee was set up. This committee did not just meet and listen to briefs. This committee, living in this 20th century, took the scientific tools of research and found out if there was a need for a commuter service by public opinion testing in the various communities and areas, by working out the numbers and potential numbers of customers and so forth. By this research they figured out where a line should run, how it should be operated, and so forth, and I think that this is a significant thing.

This step is based upon sound research and that makes it an even more significant step.

I think we should pay tribute to Canadian National Railways for their co-operation. After this government had worked out the plan they agreed to co-operate, and I think this will make this a significant project. I am sure that when it becomes operative and we see how well it works, there will be a sound basis to extend it into other areas of Ontario where research proves that this is necessary and feasible.

I would hope—and I pay tribute to the hon. Minister of Highways (Mr. MacNaughton) for his leadership in this matter because I know that he as chairman of the committee gave great leadership—that this committee, as it studies on, will not only consider other areas of Ontario, but also other areas of this metropolitan area, because this line still does not reach up into the Agincourt area where commuters' transportation has been a pressing problem for many years, and one which has prompted the establishment of committees for this purpose. But I still think that this is a milestone in this province and another act of a progressive government.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to argue today about who was responsible or not responsible for the action which has taken place. The hon. Minister of Reform Institutions is, I understand, responsible; that the gaffly of the Cabinet is responsible for this. This was established by the hon. member for Downsview, so we will leave it at that.

I am interested in what the hon. member for Scarborough North has just said, because I think fundamentally, when we are looking at a transportation problem and the development of a transportation system, we are looking at the direction in which we want communities to develop.

Unfortunately, while it is true that this has been based upon research—and research is going forward in other communities—the fact is that that research likely came ten years too late. That is par for the Tory course.

The fact is that we ought to be looking forward right now and saying: "How do we want our communities to develop in this, the Golden Horseshoe area? Where do we want development to take place? Where do we want industry? Where do we want high-rise apartments? Where do we want single family homes? Where do we want green belt and park areas? Where do we want to preserve our river valleys?" When we make up our minds and lay down, as I have said before in this House, a comprehensive land use plan for at least this part of the province, then we know what transportation is going to be needed to see that those plans are carried forward; then we should be planning for transportation over the next ten, 15, 20 years.

I could give you as an illustration this one point. Within this bill there is provision for this corporation to enter into agreement with Metropolitan Toronto and other municipalities or individuals. In the west end of Metropolitan Toronto there is an exploding situation right now. The hump yard of Canadian National Railways was just opened a few days ago. York University is being built there, which will house 20,000 students before too long. An industrial area is developing along Highway 400. Housing units are going up there by the thousands right now. It is a fantastic, exploding residential situation. But there is no provision for rapid transit for all that complex as far as we can see at the moment. Metropolitan Toronto says it has not got the money. The Spadina expressway would be the natural spine for that kind of transportation, but the plans for this development are a long piece away. So it seems rational and reasonable, Mr. Speaker, that this bill should look forward to entering into an agreement with Metropolitan Toronto to speed up the development of rapid transit to serve that area, so that the new York University and the great industrial complex being developed there will develop with the right kind of housing. If we depend upon the kind of transportation that is there now we may find ourselves with single families and a limited number of apartments going up, whereas if we could say now we are going to have rapid transit lines up in this place over these next few years, and put a timetable there, then the municipalities concerned can develop the kind of housing which will make the rapid transit a paying proposition.

If we wait and the pattern is established, then the rapid transit goes in and people become used to driving their motor cars. We spread our housing out in the urban sprawl, without concentrating it around the areas where the rapid transit stations might be, and then are faced with a very rapid deterioration of the present pattern and a redevelopment before that redevelopment should logically take place.

And so I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that we should be thinking in these terms of planning our urban development around the kind of commuter transportation which this bill envisages, so it should not just be from Oakville almost to Oshawa, not quite. The hon. member who is just going to speak will not be able to use it without driving to it, and I suppose after the next election he will not need it anyway.

Mr. A. V. Walker (Oshawa): Do not worry about that.

Mr. Young: But in any case, that should not be envisaged as the complete pattern, and I hope it will not be. And I hope that as this pattern emerges, it will be a pattern not only for the railway commuter system, but a pattern which will tie in the kind of rapid transit that is needed north and south, as well as east and west; and then it will proceed to look into the Hamilton, the London, the Oshawa complexes, and others, so that in the future this can result in a thorough transport system for this province and for the people of Ontario.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, I would first of all like to express my appreciation to the hon. member for Yorkview for his interest in the great city of Oshawa. I have noted during the past few weeks that he seems to be having a great interest in our city, but I can assure him that I am quite capable of looking after that area, either now or in the future.

Mr. Young: I was invited down there to speak.

Mr. Walker: Well, they do, to the hospital at Whitby, I notice.

I am not particularly concerned today, Mr. Speaker, on who is responsible for the introduction of the commuter service, but on behalf of a great many of the people that I represent, I would like to express appreciation to the government for the job that is being done.

Immediately to the east of Metro Toronto, we find very large subdivisions, in West Rouge and Bay Ridges, with hundreds of people coming into the city of Toronto from that area every day. These areas might be referred to as dormitory areas for Metropolitan Toronto. I think a recent survey, which was carried out by the people themselves in the subdivision of Bay Ridges, showed that 97 per cent of all the workers in that tremendous area travelled completely outside the township of Pickering to go to work each day; and, of course, a very great many of them are coming to the city of Toronto. This new station, which will be located at Dunbarton, will be within a mile or two miles, possibly closer in some cases, of these very great subdivision areas.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, we cannot always be satisfied with what goes on, as far as the government is concerned, and I do know that the commuter survey—when it was originally taken—encompassed the area of Oshawa. There has been some feeling since this area commuter service was announced, with the idea that it is stopping at the area of Dunbarton, as to why it was not extended further east to take in the tremendous city of Oshawa, in which there are also a great many people travelling to Toronto—either to work, or on business of various kinds—each day. I would appreciate, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. Minister in his reply to some of the statements that have been made, would give some indication as to what the survey showed as far as the city of Oshawa is concerned, and possibly what the thinking of the government is as to why this commuter service was not extended as far east as the city of Oshawa.

Mr. R. Gisborn (Wentworth East): Mr. Speaker, certainly I think the hon. member for Woodbine put the case for this very important piece of legislation on the record for all hon. members of the House.

It is certainly one of the most important pieces of legislation that has been brought in for a long time. And of course, I am one who thinks that when we are going to take this kind of an experiment, the government is right in taking it carefully. We must remember, as has been stated in the statement by the hon. Prime Minister in introducing this piece of legislation, that it would necessitate a great deal of understanding, because of the injection of public moneys to get the thing started.

When this kind of a programme is in its completed form in this province, a lot of people will not have use of it, because of the type of business they are in and their environment, so we cannot spend a lot of public money in one area without a lot of care.

I think the second point the hon. member for Woodbine made that is highly important is the need for a real educational job in regard to transportation; getting people away from the habit of driving their cars to using public transportation. He also made the point that they will not get out of the habit of using their cars for every little trip, until governments of all levels provide the kind of transportation that will fit in with the ever-progressing need in the days of higher speeds.

I do not think there is any room for political jealousy in regard to this subject. I notice that in Hamilton, the same night this bill was introduced, the papers carried it and there were comments from one or two municipal politicians, particularly the ambitious mayor of Hamilton, His Worship Mayor Coppins. Right away he was going to fight with the government to see that the project was expanded from Burlington to Hamilton. Well, I cannot agree with the mayor. I think the mayor of Hamilton would do better by bettering the transportation system in Hamilton; move it from its horse and buggy days into something that will be conducive with this kind of a programme.

If we were convinced that we should extend the experimental project from Burlington to Hamilton, you could never satisfy the people in Hamilton because of its geographical situation—sitting on the south of the harbour—and the very poor transportation system. I would give, for example, my position. Living in the east end of Hamilton, I am never going to get used to using a commuter service that starts from uptown Hamilton when I can drive to Toronto in a faster time than I can go up to the station and get on the train.

To make this kind of a programme conducive to the city of Hamilton, there would have to be a lot of changes and a new look at the transportation system in Hamilton; to find a central point to connect a rapid transit system from Hamilton to Toronto and then east. So I think it needs a lot of support, a lot of co-operative co-ordination with the municipalities if we are going to make this experiment effective. In the last word, a real educational job. But certainly in Hamilton, if we start from Burlington, I am sure it will be accepted and be of benefit to many of the Hamilton commuters inasmuch as they can cross the Skyway bridge and get their transportation from Burlington. It will not be very much help to the people in the west end of Hamilton unless the transportation system is improved in the city of Hamilton to reach a central point.

Mr. G. Bukator (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take part in this debate and I would like to go back to the day that it came about; when the hon. Prime Minister stood in this House and made the statement to the hon. members here, who apparently this morning are all happy. I have not heard a dissenting vote as yet.

Now to put this into perspective as I see it, I might read just a small portion of the statement of the hon. Prime Minister:

There is, of course, a very distinct possibility that the expenditure of funds in establishing these acceptable rail commuter services where they are possible will result in considerable savings on highways and highway construction, and this in turn can bring about a more extensive use of transportation funds saved here to be used in other parts of the province.

Now, if you are going to build this elaborate and very good system between Toronto, and east and west of us, and save money also, and then take that money and spend it in other parts of the province—how can anyone object?

I can think, Mr. Speaker, of a good place to start this programme of theirs when they save this money, it would be so easy to distribute. Toronto gets, for their Gardiner expressway, I understand, 50 cents on each dollar that they have spent on that particular unit. Other cities in the province of Ontario get only 33⅓ per cent. So the government does not have to do anything more than adjust that figure to the 50 per cent for other cities. This would be treating other parts of the province—

Mr. Bryden: Only Metro Toronto can get that!

Mr. Bukator: Only Metro Toronto? Well, then, they could extend it to other portions of the province also, or wherever it happens to be; but I am thinking naturally of the area from which I come.

I am going to go along with the hon. Minister because he too boasted of this diversion from their way of doing business on highways and going into the railroad business. I think when the time comes that they get to Burlington they can continue that track right down to the city of Niagara Falls and we would be happy to welcome them there. We always do that.

I believe in the first instance, if they are going to save money and are going to treat the rest of the province right, according to what the hon. Prime Minister himself said, that the first thing they should do is give other cities the 50 per cent, the same as Metro Toronto.

Mr. J. F. Edwards (Perth): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest to what has been said with regard to this bill which brings about a commuter system of transportation in the city of Toronto. I welcome it and I congratulate the hon. Minister for the leadership he has given.

I think it is very good that there has been a co-operative feeling set up between the Canadian National and the government. I think possibly the hon. Minister should go a little further and use his influence in having CNR and CPR maintain a reasonable service on some of their branch lines.

This affects all parts of Ontario. There is a tendency to cut off branch lines. Somebody said they are trying to cut off the routes and have the whole system die, which is what happens to a plant.

However, I do think that a little pressure put on by our government might influence the railroads a bit to maintain this service to which I think every part of the country is entitled. After all, the railways were given their charter—the Canadian Pacific brought about Confederation—to give a service to all parts of Canada. I think we are entitled to this service. If the CNR is $60,000,000 in the red, well, pay part of those taxes toward this. We are all entitled to a reasonable service with the branch lines.

Now, this is about transportation. I have a few other thoughts that are not necessarily in connection with this bill but I would like just to bring them up at this time.

In connection with using pressure from our government on the railways to keep an adequate service on each line, I would just like to point out that in some of these branch lines now they run a Sunday night service down and then there is no service until Tuesday morning. Then when there is a holiday in the week there is no train at all on the Sunday, it is on the Monday night. That means there is no train going north from Saturday night until the Tuesday night. Now, if that is giving service, it seems the railways want only the cream.

These branch lines all paid money years ago. Through some of their inadequate operations and improper management they have lost this revenue; now they want to cut these branch line trains off to carry passengers because they say it does not pay.

First they lost the mail; then they lost a big part of the express; and now they are putting down the cost of operation to just carrying the passengers. I maintain that they cannot have just the cream, they have to take a bit of the skim milk, too. It is only reasonable to expect them to.

In connection with transportation, I quite agree with what the hon. member for Niagara Falls said with regard to subsidies on roads and cities and separated municipalities. I think it is perfectly right. In fact I would go further than that. I think in all these municipalities, separated towns and cities, the highways through there, which are provincial highways, should be taken over lock, stock and barrel.

In connection with traffic on our highways: We have seen the large expansion in trucks, which by the way are too large, I would point out to the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Haskett). They are like travelling box cars on our highways. It is my humble opinion that cement, steel and heavy merchandise should be on the rails which were built to carry them, not our highways.

Another thing is the speed of trucks on our highways. How often do we drive on our highways and who is the first man to pass you? A truck doing 70 miles an hour.

Then what about inflammables? We read last year about the accident at Aylmer, we read about one at Chatham not too many months ago; these things happen. Explosives should not be on our highways, they should be carried adequately protected in their proper kind of equipment on our rails.

These are just a few thoughts which occurred to me having to do with transportation, although not particularly with this bill. But I do think they are worthy of some thought by the government.

I also was one who believed that this study should have gone a bit further. I believe the day when it was first introduced I suggested that it should take in Guelph and Stratford; Kitchener would be all right, too. I would hope in the future that this will be taken into account and possibly the study extended that way. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Minister of Highways): Mr. Speaker, I do not have very many comments to make. The debate this morning has spoken rather well for itself, I do believe. I would like to make one observation with respect to the words of wisdom imparted, shall we say, by the hon. member for Woodbine. I thought they were highly commendatory and sensible, even to the extent that I suggest he has probably been reading our mail, because most of the things he proposed are already well underway and fairly thoroughly attended to. But he did provide one nice little theme, Mr. Speaker, that I would like to repeat. He said "slowly and surely," and in this I could not agree more.

Mr. Bryden: I said I hope surely.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: It may appear to be slowly, but I will guarantee to you, Mr. Speaker, and guarantee to the House, that it will be surely.

Mr. Bryden: Not too slowly!

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I think that characterizes the difference between the way the government of the day and the government of the last 20 years does things, rather than some of the suggestions and proposals that are passed to us from time to time. We do propose to do things surely and this involves a little time. That is the way it is going to be done. No 60 days of decision here, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Bryden: No decision, that is the trouble.

Mr. Singer: The hon. Minister cannot make up his mind.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Well, now, Mr. Speaker, to proceed a little further, I think I will just resort to a comment that has been made by the hon. Prime Minister from time to time. I am going to repeat it again. For heaven's sake look around. Take a look at our own province. Just look around, that is all.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): That comment got the approval of the hon. Prime Minister.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Well, it is a good comment anyway. It is a good comment whoever made it. I think it was the hon. Prime Minister and he makes nothing but sensible comments.

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. Minister is beginning to believe in his own comments now.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Well, all right. Now for the information of the hon. member for Oshawa, I simply repeat what has been said a number of times. The study area undertaken by the region transportation study was defined as bounded by Oshawa, Hamilton and Barrie for study purposes.

The reason that the proposed experimental commuter service facilities are not going into Oshawa are simply technical. There is not the trackage or the track capacity east of Dunbarton to undertake an efficient operation. I would say next, through you, Mr. Speaker, to the hon. member, that the same applies in Hamilton, as has been suggested by the hon. member for Wentworth East. It would require there the construction of some 20 miles of new track facilities to extend a similar service into Hamilton. Most people are aware of the geography of Hamilton. Trains now have to back in or out, and it simply does not lend itself to this type of operation, nor is it necessary for the purpose of the experiment that is to be undertaken. The experiment can be undertaken satisfactorily and well in the 52 miles in the corridor that has been defined to the House, for all practical purposes. Of course, the matter of education that was referred to by the hon. member for Woodbine is important; there is no question about this. We propose to have a programme of education. I do not know how to describe it. We certainly propose to inform the public as to the extent we will develop the greater use and the greater patronage of this experimental service. But the educational feature goes further than that. Of course, from the experimental undertaking, we also will learn very much. It is from a combination of this, then, that I think we will, at the conclusion of the experimental period, know what requires to be done in terms of final implementation of a service that will meet the needs of the people.

We think this is sensible in character, and it is the way we propose to proceed. To conclude my brief observations, I think it would be of interest to you, Mr. Speaker, and certainly of interest to the hon. members of the House, to tell them that the commuter service alone is only one phase. The study is continuing. The work of the Metropolitan Toronto region transportation study is continuing in a very broad and thoroughgoing manner and it is the further nature of study that will provide some of the answers to questions raised by the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville, and others, who sensibly look at the whole broad problem of transportation, not only in this region, but in the province. It is from the continuing nature of the study that I am convinced that some of the answers will come forward and be considered, developed and acted upon in the same solid, sensible manner in which this particular effort has been pursued, and which, I am happy to say, has been so widely accepted and even acclaimed.

For the information of yourself, Mr. Speaker, and the House, I would tell you that the study itself proposes, in late summer or early autumn, to undertake a series of meetings—hearings, I guess, would be a better word—throughout the entire study area. Letters will be going out this weekend from myself to all representatives in the study area—heads of municipalities, heads of planning boards. In other words, the broad cross-section of people who are bound to have a sensible interest in transportation. The meetings will be advertised and notices will be printed in the area media, at which time we hope to receive briefs from these people and take their advice and direction as part of our overall study process.

Mr. Bryden: When will there be another report?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: There should be another one early in 1966. I think that is what I said to the House not too many weeks ago; if I remember correctly, we anticipate another report on a continuing phase or phases of the study in 1966. Presently, I tell the House, we are shooting at a target date of January 1, 1967, for completion. That may be difficult or impossible of attainment, but we have set this target date, Mr. Speaker. So we are trying to move this thing along, trying to develop it and indicate to the people of the province—not only the Toronto area—what this matter of transportation involves.

THE UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO ACT

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education) moves second reading of Bill No. 148, An Act to amend The University of Toronto Act.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE YORK UNIVERSITY ACT, 1965

Hon. Mr. Davis moves second reading of Bill No. 149, The York University Act, 1965.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

LAKEHEAD UNIVERSITY

Hon. Mr. Davis moves second reading of Bill No. 150, An Act respecting Lakehead University.

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): Mr. Speaker, before passing this bill, I would like to make a few remarks.

Mr. Singer: You are opposed to it, are you?

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: I am a little embarrassed this morning to again congratulate this government with a worthy tribute on establishing this great institution of learning as a university, known in the future as the Lakehead University—

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary): That kind of embarrassment is easy to take.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: —in addition to all the praises that have been heaped on it this morning by the Opposition.

This Act, respecting the Lakehead University, is the culmination of a great many years of work and help from this government, because first it was the Lakehead college of arts, science and technology. Now it is Lakehead University, located on a beautiful 300-acre campus, between the cities of Fort William and Port Arthur. It is housed, Mr. Speaker, in over $3 million worth of modern buildings overlooking Lake Superior. A library, which was estimated to cost $1,400,000, is currently under construction, scheduled for completion before the end of the year. I had the opportunity of being present the day before yesterday—May 26th—when the plaque was unveiled by the Governor-General of Canada, His Excellency the Rt. Hon. George P. Vanier and a large crowd attended that ceremony. It certainly has added to the prestige of the Lakehead.

Extended facilities in science and technology are next on the expansion programme. Senator N. M. Patterson, LL.D., KG, prominent Fort William businessman and philanthropist, was installed as the first chancellor at the convocation on May 6. He granted degrees—that is, BA's and BSc's—to some 50 graduates in the university division, and some 40 diplomas to graduates in the technology division.

Dr. Claude Bissell, president of the University of Toronto, brought greetings on behalf of the Ontario university and addressed the graduates. At the same time, Mr. W. G. Tamblyn, chairman of the board of governors, was installed as the first president. Mr. Tamblyn has been an extremely active member of the board, and has played a leading role in the development of the university. He brings with him broad experience in business, industry and community affairs.

The early history of this institute of learning, Mr. Speaker, is very important. Lakehead college was first established as the Lakehead technical institute in 1948, under the principalship of Dr. M. W. Barclay. It was housed in an old army hut, brought from British Columbia on a flat car and re-assembled on a vacant lot in downtown Port Arthur. The roof consisted of two long V's joined at the bottom. Each spring, ice stands formed and the roof leaked in dozens of places. The problem was solved by drilling holes in the floor and letting the water run down into the basement. During the winter time, the thermostat consisted of a pipe wrench used to control the radiator inlet valves; it was stored in the principal's office.

In 1952, Dr. Harold S. Brann, CD, BA, LL.B. was appointed principal when Dr. Barclay retired to private practice as a consulting geologist. He still holds that office today. Under his leadership, the Lakehead technical institute, as it was then known, had less than 100 full-time students. It has developed into a degree-granting institution serving over 1,000 students.

In the 1950s a committee was formed to raise funds toward the establishment of a college in permanent quarters. After some initial difficulties arising out of inter-city rivalry, to avoid prejudice the first meeting was held in a field on the boundary between Fort William and Port Arthur. The present site was then selected and the city of Port Arthur donated 80 acres of land and the committee raised $175,000 as the nucleus for the first building fund.

The first building was formally opened by the Hon. W. J. Dunlop, Minister of Education in 1957. Classes were already under way. Grants from the province of Ontario, the Canada Council, the municipalities of Fort William and Port Arthur, as well as generous contributions by local corporations and individuals, provided funds for additional construction. A temporary library was added in 1960, additional lecture rooms and laboratories in 1961 and a men's residence in 1962.

A second building fund campaign was launched in 1963 and over $800,000 was raised. A university centre building was completed in 1963 and additional land for future expansion was purchased.

The temporary library is now filled to overflowing with 40,000 volumes, and the new library, costing $1,400,000, will be completed before the end of the year. That was the one that the Governor General unveiled the plaque on last Wednesday.

In the next five years over $5 million of additional building will be required to provide the facilities for necessary expansion.

The Lakehead University serves a vast area of northwestern Ontario with a population of nearly 300,000 people. The nearest Canadian universities are the University of Manitoba, 400 miles west, and Laurentian University, 600 miles east.

It is unique, Mr. Speaker, in that it combines a university programme and a technology programme which is similar to Ryerson. The classes are separate, but students use the same library, laboratory, lecture room, residence and cafeteria facilities.

Some faculty members lecture only in the university division or the technology division, while others have responsibilities in both. This efficient use of faculty and facilities has made it possible to provide a much broader and more intensive programme than would otherwise have been possible. The technology programme will continue to play an important role in Lakehead University.

Up until 1960 the college offered only the first year, post-grade 13 courses, in the university division. Students received credit for this year when they went on to complete their degree at various Canadian universities. Hundreds of students took advantage of this opportunity and they gave a good account of themselves wherever they went.

This liaison with other universities played a very important role in helping to establish the high standards that have been maintained.

Second year arts courses were added in 1960 and 1961 and additional expansion has taken place in succeeding years, culminating in the granting of its first degrees in 1965.

Lakehead University, sir, has a large extension programme. Over 500 students—the majority are elementary school teachers—are currently taking university credit courses for a BA degree. Members of the regular faculty travel each week to Kenora, Dryden and Atikokan to the west, and to Nipigon and Geraldton to the east, a radius of 500 miles, to give lectures and to conduct seminars.

Lakehead residents take courses from 4.30 to 6 p.m. in the evenings. Over 100 student nurses from the three Lakehead hospitals take special courses at the college. Further expansion is being planned in this field.

Our summer school has been in operation for several years. Over 300 registrations are anticipated in the coming session.

The forestry technology programme attracts the largest number of students in the technology division. Over 60 students are currently registered in this two-year diploma course and it is encouraging to note, Mr. Speaker, that all of them have already obtained employment for the coming summer, a good indication of how well the course is received by industry and the government services. Students come from all over Ontario and from other provinces as well.

Diploma courses in engineering and technology and in business administration are also well-established and expanding rapidly.

For the future the Lakehead University has 1,100 students in the current session; 465 full time and the remainder part time. Enrollment has doubled since 1962 and is expected to double again in the next two years. It should reach 1,500 students by 1970 and 2,500 by 1975. Almost all of the university division students are in the three-year general courses.

A limited number of honours courses are available and immediate expansion is anticipated in this field. The addition of master's degrees in some fields should follow.

The forest technology programme has been established on a sound basis and the addition of a degree programme in forestry should follow soon. Other developments include a degree in nursing science and in commerce, as well as further expansion in applied science.

Lakehead University has already established a reputation for sound scholarship and no effort has been spared to attract faculty of the highest calibre. It is now ready, Mr. Speaker, to expand rapidly to take its place among the universities of this province. It has been built with the confidence and support of this government, industries and individuals to serve primarily the young people in the vast area of northwestern Ontario. This confidence will be repaid a hundredfold in the years ahead through the contributions that the Lakehead University graduates will make, not only to this area but to all of Canada.

I want, on behalf of the people of the Lakehead area and northwestern Ontario, to thank the hon. Minister and thank this government and this House for this very important installation of a university in our area. I am sure that they will receive during the years the great gratitude of all our people in that area. I see the hon. leader of the NDP Party (Mr. MacDonald) smiling. I am sure that his colleague, the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Freeman) would join me fully in these remarks that you have allowed me to give this morning.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald: I just want to inform the hon. Minister of Mines for the one thousand and first time that it is not the NDP party, the "P" is redundant.

Mr. Singer: The whole party is redundant.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, there are just two comments that I would like to make. One, that I welcome this bill; not that it really alters the situation greatly at the Lakehead, I think it is really a change in name more than anything else. It did give the hon. Minister of Mines an opportunity to ooze his confidence in the fashion that he is so capable of.

I rise, however, because I have in the past in this House expressed, because it was my conviction, that this was the one institution of higher learning with which I was a little concerned as to the slow start that it had made—that it did not seem to be getting the necessary degree of support. It perhaps lacked the kind of base and ancillary factors in the community that, for example, Carleton did when it started in a building—not quite as primitive as the one that the hon. Minister of Mines described this morning. I do not think they punched holes in the floor to let the rain run through when it had come through the roof—but it was a pretty old building that was bulging at the seams for a while.

But Ottawa had, if I may make my point this way, other factors in terms of people on whom they could draw, senior civil servants and others, to help to build an institution of higher learning.

I do not say this at all disparagingly, I think it has been more difficult to build an institution out in the hinterland of the province. I rise particularly to say that I think that there is growing evidence that, if there was a slow start—and perhaps I was wrong—but if there was a slow start, it is now moving and that it is establishing itself as a genuine institution with the kind of standards that we would like to have in an institution of higher learning in this province.

My second point is rather a brief and somewhat irrelevant one, but I think the hon. Minister in introducing the bill said that he wanted to get this bill through so that the first graduates could be graduated as graduates of Lakehead University. This is one little technicality: I think they graduated a month ago, as the graduates of Lakehead University. They sort of beat the gun.

Hon. Mr. Wardrobe: Always ahead.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, I would not put it that way. Technically this had been done in an illegal fashion because this Lakehead University has not as yet been authorized in the House. It raises the question of why the bill could not have been in some months ago and all been done according to Hoyle.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, at the committee stage we can make a small amendment to legitimize the position of the graduates.

Mr. MacDonald: As a matter of fact, if there is any point going to be made of it, let us do so.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE AGRICULTURAL RESEARCH INSTITUTE OF ONTARIO ACT, 1961-1962

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture) moves second reading of Bill No. 151, An Act to amend The Agricultural Research Institute of Ontario Act, 1961-1962.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE PENSION BENEFITS ACT, 1965

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves second reading of Bill No. 157, The Pension Benefits Act, 1965.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, I do not think it necessary to deal at length with the second reading of this bill. It is essentially a rehash, with minor improvements, of a bill that was debated at considerable length in this House a year or two ago, and that bill in turn was a rehash of part of an earlier bill which was also the subject of considerable debate.

I believe, however, that some comments are in order. The government has stated in its introductory note that the bill is a revision of The Pension Benefits Act in the light of experience gained in the operation of that Act since August, 1963; furthermore, that there is now a provision contained in the Act to, shall we say, enter into reciprocal arrangements with other provinces so that legislation of this type may become applicable on a more or less uniform basis all across the country.

I am in favour of the principle of uniformity in this field. There is no question that if we are talking about portable pensions—and that is what we are talking about here—it is desirable that they should be portable across the country. I am certainly in favour of the principle of public regulation of private pension plans, both to ensure portability and also to ensure solvency. Such regulation has been lacking in the past, very much to the detriment of some people who thought they were covered by pension plans and would get some benefit out of them.

Even though we are now moving forward, as I believe is right, to a great extension of public activity in the pension field, the fact remains that there will continue to be private plans which will undertake to supplement the pension benefits available in public plans; and it is desirable that the benefits in those private plans should be portable. The problem, however, Mr. Speaker, is that this bill does not really establish any significant degree of portability. In this respect, of course, it follows the pattern of its predecessors, which also failed to establish any significant degree of portability. Even though it is desirable to have uniformity of legislation in this field, if possible all across the country, I do not think uniformity that accomplishes very little has much to be said for it.

If we can get uniformity across the country only on the basis of the lowest common denominator, which this bill represents, then I would say: let us forget about uniformity and go ahead to achieve real portability at least in Ontario. Essentially what the bill provides is what the previous legislation provided and we have had two different Acts on this subject in the past half dozen years; that pensions under private plans will be portable where an employee has worked for the same employer for 10 years and has reached the age of 45. Now, I realize that this bill makes one minor change in those two conditions. It provides that the 10 years will apply either to his period of service with the employer or to a period under the same plan. The purpose of this, as I understand, is to ensure that the benefits will be portable if an employee works for the same company in different provinces. In other words, if he works for a couple of years for a certain company in this province then goes to another province for a few years—where he is still covered by their pension plan—and then comes back to Ontario, there will be no question that his 10 years under that plan will qualify him for such benefits as the Act provides.

But how much portability does this involve, Mr. Speaker? Many employees will go through most of their working lives and will really have very little in the way of the pension benefits vested in them under various plans under which they may serve. Take a man who starts employment at the age of 21—and that is not an unusual age for starting employment. He could work 15 years for a certain company under a certain pension plan, but if he left, it would then mean he would get no benefits as far as this legislation is concerned. He would get benefits only if the plan in itself provided for them; because even though he had worked more than ten years with the company, he would still not have reached the age of 45. And then suppose he went to another company and worked nearly nine years—leaving at the age of 44. He would still get no benefits. He would have put in 23 years of employment and the legislation would have done him no good at all.

Then he may start at age 45 with another company and, perhaps at this point—since when one reaches that advanced age one's opportunities for employment decline, he may stick with the employer, if he can, for the rest of his working life. Of course he may also be laid off, because employers have great tendencies to get rid of some of their older workers. Sometimes, of course, they reorganize; they change their places of employment; and so on. He may or may not get in the ten years required that would qualify him for some benefit under this Act.

But even if he does, the pension contributions made on his behalf over his working life would be vested only to a very limited degree. He might get the benefit of 10 or 15 years of pension contributions over the whole 45 years of his working life.

I am suggesting to the government, as I have suggested before, that contributions made into a pension plan by an employer on behalf of an employee, are in fact a form of deferred wages. They should be vested in the employee in full from the day they are first made. I do not agree that an employer should be allowed, after making contributions for many years in the name of an employee, to deprive him of the benefit of these contributions when he leaves. That is possible under this Act. In fact, I suggest to the hon. Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, that it will be the normal situation, unless we want to really freeze people to their jobs. Surely that is the last thing in the world we want to do. The whole purpose of providing for portability of pensions is to prevent employees being frozen to their jobs by pension plans. In this day and age it is most undesirable in the economic interests of the country to restrict mobility of labour in this way. I noticed on the financial page of the paper this morning a speech by Dr. Deutsch once again emphasizing the importance of encouraging mobility of labour, and pointing out the failure of public policy in this direction in Canada until now.

The Act that we now have before us is supposed to introduce a small degree of mobility, but it is so slight as to be pretty close to useless, Mr. Speaker. This bill, and the legislation that preceded it, is a nice piece of window dressing; it makes it possible for the government, at election time and at other times, to make fine speeches to the effect that we in Ontario have pioneered in the field of portability of pensions and we now have legislation that makes pensions portable. Well, it does not do any such thing. It will provide for a limited degree of portability for a limited number of employees—for those who continue to work for the same employers for long periods of time.

I do not wish to suggest that such employees should not be fully protected, but I am suggesting, Mr. Speaker, that it is most important, both as a matter of justice to the employed people concerned and in the economic interests of the country, to provide for genuine portability of pension plans.

Genuine portability means that contributions will be vested and locked in from the day they are made. Now if the hon. Prime Minister wants to make certain exceptions with regard to employee contributions and allow them to be withdrawn in whole or in part under certain circumstances, I would not argue with him. But I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the employer contributions should definitely be vested.

As I said, these are a substitute for wages. People accept lower wages in order to get a pension plan, yet if they leave the employment of their employer, they do not get any benefit. In my opinion, it is a high-class form of cheating. Employees have been promised certain benefits that they do not get. The money is used by the employer to reduce his total obligations under the pension plan, since he can then use contributions he made on behalf of employee A, who has now left, to provide agreed benefits to employees C, D, E, and F. I do not think that is reasonable. I think the contributions paid on behalf of employee A should accrue exclusively to the benefit of employee A.

I realize that this will mean that employer contributions will have to be somewhat higher than they have been in the past. They will not have to be higher in form, Mr. Speaker; they will just have to be in the amount that the employer claims to be making. In the case of a pension plan in which the employer ostensibly pays half the cost and the employees half; in fact the employer pays considerably less than half the cost, because he gets the benefit of the contributions made on behalf of employees who have left his employ.

I should point out, Mr. Speaker, that in relation to a statement—I think it was the hon. Prime Minister who made it, on first reading of this bill that provisions now being made under income tax legislation in the United States to provide for a certain degree of vesting of pensions demonstrate that our great pioneering idea, as he no doubt called it, is being copied in other countries. I would point out to him that it means no such thing. I think the government of Canada has for at least 20 years provided under its income tax regulations for a certain degree of vesting of pension benefits. The degree was even less than is provided in this bill, so I can welcome the bill as at least a minor and hesitant step forward—

Mr. J. H. White (London South): That federal legislation has never been enforced.

Mr. Bryden: Well, it used to be. I confess that I am not familiar with the details; it is rather a complicated and technical matter. I believe a question arose a few years ago as to its constitutional validity. The federal government backed away from it because it was not really convinced as to its validity. But for a good many years before that it had been enforced; indeed, it had resulted in a limited degree of vesting being provided in private pension plans. This bill picks up from where the federal regulations left off and improves the vesting slightly. But I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, not nearly enough. Not sufficient to provide for genuine—

Mr. MacDonald: That is a good definition of Tory pioneering, to pick up on something that was dropped 20 years ago.

Mr. White: You are missing the whole point. The federal legislation was inoperative.

Mr. Bryden: For a long period of time, Mr. Speaker, it was not inoperative.

Mr. White: I think it was never enforced.

Mr. Bryden: Well, whether or not it was rigidly enforced, many companies adjusted their plans to comply with it, so it was a pretty fair bluff carried out by a few officials in The Department of National Revenue. They may have been acting without authority, but they did get away with the bluff.

At any rate, the concept of using income tax regulations as a means of ensuring some portability in pension plans is not an idea that came from this bill. It is an idea that came from federal regulations that were put into effect about 1945, or somewhere in that neighbourhood.

One last point I would like to make, Mr. Speaker, is this. I regret that in revising this legislation the government continues to take the position that employees covered by pension plans are not entitled to know what is happening in the administration of these plans. This is a matter that we have raised with the government in the past also. Of course, we have run up against the basic government philosophy that an employee really should be happy, grateful to his employer and should not be expected to know how even his own money is being managed. Most pension plans contain employer contributions and employee contributions. Under this legislation, neither an employee nor his duly qualified representative has any way of finding out even how his own money is being administered. It is my submission that all the money is really his own money—both the employer contribution and the employee contribution—but there is no question in the world that at least the contributions that he himself makes out of his own income are his own money. Surely there should be some procedure whereby, either directly or through an agent, he can find out what is happening to his money and how the plan is being administered. I know that the employers would squawk to high heaven if it was suggested that employees or their representatives could be able to go down to the pension commission at reasonable times and find out what is happening under their plan. The employers would object because a great many of them are not doing what they claim to be doing at all. They are not making anything like the contributions they claim to be making. They are getting the benefit of the contributions that are not vested in employees; they are also getting the benefit of rebates that insurance companies may be making. The employees cannot find out anything about these things.

I submit to the government that people have a right to know how their money is being administered; they have a right to find out. The government made a proper step forward when it provided for public regulation and scrutiny of the plans to ensure that there was no outright crookedness going on, as happened in some cases in the past, but the employees should not have to rely on the good-will of the employer or of a government agency to find out what is happening to their own money. The employers can find out what is going on in the plans; they know in any case, but why not the employees? Why should they not be advised or be able to find out how these plans are being administered?

This is a matter that we can discuss further, Mr. Speaker, in committee of the whole House, but I raise it in a preliminary way now because I think it is time the government abandoned its antiquated master-and-servant approach to employee rights in this vitally important field.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, just before the vote is put, there are a couple of comments I would like to make.

In the first place, I do not think the government advances this bill, nor advanced the original bill, with the idea that this was, as we have had to say in other legislation, the end and be all of what might be done. On the other hand, I would point out, as I did on first reading, that there are some 4,359 pension plans which have been affected by this legislation by bringing to those plans a better protection to the employees. There are some 553,000 members of these plans in Ontario who are affected and who benefit by the Act and for the period of time in which it has already been in effect.

I would not want the hon. member for Woodbine to leave, as he is obviously attempting to do, the impression that this plan is no good and does not affect a very large number of people.

Mr. Bryden: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am attempting no such thing. I think I made it perfectly clear that this bill provides minor benefits, but I am suggesting that they are far less than adequate.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: All right, Mr. Speaker.

The other thing I would like to mention about the bill is that we are attempting through this legislation to extend into the other provinces what we have done in Ontario. I think all hon. members in this House are aware this is not an easy task. It is not easy to get agreement between the provinces of Canada operating independently. It is not easy always to get agreement with the federal government, but I think we have come a long way in the three or four years we have been working on this problem. I am hopeful that the province of Quebec will pass legislation parallel to this bill. That legislation will not, of course, be exactly the same, because there are different civil codes and different laws under which they operate. But nonetheless, I have been in communication with the government of Quebec and they are interested in what we are doing here because their intent is to do the same thing.

Here we will have achieved at least some degree of portability between the two major industrial provinces of Canada. In my view, while it may be an easy thing to stand up and say it is not enough—I would agree it is not enough—but I must make the point, and make it very firmly, that it is a beginning, and it is a beginning that would not have been accomplished had we not taken the initiative.

Mr. Bryden: The government made a beginning four years ago.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Well, perhaps if it takes even eight years, at least if we accomplish it we will have done what we set out to accomplish. I point this out because I think we are making a major step forward.

I am not in a position to inform the House as to what the attitude of the other provinces of Canada will be, other than to say that they have sent representatives to two conferences we have sponsored. As far as we can ascertain from the discussions and the results of those conferences, the other provinces of Canada are at least considering passing similar legislation so that we will be able to achieve uniformity in this field right across the country.

Then I would simply say—and there will be, of course, various particulars to which hon. members want some answers and which will be discussed when we are in committee stage—but I would only say that in the overall picture I think we are laying a base here upon which will be built the improvement of pension benefits for the workers of this province long after those of us who are here today are gone forever from this chamber. I am satisfied that we have a firm foundation here.

I am not satisfied with what it has achieved to date in the sense that this is the final disposition, but, after all, we have required registration under this legislation of some 8,100 separate pension plans. This, in itself, from a straight technical point of view in just handling these plans, is a very large task indeed. The majority of them have had to be changed; they have been negotiated in various ways, with different companies, under different circumstances. To do this is quite an achievement in the time that this bill has been in effect.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE UNIVERSITY OF GUELPH ACT, 1964

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education) moves second reading of Bill No. 152, An Act to amend The University of Guelph Act, 1964.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

Clerk of the House: The twentieth order, House in committee of supply; Mr. N. Whitney in the chair.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF

On vote 102:

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a few comments and suggestions to the hon. Minister (Mr. Stewart) under this vote, item 8, grants under The Community Centres Act.

Several years ago we had quite a discussion on the government's lack of appreciation of physical fitness. Under this vote the government have prided themselves in emphasizing and stressing that they were doing something in relation to fitness. Under The Community Centres Act the government pays, I understand, 25 per cent of the cost on approved construction projects with a maximum of $16,000.

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture): It is $5,000.

Mr. Newman: It is $5,000? With today's cost of construction, $5,000 does not seem to be a sufficiently large amount. Would the hon. Minister consider increasing that amount from $5,000 so that communities could take more advantage of this in constructing substantial projects for the promotion of physical fitness?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, I suppose one could always say that this is something that could be done. I would point out, however, that the grant as it pertains now, as he says, applies to 25 per cent of the capital cost up to a maximum cost of $5,000 for any community centre projects.

There are four types of projects that qualify. First of all, a community hall, a skating rink, a swimming pool and an athletic field. So this means $20,000 to a community centre project in any given community. Of course that applies to as many projects as the community feels that they want to have within that municipality. There are a good many that have several.

I would feel that this is an excellent aid towards these projects, but I would point out to my hon. friend that there is always the possibility, indeed it has already occurred in some instances, where even the amount of grant that has been made available has induced the construction of community centres where the enthusiasm for the project in the initial stage of construction has soon lost its emphasis and, in effect, they have become something less than what they were originally intended to be in that community. I think we have to be careful, as guardians of the public Treasury—and that certainly applies to my hon. friends in the Opposition as well—that grants towards these projects are not made so high that they induce the spending of money with a burst of enthusiasm to accomplish a purpose, the interest in which soon wanes. I think we must be very conscious of this, because this has happened in some communities already.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, I can understand the hon. Minister's concern with that, but more than likely the community that started the project looked at the possibility of receiving the 25 per cent of the proved construction costs, but did not look at the fact that there was a maximum of $5,000. In Ontario, what can you build for $5,000? It does not even come close to providing any type of project.

Mr. M. Gaunt (Huron-Bruce): Mr. Chairman, I have a few comments to make under this vote, stemming from a rather personal experience that I have had. The municipality of Wingham has been attempting to build a swimming pool, and they investigated the possibility of getting grants under this particular Act. They intend to build an outdoor swimming pool, and I am told by those who are familiar with the Act that it specifically states that grants are provided for indoor pools; but it does not mention outdoor pools. The interpretation is that grants can be given for indoor pools, but not for outdoor pools. I would urge the hon. Minister to do a little housekeeping, and include outdoor pools in the Act as well.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I would say this is a bit of a shock to me, because I know of some outdoor pools that have qualified for grants under this Act. I cannot understand why the hon. member would be told that his particular project would not qualify. My adviser tells me that indoor pools do not qualify for schools. This is the clause in the Act. But outdoor pools, providing they are in community centres, do qualify for grants.

Mr. Gaunt: Then it is my understanding that as long as the swimming pool is in a community centre, is part of a community centre, whether it be indoor or outdoor, it qualifies. Is that so?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Yes; that is right. The community centre, whether it is an indoor or an outdoor pool, does qualify. But an indoor pool in connection with a school does not qualify because there are grants otherwise available.

Mr. Gaunt: Mr. Chairman, if I might pursue this just for a moment. In this particular case the municipality was thinking about building the pool at the same time that the new school was going to be built, but it was going to be built on the property of the municipality and, therefore, it did not come under the grant system for The Department of Education. The municipality was actually going to build the swimming pool. The swimming pool was going to be built by the municipality of Wingham, and the intention was that in the summer time and during the weekends and so on, the swimming pool could be used by the community at large. During the school months it could be used by the pupils in the school. This was the original intention.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: It sounds like a very logical suggestion, Mr. Chairman. I see no reason why it should not qualify for a grant, because from what the hon. member has said it is indeed a community centre project. If it is administered by a community centre board, built on property owned by the municipality and divorced completely from the operation of the school board, and not qualifying for grants under The Department of Education Act, I can see no reason why this should not qualify. If my hon. friend would like, I would be very happy to work with him through the department and try to get the matter straightened out.

Vote 102 agreed to.

On vote 103:

Mr. J. P. Spence (Kent East): Mr. Chairman, under vote 103, item 4, projects costs, I believe the hon. Minister, in his estimates last year, set aside $924,000. In his opening remarks he mentioned ARDA. I would like to ask the hon. Minister where this money is being spent, what projects of ARDA are being carried out, and where in the province of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Yes; the $924,000 projects were set aside. First of all, $200,000 was spent on community pastures; alternate uses of land, $126,000; soil and water conservation, $440,000; rural development, $60,000; and research, $98,000; making a total of $924,000.

Mr. Spence: May I ask the hon. Minister where these community pastures are being developed?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I think I know where most of them are, offhand. Victoria county, Timiskaming, Leeds county and Manitoulin Island are the pastures that are in operation now.

Mr. Spence: They are operating now?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I beg your pardon?

Mr. Spence: These community pastures are operating now?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Yes.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the hon Minister could give us any indication as to the plans for what appears to be a fairly extensive ARDA project in the making in eastern Ontario. He may recall the series of articles that were carried by the Globe and Mail about preliminary surveys and studies. Is there a major project involving what would appear to me from those studies to be some necessary research and drawing in of the community, and the people in the community, to enlist their participation and their support? What is the status of that emerging project?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, I am very happy to deal with this matter. The matter of the 11 counties of eastern Ontario have been under active consideration ever since ARDA was first discussed and started in our department. A series of meetings has been held throughout eastern Ontario with the local municipal people and with the local ARDA committees that have been set up. As recently as May 28 we had the last meeting of our ARDA directorate in Kemptville with the people involved. There were 95 people in attendance, representing all 11 counties in eastern Ontario. There is a comprehensive rural development programme being planned that will envelop the 11 county area, designating it as a rural development area and implementing certain plans that are now in the discussion stage. There are some projects that are already under way down there—the Leeds county pasture I mentioned is one of them—and there are certain projects in Renfrew county that are already under way.

The major projects are being finalized now, and I would say that within the next few months some very real development could take place there, based on redevelopments of land drainage projects on the South Nation River, that has been such a problem for so long. These I think will lend themselves to the redevelopment and rehabilitation of a good deal of the area.

I think we must recognize the fact so well said by my hon. friend from Lanark (Mr. Gomme) when he spoke in the Budget debate a few weeks ago. Relating his remarks to ARDA in eastern Ontario, some of the newspaper story seemed to me to be a little overdone in some respects. I do not for a minute suggest that there are not cases there where there is a real problem, but I would point out an illustration used there of a picture of a set of farm buildings that were in a deplorable state. That farm was owned by a man who had no use for those buildings whatever; they bore no relationship to the value of that farm as far as the operator was concerned, yet that picture was used as an illustration of the deplorable state of agriculture in that area—and it had no more relationship to the owner of that farm than fly.

This is something that could be illustrated in other areas of the province of Ontario. Take a drive to Windsor, down through that cash crop area of southwestern Ontario, and you will find all kinds of farm buildings that are no longer useful to that particular farm. They have just been let sit there. The farm owner has not gone to the expense of tearing them down or removing them, but he is making mighty good use of the land around them and the land on which they are located. So I do not think we can always judge farms nor community economic standards by the condition of some of the buildings that may be found on those particular farms.

I mention this just as a sidelight to this affair. I think we must recognize that it required a good deal of research work to be done in eastern Ontario—involvement with the local people; working with them or drafting with them the local project to be considered—and I would say that it is making very good progress; that ARDA is not something that you can just snap your fingers at and it will happen overnight.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Chairman, just in this regard might I ask the hon. Minister a question? He mentioned the farm buildings that have been allowed to go into disuse, and these blot the landscape and are sometimes used by photographers to illustrate certain points which they should not illustrate. Has the hon. Minister given any serious thought to any subsidy or any assistance or any technique by which these old buildings which are past their usefulness might be removed? It might be a place perhaps where our firefighters might be trained, or perhaps emergency measures organization might come into play—I don't know. Surely there must be some way that many of these buildings which are tumbling down and blotting our landscape could be looked after and could be removed. The government should, I think, give attention to this and outline some plan for doing it.

Hon. G. E. Gomme (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Chairman, I would just like to say a word in this regard. You realize a lot of these old log buildings are sought after by city people who want to build rustic-type homes, so you could not convince a farmer that he should dispose of them until he gets a chance to sell them. I know of one that was just built; it is a twenty thousand dollar home and the logs were from an old log barn, and it is one of the things that really looks nice down in eastern Ontario. If the farmer can get cash for them he certainly is not going to dispose of them just the way the hon. member mentions.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, I might say I am not speaking of buildings that are in good enough repair that they can be moved and used by somebody. But there are buildings, of which the hon. Minister spoke, that are tumbling down and which are past all usefulness. These perhaps could be removed.

Hon. Mr. Gomme: You may be talking about that but, on the other hand, there are a lot of these old log buildings where the roof has gone; they look to be falling down but still the timber is fit for use the way I have mentioned. So why should the farmer dispose of this building unless he has a market for it, which eventually he does get?

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister mentioned misleading aspects of newspaper reports concerning some of the areas of the province. In the past few weeks there was a series dealing with Norfolk county which has been brought to the attention of the House on other occasions. This did not play up pictures so much but there were some very interesting and, in fact, shocking details when one read the full account.

I understand that the warden of the county has a committee of county council set up to deal with the various levels of government to see what might be done to bring Norfolk county out of this—

Mr. MacDonald: Pocket of poverty.

Mr. Nixon: —condition that is widely described as depressed. Now I know that they have approached the ARDA administration of the province, and I wonder if he would report on the condition of these negotiations.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, there are two things I would like to deal with here. First, I would like to refer to the idea advanced by the hon. member for Yorkview. Frankly, I think the hon. member has a pretty good idea. I would completely agree with what my hon. friend from Lanark says. A good many of these log buildings should be preserved. Frankly, I think they are a link with the past and a great tradition of our heritage. As long as they can be preserved, we should preserve them.

However, the hon. member did make a suggestion here and I think it ties in pretty well with the programme we suggested yesterday of farmstead improvement and general clean-up and rural beautification—if such a word may be used. It seems to me that as the hon. member suggested that some of these old buildings are of questionable value and might very well be used for—I was going to say target practice—for some of our fire organizations around the country. I think it is something that bears a little consideration.

Now, with regard to Norfolk county and the suggestion of the hon. member for Brant. The ARDA committee—and this is really what he is referring to here—headed up by the county council agriculture committee, has met with the director, Mr. Crown, of our ARDA branch; and they are examining if there is an application of the new ARDA agreement, as it is now constituted, in the Norfolk county area. This matter is under active consideration with the committee and our directors at the moment. I do not think they have reached any conclusions as yet. They have not yet brought any proposals to our director.

Mr. Nixon: If I might just pursue that a bit. Many people who are not familiar with the details of the new agreement, and I would submit even a few who are, are under the impression that the application is broad and nebulous. It is very difficult to state specifically what is intended for the moneys that would be made available to the programme. I wonder if the hon. Minister might give us, in the minute or two that remains, his own view of just what this money would specifically be intended for. I have heard him say that we are dealing with land and we are dealing with people. Surely at some time this level of government would do a great service to all the municipalities and the people who are concerned with ARDA if we could state more specifically and definitely just what the prime aim is in terms that are down to earth and concrete.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Well, Mr. Chairman, I do not know how one can be more definite and concrete than by saying that when one is dealing—as I said yesterday—with people, you just cannot come up and move them from one place to another. You have to have this process of evolution take place. My hon. friend referred to these newspaper reports. I think it was pretty clearly illustrated in some of the statements that were enunciated in those newspaper reports that the local people themselves were not too interested in doing anything about co-operating with ARDA projects.

I think it is most unfortunate that newspaper stories such as these are published creating an image of rural people not being interested in helping themselves; because this is not the way rural people think and act. I would like to say that the concept of ARDA, in our opinion, as we have discussed it at federal level and now in the new ARDA agreement, seeks to provide the best use of the land and its resources for the general well-being of the people within the area, but where that land is not of a capability that will lend itself to providing a useful living to those people, then perhaps consideration should be given to the retraining or the removing of those people to areas where their services and their usefulness could be readily employed. I think that sums it up as well as one could hope to do this.

Mention was made yesterday by the hon. member for Huron-Bruce of the Gaspé project—or was it the hon. member for York South? Anyway, one of them mentioned it yesterday. He referred to the Quebec government's Gaspé project down there and yet here again, you see, there were newspaper reports that the local people themselves were not buying the idea; that 80 people had been sent in by the government of Quebec to deal with this very matter, to try to get them involved and interested in doing some of the projects that were mentioned yesterday, and those that could not be involved in it, to see if they could be retrained and moved out and become involved in some other industry. Yet the local paper did not buy the idea overnight. Roots go pretty deep in areas as described in the newspaper article, where one's childhood has been spent and where they hope their grandchildren will spend their childhood. These are the things with which we have to deal. We are dealing with people, and I would say that the general philosophy of ARDA is to deal with the resources of the country in the best possible way. There is no greater nor more valuable resource than the people of any community.

Mr. Spence: May I ask the hon. Minister, sir, if there are any community pastures being developed; or could an Indian reservation qualify for development of a community pasture? Are there any community pastures being considered for any reservations in the province at the present time?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: The answer to the first question, Mr. Chairman, is yes. Indian reservations are given the same consideration under the federal-provincial ARDA agreement as any other area. There are no Indian reserves on which community pastures are presently located in Ontario.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Chairman, if there is to be more discussion, perhaps we can leave it until later.

I move that the committee rise and report it has come to certain resolutions and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report certain resolutions and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on Monday, I would like to resume these estimates and they will be followed by the estimates of The Department of Education.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: There will be a night session Monday night.

The House adjourned at 1.05 o'clock, p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

MONDAY, MAY 31, 1965

The House met at 2 o'clock, p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: We are always pleased to have visitors to the Legislature and today we welcome as guests students from the following schools: In the west gallery, St. Martin's separate school, London; Brechin separate school, Brechin; and in the east gallery, C. W. Jefferys secondary school, Downsview.

Petitions.

Presenting reports by committees.

Mr. A. Carruthers (Durham): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to present the interim report of the select committee on aging.

Mr. Speaker, this select committee was appointed by the House on motion of the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts), May 8, 1964. It has already been my privilege to remark on some of the activities of this committee during the Throne Speech debate on February 9, 1965.

As chairman, I would again pay tribute to those hon. members, my colleagues, who served with me on this select committee; and, Mr. Speaker, I would also at this time like to extend a word of appreciation to the committee's consultant and secretary, Mr. Lawrence Crawford, a gerontologist in his own right. Mr. Crawford's extensive knowledge and experience in the field of gerontology have been of inestimable value in carrying out the work of this committee. Indeed, the success which has resulted from our efforts has been due in no small measure to the organizing ability of Mr. Crawford and his dedicated service on behalf of the senior citizens of this province.

I would also like to express the committee's appreciation, Mr. Speaker, to the hon. Minister of Public Welfare (Mr. Cecile) and the officials of his department for their co-operation and assistance at all times.

The committee has had the opportunity to visit and examine many of the facilities provided for our senior citizens throughout the province, facilities which in a large measure are supported by the provincial government and which are a credit to The Department of Public Welfare and to the local municipalities where they are located.

The month of May is without a doubt a good month in which to present an interim report such as ours. First, May is the month already recognized in the United States, by proclamation of the late President John F. Kennedy, as senior citizens' month. This practice, I might add, Mr. Speaker, is being actively continued by President Johnson. Second, May leads up to a very important week in the province of Ontario, senior citizens' week, June 6 to 12, 1965, a week which was suggested and supported by the United Senior Citizens of Ontario Incorporated. On behalf of the committee I wish to extend to this organization, together with all like-minded groups in the province and all our elderly persons, our best wishes for a very successful week.

However, I hope we will all realize that the services and well-being of our older citizens are important to us not only in a designated week but throughout the year. Indeed, if I may paraphrase the theme adopted by our neighbours to the south for May, 1965, and make this more personal: "The older person's today, is tomorrow for everyone else."

Mr. Speaker, I shall not read the entire interim report, brief as it is. We feel that we have accomplished a great deal. I shall merely read those items which have particularly impressed us during our deliberations to date. All of these will receive further study by the committee as the House sees fit to reappoint us.

First, the fact that interdisciplinary developments in the whole field of gerontology are required. This was brought out most forcefully at the Ontario conference on university education related to aging.

Second, our proposed Ontario institute of gerontology would have among its objectives the co-ordination and support of all provincial activities, but primarily research and training in the field of aging.

Third, the possibility of a pilot programme of geriatric consultant clinics to serve aged persons in the community.

Fourth, the need to extend various services to aged persons in their own homes.

Fifth, the necessity of immediate action by the province in determining standards and their enforcement in proprietary nursing homes, such standards to ensure the optimum care and well-being of aged residents.

Sixth, the lack of sufficient community information and counselling services for aging men and women.

Seventh, the value of extending training courses for adjuvants and extension of their services, to restore communications in the elderly, particularly post-stroke victims.

Eighth, requirements for a more concise and workable set of definitions of types of care, particularly where these affect the aged who are chronically ill.

Ninth, more widespread public education regarding safety and the vulnerability of elderly persons to accidents of several types.

Tenth, opportunities and potentials for the greater use of mature adults to assist others, and perhaps use of older persons in this capacity to help themselves to a fuller life in later years.

These are some of the many matters which have impressed us, Mr. Speaker. A glance at the agenda set forth in the printed report will reveal that much more yet remains to be done. I am confident, however, that we have plans which, while demanding, will enable us to complete our findings in a reasonable time.

When we examine the ten items which particularly impressed our committee, Mr. Speaker, and which I have just read, it is clear that some are positive, some are negative; some reveal areas of need, gaps in available services. Others reflect sound programmes which have only to be extended. But whatever their basis, their overriding aim is to enhance opportunities for our aging men and women, to prevent onset or worsening of illness and distress and to help the elderly to help themselves to remain independent, active members of society.

Perhaps I may digress at this point and speak more personally. One of the tasks I hope we can complete is to co-ordinate, or at least start the co-ordinating process, whereby some of the many programmes already in existence can be brought together and utilized wherever possible for our senior citizens. There are bills before this House and many Acts already on the statute books which can increase the scope of services to and opportunities for the aged in this province. There are sections of other reports presented to the House which are of more than passing interest to this select committee.

For instance, there is a proposal of increased regional government. I intend to ask my hon. colleagues on the select committee on aging to consider its implications for work with the aged. Our consultant and I last year studied the work of the United States office of aging through its regional units, serving the states of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Delaware. Following our discussions with Mr. Louis Bennett there, we are pursuing inquiries with Dr. Clark Tibbits, deputy director of the United States office of aging in Washington, DC.

It may be, and I speak on my own here, that regional units operating under the type of provincial centre of which we have heard could extend a wide variety of counselling and related services to older men and women in their own communities. Such regional units, under the direction of a central institute, could serve to bring together the host of public and private organizations now concerned with the field of aging.

One positive feature of such a system might be to translate into action some of our select committee's future recommendations and, to quote our official terms of reference, assist in the promotion, development and creation of opportunities for self-help, to their own satisfaction and advantage as members of society as a whole, including preparation for retirement, leisure and the benefits of educational opportunities in later life.

To accomplish all these matters the select committee will examine many more developments, legislative and otherwise, Canadian and foreign. It is my wish, and that of my hon. colleagues, Mr. Speaker, to put before you and the House a concise, readable report of our work to date. If this meets with your approval we would respectfully ask that we might continue our efforts when the third session of the 27th Legislature is prorogued and until such time as our task is finished.

We can then join with the specialists in geriatrics and gerontology and show our society not merely that years have been added to life but rather how to add life to those years.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask that the select committee to which is referred aging and the aged be reappointed with the same comprehensive terms of reference in order that we might complete our work. Thank you.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Report adopted.

Mr. Speaker: Motions.

Introduction of bills.

Orders of the day.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I would crave your indulgence to raise the question which I have discussed with the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts), and I know that he is as concerned as I am, and indeed as are all hon. members of this House, when we read the headlines in the paper that in our quiet and lawful society there has been an eruption of mob violence, and even the appearance of a minority group—and a rowdy group—who are calling themselves the Nazi party. I think, sir, that this strikes a question with us and at the very roots of our democracy. The question is, of course, to what extent do we permit freedom of assembly and freedom of speech, and where does it go beyond freedom into licence?

We on our side—and I am sure all members of this House agree—do not want to have McCarthyism. Yet if we look at the birth and development of such parties as the Nazi party, and we realize that it could happen within an assembly of free men—in fact, within a nation high in its intellectual achievements—is of grave concern, I suspect that if such a situation as this could even happen in Ontario, I think we as a government of Ontario should be examining whether our laws are sufficient. I recognize in many cases that this is the responsibility of Ottawa, but on the other hand if we ourselves are the administrators of these laws, and we do have a responsibility, I think we should be examining the freedom of the press. We should examine whether they have the licence to tell people about this small group and where they are going to meet. There were spot announcements frequently on the radio and we should consider whether this does not veer on the irresponsible, and whether in some way this could not be controlled or pointed out to the press the responsibility they have within a democracy.

I suggest that there are a great number of questions that we should be looking at. I suggest to the hon. Prime Minister to consider that because of the fundamental reasoning that would have to take place with this, whether this could be referred for study by the McRuer commission, or whether there could be a Royal commission set up, particularly with respect to a situation such as this.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would just say that I join with the hon. leader of the Opposition in expressing a very profound sense of regret, sir, that this occurred in our society. I would say—as I read the press report—it is based on very deeply held emotions arising, perhaps, from the last war. It is also involved with the whole question of “hate” literature that is being spread across Canada. It is a very wide-ranging problem, and one with which we have been concerned over some period of time.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that years ago—I forget just which one of the federal-provincial conferences—but I asked at the conference if the question of “hate” literature could be placed on the agenda—not so much that I felt anything could be done at the conference, but I felt it was a national problem that should be brought out into the open and examined in that forum, which was dealing with some of the national problems that we have in the country.

There has been representation made to the federal government over the years concerning possible amendments to the Criminal Code to take care of some of these matters.

The great difficulty, of course, is that there is an element of judgment involved in this. We have freedom of expression, and we have freedom to gather and express opinions, whether that becomes inflammatory and exceeds the bounds of commonsense in inflaming and inciting emotions that get out of control. On the other hand, those people who do become excited also have a responsibility if we are to preserve the freedoms of our community both ways—for those in this particular episode of yesterday.

I can assure the hon. member that the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Wishart) has discussed this area with the Hon. Guy Favreau. It is a matter that receives the constant attention of the government. It is something that is always with us and that we are looking after.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might ask the hon. Prime Minister a question in this connection. I will say at the outset that I agree with both the hon. Prime Minister and the hon. leader of the Opposition that this is a matter of deep concern to all of us, but the one thing that puzzles me is the line of argument that has emerged, that the basic reason for this is in good part the buildup that the press gave it.

Has the hon. Prime Minister or the hon. Attorney General been able to satisfy themselves on what strikes me as the most intriguing thing why somebody—the civic authorities, the police, somebody—could not have informed the public that there could not be a meeting because there had been no permit granted for a meeting? The whole buildup, presumably, was on the basis of a permit, and there was no permit.

This is one question that I would like to see answered authoritatively, and I think it is rather significant in the emergence of this particular episode—the relationship and role of the press in this delicate balance between freedom of association and freedom of the press and the protection of the public welfare.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, I can only say in that regard that any licence or permission to hold a gathering would be granted by the city of Toronto. Law enforcement, on the spot where this took place is purely a matter for the Metropolitan Toronto police, unless they ask for assistance from the provincial police. So really, as a government, we are in no position to answer these questions asked. Perhaps the mere fact that they have been asked on the floor of this House will produce an answer from those who know. It simply is not within the knowledge of this government, because we do not issue these permits. They are issued by the local government here.

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I have four questions for the hon. Attorney General of which I have given him notice.

Would the hon. Attorney General consider the immediate creation by legislation of the civil wrong of slander of a group, so that an individual being a member of a group could, if the group were slandered, have a remedy in the courts for an injunction and damages?

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Speaker, as I think the hon. member is aware, this subject is receiving consideration by the government of Canada at this time, which is being advised by a committee which was constituted to study this very matter.

We sent very capable representation before that committee some weeks ago—the committee is still sitting—and I think it would be premature and probably detrimental to introduce remedies within our own area of jurisdiction which might be detrimental to a solution which could be effective across Canada. I think that is particularly so in view of the extension of the subject-matter of complaint throughout several provinces, where it must effectively be dealt with by national legislation, and therefore answering the question specifically, "Would the Attorney General consider the immediate creation by legislation?" I would say I would not consider the creation of this type of remedy at this particular moment.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Speaker, does the hon. Attorney General intend to make representations to the federal government on the question of whether or not the Criminal Code should be amended to prevent the publication of names of persons involved in court proceedings until a conviction has been obtained, and, if so, what would be the nature of the hon. Attorney General's representation?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Speaker, replying to that question, I would say that amendments to the Criminal Code are ordinarily and customarily discussed with the Attorneys General of the provinces or their representatives in order that representations may be made and considered.

Frankly, I am not aware of the details of the proposal. I read some press comment of a remark or a suggestion which had been made, I believe emanating from The Department of Justice or from the hon. Minister of Justice, but I do not know the detail of the proposal, except what I have read in the press. I am therefore not in a position to come to any conclusion as yet as to what representations I will make. I would trust that if this is proposed it certainly will be brought to our attention, our opinion requested and our consideration asked in the ordinary and customary way.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Speaker, is the province of Ontario represented at the secret conference being held at the University of Toronto, dealing with the prevention of crime? If so, who is representing the province?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Speaker, the province is being represented at the national conference on the prevention of crime by the Attorney General, deputy Attorney General, the director of public prosecutions, chief magistrate for Ontario, chairman and counsel for the Ontario law reform commission, chairman of the Ontario police commission, Mr. S. A. Caldbick, QC, and the commissioner of the Ontario provincial police.

Mr. Speaker, the question is framed "Is Ontario represented at the secret conference?" I think I should like to say a word about that description and add this: The conference, of course, was arranged and is being conducted by the department of criminology of the University of Toronto. I think it is generally known to be our policy that our universities have a fair autonomy in their pursuits of research in every field of knowledge. At the conference giving papers, expressing views and assisting in this type of social research will be members of the judiciary, civil servants in various positions from various governments.

This is simply my own thinking. While we have no control over the conduct of the conference, and feel that this is proper, I would think that if persons in the judiciary and civil service are to be free to express views which, if published immediately, might be considered possibly as critical of their governments, they must not be made to feel that their positions are being jeopardized. I think in order to get the full, proper and best expression of opinion there has to be some secrecy for their protection—I believe this is their attitude, that they be protected by some secrecy.

Further, I would say this: I do understand that the press is to be admitted to certain areas of the conference; and I take it, as has happened in the past, releases will be given out of the gist of the discussions, resolutions proposed, and decisions arrived at.

The conference, however, still would not be secret. It is my understanding that all those taking part are not required to maintain secrecy individually on their own part. But I think there is some reason to protect certain officials in order that they may give the fullest expression of opinion in this very important field of research into the prevention of crime.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. Attorney General permit a supplementary question?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Surely!

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Speaker, would the record and transcript of this conference be kept and made available in this Legislature at some future time?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer at the moment, I do not know. I know that on a similar conference in the past which came to my knowledge there was a very full, complete record made to which I had access; but I cannot answer that question specifically or categorically.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Speaker, the final question: Has the insurance branch of The Department of the Attorney General approved the recently announced further increases in automobile insurance rates effective July 1 by the Canadian underwriters' association?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Speaker, the superintendent of insurance is not required to approve of an increase in rates of premiums. The Canadian underwriters' association is, however, required to give at least ten days notice to the superintendent of insurance of any change in the schedule of rates. This notice has not been given as of this date.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I would like to table answers to questions Nos. 77, 83, 111 and 112.

The hon. Prime Minister tabled answers to questions on the order paper as follows:

77. Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Inquiry of the Ministry—Will the Attorney General advise: 1. If in the event of a national emergency, such as war, will the residents of Metropolitan Toronto be evacuated from said municipality? 2. If so, where will the citizens of Metropolitan Toronto be evacuated to? 3. (a) If so, have there been any arrangements for stockpiling of food for such evacuees; (b) if so, what are these arrangements? 4. (a) if so, have there been any provisions for shelter for such evacuees; (b) if so, what are these arrangements? 5. If so, what arrangements have been made for the evacuation of the following from Metropolitan Toronto: (i) school children, (ii) patients in hospitals, (iii) aged and infirm, (iv) those persons in penal institutions?

Answer by the hon. Attorney General:

1. There is no programme which will require the compulsory movement of population, except under specific Canadian army direction in areas of heavy damage and radioactive fallout. Provision for this authority is contained in the Canadian army manual of training and survival operations (Camt. D-91, Chapter 1, Section 1, para. 102 (d) and (e)).

However, a plan is in being prepared by the Metropolitan Toronto police department to assist in voluntary movement of population. It is a matter of stated national policy that there will be no compulsory evacuation.

2. Provided for if required in the provincial reception plan for Zone 3. Reception plans for evacuees have been developed for each of the seven zones in the province.

3. (a) There is no programme for the stockpiling of food.

(b) The provision of essential supplies is the responsibility of the federal war supplies agency.

4. (a) Yes.

(b) Provided for in the provincial reception plan for zone 3.

5. (i) Instruction re dispersal of school children is contained in the Metropolitan Toronto emergency measures organization school plan.

(ii) In accordance with the individual hospital disaster plans as required by the provincial Department of Health.

(iii) As provided for in the planning of Metropolitan Toronto homes for the aged. Others through local domestic arrangements.

(iv) In accordance with plans of The Department of Reform Institutions, as required.

83. Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Inquiry of the Ministry—1. What are the names and location of each parole officer on the staff of The Department of Reform Institutions as of January 1, 1965? 2. What was the case load carried by each parole officer on that date? 3. What are the academic and experience qualifications of each parole officer on staff as of January 1, 1965? 4. (a) Are special in-service training courses available to parole officers? (b) If so, how many officers have taken such courses, and when?

Answer by the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions (Mr. Grossman):

1. See Appendix A.

2. See Appendix A.

3. See Appendix A.

4. (a) No. However, four training seminars have been held within the past five years. At the present time an in-service training course for rehabilitation officers is being developed.

4. (b) Not applicable.

111. Mr. E. Sargent (Grey North): Inquiry of the Ministry—Will the Minister give a breakdown of an item on page K-7 of public accounts, an amount of $6,000 to Park Plaza hotel, and an amount of $15,000 to Westbury hotel?

Answer by the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests (Mr. Roberts):

Analysis of accounts for Park Plaza hotel and Westbury hotel as they appear in the public accounts of the province of Ontario for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1964 (page K-7):

LUNCHEONS AND DINNERS

112. Mr. Sargent: Inquiry of the Ministry—Will the Minister give a breakdown of the item on page K-10 of public accounts “travelling expenses, an amount of $5,144 to Mr. J. E. Hietala and party”?

Answer by the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests: See Appendix “B”

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The thirteenth order, House in committee of supply; Mr. W. G. Noden in the chair.

On vote 103:

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, while we are on vote 103, there are some questions I would like to raise with the hon. Minister (Mr. Stewart).

During the course of the introductory speeches to the estimates there was considerable discussion about the need for pumping money back into the agricultural sector of the economy in an effort to redress the unfair share of the national or provincial wealth which agriculture is getting. We got into some little comparisons with the budget in the province of Quebec. At the time that I was advancing figures with regard to the province of Quebec, the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. Spooner) and I were wondering as to whether or not a figure that I was citing represented agriculture alone. He felt it did. I am rather glad to be able to announce to him that he is more right than I am and that makes my point even stronger than I thought in the first instance.

The fact of the matter is that the budget in the province of Quebec last year for agriculture was $63.3 million, this year it is $112.5 million. Now there are a few factors in there that might well be outside the jurisdiction of our Department of Agriculture for an exact comparison. I note, for example, that they have grants of $3,659,000 for colonization; and later on they also have purchases, construction and alteration of removables, including furnishings, equipment and construction of colonization roads and bridges, $4 million. There is another grant to facilitate the construction of new buildings; this may be like your community centres, I do not know.

But even if one were to strip out all of that, you still end up with a budget that is close to $100 million, including the grants that are going to the educational institution at MacDonald college; as compared with our budget of $21 million, including the grants that are going to Guelph. I think this underlines a contrast between what we are doing and what perhaps has to be done if we are going to fulfill those objectives spelled out so eloquently both by the hon. Minister and his deputy about redressing this balance of agricultural income.

I just present that. Perhaps the hon. Minister does have some comment.

In connection with ARDA, may I ask the hon. Minister: Are moneys for ARDA purposes in Ontario channelled only through the county committees that have been set up to implement ARDA programmes, or are they channelled through other agencies including other government departments that might be related in the overall comprehensive ARDA programme?

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Chairman, with regard to the channelling of ARDA moneys intended for various projects throughout the province, they are not channelled specifically through the county committee unless it happens to be a particular county project. For instance, I can think of an illustration of the Leeds county pasture, which has just become operative this year. Now that was handled through the local county committee.

A property was purchased, as I understand it, through The Department of Public Works. They bought and paid for it. But the operation of the pasture itself, that is setting the rates for the cattle that will be pasturing there, the looking after them, identification and all the rest of it, the general management of the pasture will be the responsibility of the local ARDA committee.

Now, when you come to other projects, and I think of, say, the South Nation River, as one that embraces, I believe, seven counties in eastern Ontario. This is so much broader a concept that this becomes something that will be co-ordinated with the various county committees that are there. I mentioned last week we had a meeting with them there on April 28, trying to get the ground rules laid out to proceed with the projects of priority.

So there is no clear cut established way by which this money can be relegated out. I think it depends on the project, as to what it is intended to do, and where it is used, and for what purpose.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, can I explore another area for a moment? Has there been any marriage of ARDA and our regional development associations? During the estimates of the hon. Minister of Economics and Development (Mr. Randall), we had a pretty lengthy discussion on the role of our regional development associations, and the fact that they are tending to wither on the vine, that they seem to be losing a sense of real purpose and direction because we have not really mapped out a meaningful project for them.

Many of these associations take in areas—take the eastern Ontario regional development association, which is made up of 11 counties. Or if you go up to northwestern Ontario. I remember when that association began, there was quite a little drive made among the early organizing group to get recognition of the fact that agriculture is an important aspect of the economy of northwestern Ontario, even though it may be pocketed in areas such as Fort Francis through to Rainy River, or up around Kenora and so on.

Has anything been done by way of a development of ARDA programmes through the regional development associations, and if not, why not?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: First of all, I would like to enlarge a bit on my earlier reply. I neglected to mention in answering that first question the hon. member asked about the directions that money might flow, that it does flow through the other departments. For instance, The Department of Lands and Forests carries out extensive ARDA projects. But when we set up the ARDA directorate in Ontario, with the branch in The Department of Agriculture for administration, we felt that there was no point in duplicating the services provided by other departments.

So what is involved is that the other departments are represented in the ARDA directorate—the various ones I enumerated the other day—and when a project comes up that lends itself to a Lands and Forests project, we will say, then our ARDA directorate, having approved this and forwarded it through the proper channels, right up to the federal Treasury board at Ottawa and approval having been obtained, then it is turned over to the specific department to carry out the responsibilities of implementation. This is another means of doing this.

In connection with the development areas. The hon. Minister of Economics and Development and I have had considerable discussion on how best we can approach these things. We have now set up a meeting that will be comprised of our deputy Minister and his deputy Minister and their respective staffs to discuss ways and means by which we can use ARDA funds in the areas, to develop projects that will be of benefit in those areas. Quite frankly, I think there is an opportunity here for very substantial contributions to be made to industrial development in areas that will lend themselves to that kind of an industry.

Of course, we always have the problem of industry sometimes being reluctant to move into these areas, unless they can find, first of all, readily available labour. Of course they are always interested in markets for the product of their plants.

I think we can get around some of these things. For instance, the other day, in the county of Hastings, a marble and granite place was opened up there, a little industry, I think employing 36 people locally. This was a project for which some ARDA money was delegated. I believe it provided for a bridge over a creek that would allow the trucks to get to plant and it opened up a little industry.

This to me, is important. I think this is typical of what can be done, and the hon. Minister and I would like very much to see this whole programme expanded as we go across the province.

I think we have to recognize that you just cannot do it overnight. And there has to be a desire on the part of local people to accept industry into their area, because it does change the pattern of living. There has to be an acceptance on the part of local people to be willing and ready to find some other means of employment or earning a living, than just operating the farms that have been in their family name for generations. But I think we are coming to that. There is gradually becoming a public acceptance of this in these areas, and frankly, I have high hopes for it. I think it is an excellent idea. I think it has real merit and we intend to pursue it to the full.

Mr. Chairman: Is vote 103 carried?

Mr. M. Gaunt (Huron-Bruce): Mr. Chairman, I just have a few comments to make in connection with this vote.

In my lead-off speech, I mentioned something about a local development worker or co-ordinator, and I had envisaged that this chap would perhaps work with the local county councils—the local people involved. I realize so well that the local aspect of the ARDA programme is being looked after by the county councils in each county across the province, but I am wondering if the programme could not be enhanced, and perhaps in some cases facilitated, if a local development officer were appointed in the various counties across the province, first of all to work with the farm organizations in the area, to work with the local people and to work with the county council people, as well as the people here in Toronto.

I would like the hon. Minister's comments on that.

The second thing I want to raise is the fact that the community pasture programme in Bruce country, I believe, has been passed, but as yet they have not had the go-ahead that it has been completed and the project will be undertaken. I think both authorities—the federal and provincial authorities—have given their okay on the project, but as yet nothing has happened.

I would like the hon. Minister's comments in that connection.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, first of all, with regard to ARDA field men, under the new federal-provincial ARDA agreement, it has not yet been finalized by both governments. It is in the process of discussion and negotiation now, and has been tentatively approved by the Ministers of both departments, but it is in the hands of the governments of both jurisdictions.

There is provision there for the appointment and training of ARDA field men. I think it is significant to note that at Guelph this year, there is a special course provided there with a $24,000 budget; $12,000 from each of the two jurisdictions for students to do postgraduate work in this matter of rural development. This will be the first course of its kind offered in Canada. I think it is a step forward, and we must recognize that there are certain aspects to this business of rural redevelopment that require a great deal of further study and consideration. This will be a start.

We do intend to employ some ARDA field men—one has been employed, as was mentioned last week, and will be starting in the Manitoulin Island area this summer on a specific project. We hope that as time goes on, others will be employed. I think there is a place for them.

On the other hand, I want to point out the job that has been done by the agricultural representatives in their respective counties and districts, who recognize the need and application of ARDA in their respective counties. I think the hon. member for Huron-Bruce would agree that there are areas of Ontario where there would be a greater need and application of ARDA than there would be in the area that he represents or that I represent. This is just logical.

In connection with the Bruce county pasture, frankly last summer my deputy and the director of ARDA visited the area and were greatly impressed with the possibilities of the establishment of a community pasture. The project was, as my hon. friend suggested, approved by both governments—federal and provincial—and the project was turned over to The Department of Public Works to go ahead and acquire the land. Unfortunately for the project, we found that it is virtually impossible to get 700 or 800 acres of land in one block without disturbing active and successful farm units, and this defeats the purpose of the project.

As well, I think my hon. friend knows, even better than I, that land values are increased considerably. The ARDA agreement provides for a maximum of something like $50 an acre for community pasture projects that will be approved, but land values in that area, we understand from reports that have come to us from The Department of Public Works, have gone beyond that. Indeed, I have talked to men from the area who have confirmed this to me, and they say that it is just a plain and simple matter of demand, that land is going up in price. I think one of the reasons for this is the fact that the soils map of Ontario indicates that there is exceedingly good land in the north end of Huron county and in Bruce county.

Brixton clay loam, I believe, is the top quality soil that can be found in Ontario—certainly one of the top quality soils—and as land becomes scarcer and demands for certain crops increase, farmers are finding that this land is available at much less capital investment than it is in other areas of the province, and they are moving in and buying this land.

I know that this is happening, so the fact is that land prices are going up, perhaps as rapidly there as they are in other areas of the province for agricultural purposes, and the simple fact of it is that the land appears to the department to be getting too dear to buy it for community pasture purposes.

Those are the two reasons that it has not moved ahead; first of all, the lack of one large block of acreage and, second, the price of the land itself.

I think that anyone who knows farming—as I am sure my hon. friend does—would realize that there is only one thing that puts land prices up, and that is the need for land, the desire of farmers to buy land. As long as there are people ready to pay that price, nobody is going to sell it for less, naturally.

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Grey South): Mr. Chairman, when the ARDA programme was first launched by the federal government and co-operation was secured from the various provincial governments, I am sure many of us—and I assume the hon. Minister was among that number—felt that this was a vehicle whereby, and through which, there could be effected the rejuvenation of the agricultural fabric in this province.

Now, I am bound to say that in the years that ARDA has been in operation, it has not fulfilled the potential that many of us had in mind for it. I am conscious of the difficulties that are in the path of the hon. Minister as he seeks to secure the maximum from this programme in co-operation with the federal government.

There are two or three things that seem to stand out that I would like the hon. Minister to talk about. First of all, I think he is having difficulty—I would assume that there is difficulty—in formulating an integrated policy among the various members of Cabinet. Each one of the hon. Cabinet Ministers may well have a phase of the ARDA programme within his particular department, and it would call for a real integration among the various portfolios of government in order that the maximum might be realized from this programme.

I would like the hon. Minister to tell the House this afternoon whether such integration has been effected, and whether we can say today that there is no lack of understanding, or no lack of appreciation on the part of the various hon. members of government of the importance of this programme, and of the necessity of all pulling together in order that it might be a success.

The other part that bothers me is this. We have, as the hon. member for York South said so well a few moments ago, these various organizations throughout the province—development organizations. You know, one thing I think we are plagued with in trying to effect a remedy for the conditions that affect agriculture is a multiplicity of organizations. Perhaps we could achieve better effect of what we have in mind by a singleness of purpose directed through one particular channel, so that there would not be this multiplicity of controls, and this diverse interest among various groups and various organizations in the province.

I think the interest of the people back home—and when I say that I say it about the ridings of many of us—in my own particular riding there are many men who are dedicated to the ideal that ARDA can be an effective instrument for good, but the trouble seems to be that nothing comes of it. You go on from month to month and have these meetings and try to sustain the interest, but there is nothing, apparently, of a concrete nature to sustain that interest. What is going to happen unless there is a real drive on this ARDA programme, is that you are going to find these faithful, dedicated people in the various areas of this province will not only lose faith in the programme, but their interest in it will lag to the extent that you are not going to have an effective nucleus from which you can derive the best possible effort. I would think that in this province we have not made the full strides that we could have, and should have, made under ARDA. I would like to know from the hon. Minister if he feels that there is one single factor that has contributed to this lack of full effectiveness as far as ARDA is concerned.

Is it the local people who are to blame? Are they negligent in not putting forth programmes to the central ARDA office? Is the government lax in not giving leadership in these programmes? Where is the kernel, where does the fault lie that gives rise to the assertion that ARDA has not made the progress that it should have made in this province? So far it has fallen far short of the potential visualized for it by those of us in this House, and by farm leaders throughout the length and breadth of the province.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, I always admire the way my hon. friend brings points on which he has deep convictions to the attention of the House. The House will be the poorer when the day ever comes that he is no longer with us, from the standpoint of being able to express—

Mr. MacDonald: That will be a good quote for the Tory campaign.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Well, perhaps it will, but I say this from a personal feeling of friendliness for my hon. friend. That will not at all affect our relationship when it comes to an election.

On the matter of the farm organizations: I notice my hon. friend said there should be less farm organizations, but I did not notice him referring to which ones should be eliminated. Then the conflict that he referred to that is supposed to exist between our departments. I dealt with this, I thought, Mr. Chairman, quite effectively last week when the hon. member for Huron-Bruce raised it in his budget speech on the estimates of The Department of Agriculture, concerning what he pointed out in the federation of agriculture brief to have been this conflict that is supposed to have existed between the departments. At that time, I said that when the federation presented its brief to the Cabinet council that day, I asked the permission of the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Roberts) to inquire what illustration they could give to a breakdown within our departments in communication or barriers, and I was interested to find that they could not give me a single illustration.

I asked also about where reference had been made about barriers between our branches within our own department, and I failed again to get a concrete illustration. So I think if there is such a feeling abroad, then I think it is completely erroneous, because in my humble thinking, the ARDA directorate is one of the smoothest functioning organizations that there is in the Ontario government. It is a complete co-ordination of all the various departments which have to do with the ARDA projects, and it really is dealing with our natural resources in this province.

Now if I may be so bold as to suggest, I would think when my hon. friend refers to the fact that ARDA was held out to be one of the things that would cure all the evils, or a lot of them at least, of agriculture in Ontario, that perhaps this might have been picked up with a bit too much enthusiasm at the time. I would also point out that the present Minister of the federal government in charge of ARDA has seen fit to reorient the terms of reference of ARDA to a different type of agreement that is only applicable in areas that are specified as areas—they were defined, I think, as disadvantage areas in the original concept of the agreement.

I protested vigorously against such terminology because I do not think it is good. We substituted for that "redevelopment areas" and so we were able to move ahead with the Manitoulin Island project, defining Manitoulin as a development area. The 11 counties of eastern Ontario are now to be so defined. And I would think that in these respective areas there are a good many things that can be done to relieve some of the distress that has been experienced by agriculturists.

On the other hand, I hardly think it proper to say that nothing has been done. There are an enormous number of projects under way across Ontario—54, I believe, to be exact. I have them here, but I do not know whether we want to take the time of the House to read them all to you. I could go into them—the community pastures; the alternative uses of land agreement, and listing the various places where this is in operation; the soil and water conservation projects that we have; the research agreements that are going on in certain areas and certain places where we do not have enough information; and one of the most significant aspects of it is our participation in the Canada land inventory, so that we in Canada, on a national basis, will know in each province what we really have as a natural resource, through the various qualities of our soil and its potential.

It could be said, of course, when ARDA was first contemplated, it was going to do a lot to raise prices, and what-have-you. This was never in the concept of ARDA. To me, it is a long-term programme. It involves the philosophy, if you will, towards rural living. It involves the strengthening of rural living, and the acceptance by rural people of a completely changed and new way of life as far as rural Canada is concerned.

There are certain areas where I feel it will have little or no application. On the other hand, I think there are areas where certain things can be done as I mentioned earlier—in the development of industry; in the retraining of people; the acceptance of people of a new way of life, that will perhaps be more remunerative to them than what they have been used to.

I think we must recognize that what we are basically interested in in ARDA is improving the living standards of people, not necessarily on farms, but in the communities across Canada where they have not the advantages of this industrial development and are unable to propel themselves forward on their own motivation without help.

These are the things that I think as a natural process of evolution will gradually develop. These things, where they are now applicable and where they are now in operation, have proven to be of real value. I do not think it matters whether a man makes a dollar from farming or whether he makes it from the tourist industry. If he has some facility on his farm that he can sell to urban people to come out and live in the country and, for instance, enjoy a stream or a place to set up a tent or something like this, to me this is increasing his standard of living and providing services. This, to me, is an illustration of what ARDA should be.

Mr. Oliver: Well, may I ask the hon. Minister, in the new definition that has been given to ARDA, apparently by the federal authorities, will it be a fact that large areas of the province will fail to fit into this definition, and, therefore, the ARDA programme will not be applicable to those particular areas?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I would say that it would have application to what I described as disadvantage areas, or areas of pockets of poverty really, because of climatic conditions, geography. The old self-contained family farm unit in most instances is no longer acceptable as a means of providing a standard of living for the farm community. I think it will be tied largely to that.

But I would think that we are hardly in a position to be able to say that the new ARDA agreement would have general application right across the province. Quite frankly, I do not think this is the case. I have to confess that in my own area where I come from—north Middlesex. I have had to say that really I do not think there is any application of ARDA there. One could hardly describe that as an area that needed that kind of assistance, because we have the type of soil there that is conducive to provide a good—if it is well managed—or reasonable living to farm families.

In other parts of the province, this just does not apply. I think we have to congratulate the federal Minister for applying this philosophy to the ARDA agreement as it will apply across Canada.

There are areas that may stand to benefit more than others, and perhaps rightly so. Perhaps we have to put a lot of this land back into forests; perhaps we have to develop the tourist industry, recreational facilities, and so on.

Then, I think, we can very well take areas of land and assemble them and do the things I have suggested with them, sir, and out of those areas of land take the good arable land, and assemble that in areas that are large enough to provide what might be described as an economic unit, and then allow a farmer to use that land and keep it in agricultural production.

I do not think for one moment that we should take out of production land that is easy to work, that is good land, that has the qualities that are needed for agricultural production. As time goes on, I am satisfied that we will need it all, but I think we have to take a good look at it, and apply ARDA where necessary.

Mr. Oliver: Well, there is just this one observation. There has been difficulty, and I think the hon. Minister will agree, in maintaining an interest on the part of the county committees in some areas, in respect to ARDA, until the present time. Now, if this new conception is applied—and apparently it will be—then I think the hon. Minister will agree with me that there are quite substantial areas of the province that ARDA will not apply to.

If you have not been able to maintain the interest of county committees in the past, when we thought that there were some elements of the ARDA programme that would apply, is the hon. Minister of the mind that there is not very much use in maintaining ARDA committees in these areas that clearly would not fall within the purview of the present ARDA programme?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Well, Mr. Chairman, first of all, I think it should be pointed out emphatically, that the formation of the ARDA committees was established prior to the drafting of the present agreement that is now under discussion. We left it to the respective counties and districts to form their own ARDA committees.

My hon. friend is referring to the projects that have application under the new federal-provincial agreement. But he is a product of rural Ontario, and so am I. I think we have to recognize, and here I want to digress for a moment, Mr. Chairman, if I may, because I think it applies to those things that cannot entirely be associated with the economics of rural living. I think we have to recognize that there is a place for someone in the rural counties of Ontario, not those counties that would come under the application as far as economic help under ARDA is concerned, but for someone in the counties to take a look at the changing life that we see in rural Ontario today. We see so many less farmers than we used to see. We see so many more people living in the rural communities and commuting to work in the urban centres, with industry really carrying them.

This is creating problems. Problems in the rural community, where you have a differing interest that did not exist before. If I may, I think I would like to say it applies to our churches of all denominations in the rural community.

We have the central school. First of all we have the district high schools that came out after the last war and the contribution they made. The yellow school bus became an accepted vehicle on the road and picked up these students and brought secondary education to the door of our rural communities. Then we have the central schools, the consolidated public schools. Here again, we have a new concept in this.

I wonder if it does not apply to more areas than this. We have our women's institutes facing these problems; our junior farmers; our churches, as I mentioned, faced with the problem of wondering what is going to be their future with dwindling congregations and the number of them trying to serve in a given community.

Is the future going to be centralization? You may think this is a queer place to bring this up, in ARDA estimates; but to me it all is associated with rural redevelopment. I think even in counties where there may not be the acceptability, the practical application of the new ARDA agreement there are other matters that are of very great importance and urgency to the local people involved. I think where the local people are involved that the terminology of a local ARDA committee may be somewhat out of place, but I am satisfied there is a need for that kind of a committee to perform a very useful function in those counties and districts.

Now this may not answer my hon. friend's question, but to me it sums up to a degree what I feel we must face over the next 15 or 20 years. I think there will be great changes in rural Ontario. I think we should have people who are interested heading up these co-ordinating talks along these lines.

Mr. Oliver: This is positively my last word on it, but I agree pretty much with what my hon. friend has said, except this: At the moment, as my hon. friend knows, we have the women's institute who are doing a tremendous job of evaluating rural conditions and portraying the farm situation as it appears today. We have the junior farmer organization; we have the horticultural societies; we have the agricultural committee for the county council. I suggest to my hon. friend that there is not any use in us setting up ARDA as a separate organization to do the job that these others are capable of doing. What we should be doing: If ARDA is to have a function in the field that my hon. friend has now talked about, then surely it should be as a co-ordinating body, to bring the views and convictions of all these various groups together so that with one voice they can say what is their opinion in respect to these important matters that my hon. friend has talked about.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Well, of course, Mr. Chairman, the setting up of the ARDA committees was intended to embrace just those organizations you have mentioned; so that we could bring to bear, in one co-ordinated approach, the views of all these organizations. In the committee set-up that was called by the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management (Mr. Simonett) and myself a year ago, we emphasized to the county agricultural committees that they should bring in the services, employ the use, the knowledge, the contacts, of the various organizations my hon. friend has mentioned. We suggested it should embrace all these: the junior farmers, the federation of agriculture, the farmers union, the women's institute, the soil and crop improvement association, the county forestry groups, the conservation authorities, the chambers of commerce—in fact every organization that had an interest in a local community so that we could concentrate their ideas in one co-ordinated approach.

Now, admittedly, there are counties now, under the new ARDA agreement, where actually, as I said, the financial arrangement may not apply. But I think there is a great work for those organization to do in making a co-ordinated approach to these various things. I appreciate the interest in the points which my hon. friend has brought out this afternoon.

Mr. Gaunt: Mr. Chairman, I just want to return to the point that I made in connection with the Bruce county pasture and the comments my hon. friend made. Am I to assume from the hon. Minister's remarks that he feels the establishment of a community pasture in Bruce county is not feasible at this time because of the factors which he mentioned?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, I would not say it was not feasible. I think there is a useful purpose that can be performed by a community pasture in Bruce county; I really do. On the other hand, I think we have to be guided by practical realities. I would not say that the project has been abandoned at all. In fact it is under active consideration, with the thought of trying to acquire a sizeable chunk of land in one block that would make it an effective community pasture.

We are still working on the project and hope that we will be able to establish one but I am afraid that it will not be as large a pasture as we had hoped to establish. We have great visions for Bruce county, quite frankly, but land prices have changed the picture.

When we were there last year, my deputy points out, we had approved it based on the prices that were quoted us and at the time we told them that if prices advanced significantly we just could not go ahead with the project because of the ARDA agreement, the fact that we are restricted in that agreement.

I do not think that it was because it was a government pasture, I think it was because a great many people have moved into the area and land prices have gone up. The per acre value of land increased to the point where it is no longer practical from our standpoint, to go as large as we were contemplating. Now, on the other hand, I hope we will be able to go ahead. It certainly is not abandoned by any means.

Vote 103 agreed to.

On vote 104:

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Chairman, on vote 104, while normally I hesitate to enter the debate on these estimates because this field is not one in which I am most knowledgeable, my particular attention was addressed to some of the problems that face the milk industry when I had occasion to read Mr. Hennessey's report made to the government.

In his report, where he deals with cheese production and marketing, he deals with two matters that have aroused my very substantial concern. I am not even going to attempt to deal with some of the more technical branches that affect the industry, I know my hon. colleagues will handle that very well, but there are two matters that concern me very much and those are Mr. Hennessey's references: First of all to the letting of tenders for the Belleville warehouse; and second, to the question of the search of title of the Oxford station purchase.

I am sure that the hon. Minister knows that on page 102 of his report Mr. Hennessey deals at some length with the question of the letting of tenders. He is of the opinion, and I share his opinion, that in a matter of at least quasi public jurisdiction, as the affairs of this body are—and I deliberately say of at least quasi public concern because the province of Ontario pays a substantial sum annually to the board, and then one of the exhibits attached to this report I think shows that one of the assets of the board is the sum of $450,000 which it received from the province of Ontario.

I say that when we have established this, then it becomes obvious that all of the people of Ontario are interested in the manner in which public money is spent. Apparently the board was going to build a warehouse at Belleville, and they approached two people in 1961, or two concerns, Finlay W. MacLaughlin Limited and another firm, Wilfred Spencer and Sons.

Now Finlay W. MacLaughlin Limited were asked, as I read this report, to submit a bid based on a steel beam type of building. They submitted a bid and their bid was somewhere in the vicinity of a quarter of a million dollars. About the same time, or a little later, Wilfred Spencer and Sons submitted a bid which was somewhere around $125,000, but was based on a cement block building.

Apparently no action was taken at all until two or three years after the original request to Finlay W. MacLaughlin and to the Spencer Company for bids, and then at the later time the contract was awarded to the Spencer Company.

The point that Mr. Hennessey raises—and I think it a very valid point—is that first of all there is no public call for tenders. There was an invitational call for tenders, and apparently given only to two firms, and given to those two firms on a different basis.

The Finlay MacLaughlin request for a tender was given on the basis of a very expensive type of steel beam construction, and the Spencer request for a tender was given on a cheaper type of construction, a brick block, with other little things that go in it in one case and do not go in it in another. So that when the time came to let the contract, there was only one firm apparently before the board that the board was prepared to consider.

I suggest that this is a very poor way to carry on this type of business. There is, Mr. Chairman, public money being spent, and there is no indication at all to the board, and there is no indication given to Mr. Hennessey as to any real investigation having been made into the question of competitive prices; into the question of getting the best price and the best method of construction achieved for this public body.

I ask the hon. Minister—and he has had an opportunity of reading this report, I know that, and of examining the various appendices that are attached to it—what does he propose to do about it, because I think this is a very poor way to carry on public business? Anything that comes within the control of this government should be done in a method that commends itself to the colleague who sits beside him—the hon. Minister of Highways (Mr. MacNaughton).

We had occasion to point out to the hon. Minister of Highways that if this was the way he built highways, there would have been quite a different approach taken to his colleague, the hon. Minister of Agriculture, when his estimates came before the House. On the basis of the record as produced in the Hennessey report, there is no excuse for this method of carrying on business, and we want to know what is going to be done about it.

The second point, is the purchase of the Oxford station property. That is dealt with substantially on page 103. My hon. colleague says it is a question of whether or not it is purchased with public money, but the fact is that public money and public legislation creates this board and allows it to function. I admit that the money is part of the money put up by the producers and so on, but nevertheless there is at least, Mr. Chairman, a trusteeship resting on the shoulders of my friend, the hon. Minister of Agriculture. He should be so anxious to make sure that everything is properly done that he should never allow a series of events such as this to take place.

Now what happened in the purchase of the Oxford station property? For some reason, even though they had lawyers, Spragge and Cameron, who are solicitors in Belleville, who were retained to assist them in the purchase, they told those lawyers that they did not want them to search the title. And the lawyers said: "Now this is a strange way of doing business and we don't like it, and in order that we won't get into trouble, we ask you, Mr. Chairman of the board, to give us those instructions in writing." These are the instructions in writing that were given:

I, the undersigned—and this is addressed to Spragge and Cameron, barristers and solicitors at Belleville:

I, the undersigned, being chairman of the Ontario cheese producers marketing board, do hereby specifically instruct Messrs. Spragge and Cameron to make absolutely no searches whatsoever of any kind in connection with this transaction. And I hereby acknowledge that I have been specifically advised by Mr. A. B. Spragge of Spragge and Cameron that searches should be made.

In other words, the lawyers said: "You should make searches to be careful in order that you know what kind of property you are buying."

And I do further acknowledge Messrs. Spragge and Cameron are not responsible for title or anything arising out of the transaction.

Well, having gone that far, I wonder why they bothered to retain lawyers at all. Merely to give them that kind of instruction they might just as well have taken the deeds themselves and registered them themselves and forgotten about it.

In witness thereof the corporate seal of Ontario cheese producers marketing board has been hereunto affixed and attested by the hands of its duly authorized officials.

It is signed "H. C. Arnold, chairman" and it is also signed by Allan B. Spragge, whom I presume is the senior partner of Spragge and Cameron.

In addition to that, Mr. Chairman, as this matter is discussed through the report, there is a reference to this matter coming before a subsequent executive meeting of the board, and the chairman points out that there has been some question as to whether or not a part of this Oxford landing property is in fact railroad land to which they could not acquire property.

Through this whole document, I have not been able to find the answer. I do not know whether they got a deed to all the land they were supposed to or not; whether the railroad owned part of it or not. But it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, a most unusual, a most careless, a most irresponsible way of carrying on business of a public body in the province of Ontario, that when they go out and purchase land to the value of $60,000-odd; when they retain lawyers they so instruct the lawyers to take no action, that they might just as well not have retained the lawyers. Anyone buying a piece of real estate—and farmers above all, Mr. Chairman—would be more knowledgeable and concerned about this than anybody else; would make sure that when they bought a piece of land for which they spent good money, that they would make absolutely certain that they were getting what they bought. And the only way to ascertain this is to have a proper search of the title made.

Somewhere in these minutes, Mr. Chairman, there is a reference to the fact that the colleagues of the chairman on the board thank him and his associate, who is the general manager, for searching the title and they take their advice in regard to it. I do not know what qualifications the chairman of the board may have had for searching a title, or his associates on the board. If they did have any qualifications, this is all to the good, but even so, Mr. Chairman, they are still acting in a public capacity.

If they did have any qualifications and they were prepared to accept their own judgment insofar as their own personal purchases were concerned, all well and good. But they were not dealing with their own money; they were dealing with public money in a very substantial sense, and they had no right at all to take it upon themselves to certify the title, which is, in fact, what they did.

They had the responsibility of going to lawyers and they did go to lawyers—they retained lawyers. They had the responsibility of going to someone who could certify the title for them. I do not know what they paid the lawyers for this service, but they probably paid them the usual tariff fee which would involve the certification of title, and the responsibility for any faults in the title being transferred from them to the lawyer, but that is not the issue at all.

The issue is in dealing with public money of this sort, I say that this is no way at all to carry on public business and there is no reason at all why this should have continued. I ask the hon. Minister, in regard to this second question, what is he going to do about it?

In addition, if he says it is too late, it is gone, can the hon. Minister tell us with any positiveness today that the board, or on behalf of whoever the property was bought, did in fact get a good title? Does anyone know? Does the railway have any claim to any portion of these lands? Was there a portion of these lands for which a deed was not available? Did anybody get a survey? Did they see that the buildings that were on the land were within the boundaries of those lands and that sort of thing? Was this record followed up? If so, what follow-up steps have been taken?

I think, Mr. Chairman, those questions demand a most clear answer from the hon. Minister.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, I welcome the intrusion of legal advice in the debate on our Department of Agriculture. In connection with this particular matter, it has been of concern, admittedly, as far as we are concerned, to have this report as it has been submitted concerning these two deals covering the purchases of these two properties in the province.

First of all, I would be the first to say that in a strictly legal sense the hon. member for Downsview has a valid point; in effect he is quite correct in what he has said. There should have been a search of the titles, I do not think we would deny that. The tender call perhaps should have been made; but I would like to point out, and this is where my hon. friend and I may differ in our attitudes to accomplishing things as far as rural ways of doing business are concerned.

Mr. Arnold and the cheese board directors, all of them being farmers and rural men, knew the property with which they were dealing. In connection with the erection for the Belleville warehouse, the Spencer firm was widely known as having had a great deal of experience in the construction of cheese plants and cooling areas—curing rooms I should say—and as such the cheese board sought their advice. I think they were perhaps more interested in getting the advice of Spencer and Company in the construction of the warehouse than they were in calling competitive tenders.

I will admit the foregoing quite frankly. My hon. friend has said that there should have been tenders called, that they were in effect dealing with public money. To a degree it might be considered public money because through legislation they have the right to deduct the levy that builds these warehouses. On the other hand they are responsible to the cheese producers who employ them. As far as our department is concerned we have examined these charges that have been made here, and while we would be the first to admit that the deals were not as orthodox as they might be, we have not found the slightest evidence of any skulduggery on anyone's part and have not found that the cheese producers in any way have not gotten value for their money.

Now, as to the question of the searching of the title for the property that was obtained at the Oxford station plant: I discussed this with Mr. Arnold myself at some length—I have not got the letter which he sent me with me—but in it he sets out, as he did in our verbal conversation, the background of all this.

It had been owned by a family for two generations, I believe, before this purchase was made—by the Sanderson Company—and it was an understood fact that some of it was on railroad property. It had been so constructed for its accessibility to the track. This is common practice for buildings to be constructed on railway property for their accessibility to the railway, there was nothing wrong in this. It had been there for all these years, and while the railway owned the property the company owned the buildings and the man was buying the buildings, not the property.

There is where the difference came in; there was absolutely nothing wrong with it. I suppose in a strict court of law one should have had the thing all set out clearly, but there was really nothing wrong with the deal.

In our loans that are made to co-ops, many of these co-ops have their property—elevators and grain pipes, grain legs and mills—on railway property in order that they have accessibility to the line. Of course there is an agreement, that we asked for with the railway, giving them a 99-year lease for their right to the railway to cover the period of the mortgage that we give them on the co-op vote.

In this particular case, Mr. Arnold told me that as far as the Sandersons were concerned, those buildings had been there for years and had never been any problem. They felt that it was hardly worthwhile, I think he said, spending between $3,000 and $4,000 of the cheese producers' money, to search the title and to get the agreement all straightened out and to survey the lot as it was being acquired.

Frankly, our dairy branch people have examined all this and they are perfectly satisfied that there is nothing really wrong. But I have to confess, as I said earlier, that it was something less than an orthodox type of arrangement.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I was very interested to hear the hon. Minister's explanation. The hon. Minister said that he is satisfied that there is no skulduggery. I do not think that Mr. Hennessey suggested that there was any skulduggery; he suggested that this was an unusual, or to use the hon. Minister's phrase "an unorthodox," method of procedure.

He said he was satisfied that it was not a bad deal. This may well be; but I am suggesting, Mr. Chairman, that because of the public nature of this organization that there is no real method of satisfying the people who are participants in the organization that this is the best deal they could have gotten. It may be that the people who built the building built the best building that was possible, in the best and most economical methods; but even the approach of asking two companies to put in tenders and putting them in on a different basis, you cannot compare steel beam construction with cement block construction.

There may have been a dozen companies that would have been anxious to tender and it may have been that the company which finally built the building would have gotten it in any event, but it would seem to me that it should be the rule and not the exception that when public funds are being handled that every step is taken to satisfy those persons who are concerned with that money that their interests are being protected.

I have argued on many occasions that a tender need not necessarily be awarded to the lowest tenderer. There are people on the job, and perhaps the gentleman to whom my hon. friend refers, could say that contractor "Z", who might have put in a tender, is not the sort of fellow we would ever want to build anything for us, even though his tender was the lowest. But they had no opportunity to get a feeling as to what the position was. Somebody went to MacLaughlin—surely MacLaughlin did not put in a bid out of the air—and they asked him to put in a bid on the basis of steel beam construction, so the price was almost double what the Spencer Company put in. How could anybody really tell?

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that unless they are doing business privately they have no right to act in the way they did.

Insofar as the title is concerned, I am more surprised than ever really. My hon. friend tells me that this property was owned by the same family for several generations. He is not a legal man and he would not be aware that one of the most complicated situations you can come across insofar as title to real estate is concerned is when a property has been in the same family for a series of generations; because families have a habit of splitting up and producing all sorts of children who live in all parts of the world, families have a habit of not leaving wills and there are all sorts of complications you can get into when a piece of property is owned by several generations of the same family. I suggest to you that the chairman of this board and his general manager, without looking at the title and without being able to bring legal intelligence to an analysis of the family breakdown, whether the property had been left from A to B in a will, whether the various people who were the nominal head of the family acquired title to it properly, whether there were infant children, whether the official guardian could have been involved; I suggest to you that unless these things were investigated, nobody could be sure—least of all, as far as I can tell, the chairman of the board and his assistant, the general manager—could be possibly aware whether or not the title could have been conveyed to them by the people to whom they gave the money.

Now my hon. friend says, in addition: Yes, there was some railway property involved and there was a building on the railway property. Well, my trite understanding of the law in that regard is that if I build a building on your property, I lose title to it and you gain it. Now, if somebody put a building on the railroad property, it would seem to me that the building belonged to the railroad and not to the people who put the building on it. It would seem to me that that would cause great concern to the milk board, who were paying out the 30-odd thousand dollars to the apparent owner, the representative of the family who had been there for several years.

I would be awfully concerned about paying out money to X, who says yes, do not worry about it, the railroad has that piece of land but the railroad has never bothered me. It may well be that the railroad has a claim against the board, but nobody has bothered to ascertain that.

My hon. friend talks about a 99-year lease. Certainly arrangements might have been made; maybe there was a written lease, maybe there was an unwritten lease. Maybe there was some arrangement with the railroad, but nobody has been able to tell us. My friend the hon. Minister has investigated and he cannot tell us this afternoon. Now insofar as spending $3,000 or $4,000, as these minutes unfold, it seems to me there were two parts to the purchase. The total price paid for the Uxbridge station property was $60,000, which is broken down into two parts, $32,000-odd for the property, and $27,000-odd for the equipment.

Insofar as the legal fees are concerned, the tariff in the county of York—and I would not imagine it is too different from the tariff in this county, which is the county of Grenville—is one and a quarter per cent of the purchase price and if you figure out one and a quarter per cent of $30,000, you have got $400 at the most. How did you get up to $3,000 or $4,000 for the legal fee? If you can get that job done in Toronto for something under $500, why is it going to cost $3,000 or $4,000 in the county of Grenville?

The story that my friend tells, just does not hold water. I would be very concerned today, if a client of mine owned a piece of property which might have come through several generations, and there might be all sorts of relatives all over the world claiming bits and pieces, and where somebody thinks that a particular building which they thought they purchased is on railroad property and the railroad does not worry about it—I would be very, very concerned about it. And I would suggest this was a thorough-going bad deal. There is no way of explaining this, even at this late date, other than for the hon. Minister to take the advice of Mr. Hennessey, take over trusteeship of this board, have the trustee, whoever he is, go in and hire a lawyer and get him to look at the title and see if he cannot clear it up.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, there are three topics I would like to raise in this vote, and the first is the one that has been under discussion.

I think the hon. Minister has let it be clearly known in the House that he does not defend what went on.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: He does not what?

Mr. MacDonald: He does not defend what went on in the way of unorthodox business procedures, and this raises a point that I would like to emphasize, because I think we are heading for trouble if we do nothing more than we have done up until now. There was a great deal of indignation in farm circles—in dairy circles, not just restricted to cheese producers—with regard to what they felt was Professor Hennessey's straying from his original terms of reference of dealing with marketing, when he went off onto administrative procedures. There may be something in this!

However, I think the basic point is that one runs into serious danger if one begins to operate a public business in the same fashion as one might, or as one is entitled to run it, as an individual. Now the hon. Minister said farmers and rural folk have certain ways of doing things and sometimes they get it done just as well—it does not cost any more, and so on. This is true. There is many a problem solved by bale wire back on the farm, that is not very defensible if you want to examine it in a strictly scientific or mechanical way, but it gets done, but I do not think this approach is going to solve the problem.

For example, I remember years ago when we got into quite a tangle in this House with regard to unorthodox business procedures in the Niagara parks commission, and the Prime Minister of the day said: "Well let us not get too excited, you see, down in the Niagara peninsula everybody considers the Niagara parks commission as a family business, sort of a family affair."

Well, it is all very fine to run a family business as a family business, but if it is a public concern, you are going to get into difficulties. Indeed, there was a gentleman by the name of Gordon Laverne, who ran the city of Eastview as though it were a family business, and I would like anybody on the other side of the House to get up and defend what happened there when he ran city affairs like he ran his haberdashery, on sort of a Harry S. Truman approach of do as you are inclined each day, to meet the problems of the day, so that the money out of the parking meters was put in a drawer and used for pretty cash and so on.

I do not think this can be tolerated and I do not think it should be tolerated even in the instance of the cheese board. I say this, out of an interest for the people involved in the cheese board, rather than being critical of them. They are going to get into serious trouble if they pursue this kind of unorthodox procedure, and they have enough problems in marketing cheese without getting into the cross-currents of this kind of a battle, and the suggestion that they should be put under trusteeship.

Indeed, I put this question to the hon. Minister. We have had many an argument, the hon. Minister and I, as to the validity of the Ontario farm products marketing board, moving in on the day-to-day operations of a local marketing board. And the hon. Minister has come to the conclusion since that iniquitous bill of yesteryear, that it is the right of the marketing board to move in and dictate how money shall be spent, how it shall be raised, and how the marketing board shall proceed.

The thing that puzzles me is, why did the marketing board in this instance not intervene; because even I would be on the hon. Minister's side on this kind of a thing. When any marketing body begins to operate a public body as though it were its own little family farm, and follows what the hon. Minister described as unorthodox business procedures, then I think it would be very legitimate for the Ontario farm products marketing board—since presumably they follow the business closely enough to be aware of this—to step in and say: Do not get yourself into unnecessary trouble; if you are going to build a building, call tenders in the way that is normally done when you are handling public funds.

I am curious to know whether or not the Ontario farm products marketing board was aware of this; if they were not, why they were not, and if they were aware of it, why they did not, in effect, exercise the powers that this government saw fit to give them, in intervening in this instance, to get this organization back onto normal procedures.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, first of all, in connection with the jurisdiction of the farm products marketing board, the board has nothing to do with this particular case. This came under the jurisdiction of the milk industry board—this is a cheese marketing board. Now, I do not say that critically, it is just a matter of jurisdiction.

Mr. MacDonald: Have they the same powers? They have.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: They certainly, I think, would have the same powers if they were to exercise them. Now, as for the matter that has been raised here, as mentioned earlier by the hon. member for Downsview—that this in effect should not have really happened without the proper steps having been taken—with this I would have to agree. On the other hand it was done and accomplished before it ever came to the attention of the milk industry board.

I am advised by the dairy commissioner that an examination was made of everything that had been done, and it appears, having been a fait accompli, that there was little that could be done. There appeared to be no real harm done to anybody and there was no indication that somebody got a payoff, or anything like this and so we just let the matter rest.

I would have to agree that perhaps the milk industry board should have moved in this particular instance and said, "No, we are going to negate the deal until everything is cleared up to everyone's satisfaction and is legally done." This may have cleared up some things that the hon. member for Downsview raised. It is quite a legitimate argument.

On the other hand if we had required this board to spend a certain number of dollars, whatever it may be—and Mr. Arnold advises me it would have been over $3,000—to have done all the things that were suggested—this may be a debatable figure, it might have been more, it might have been less, I do not know, but whatever the figure may be, the cheese producers marketing board would have been required to foot the bill. And if everything had turned out to be in order, as we think it is, and they had had to pay the bill, somebody would have turned around and said, "Well, that is what your milk industry board does, it causes us to pay good money out for no particular reason."

I agree with my hon. friend that some of us in the country may be used to doing things in a more or less haphazard way; we get things accomplished and it is our own business if we fail or if we lose. But certainly when it is public business you have to do things in a different way, so there is no argument there. But on the other hand, I do not think there is a great deal more that can be done. I would point out to the hon. member that while it is recommended in the Hennessy report that a trusteeship be established to take over the operation of the Ontario cheese producers marketing board, there does not exist under the present Milk Industry Act the authority to do just that. But that authority does exist in The Farm Products Marketing Act, and I point out the jurisdictional difference.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, Mr. Chairman, just as a final comment on this. Personally, I would not go as far as the hon. member for Downsview in saying that it should be a trusteeship, I think this is a cure that is almost worse than the disease. I agree that I do not think any conflict of interest, or anything unsavoury took place in this instance, it is just business practice that should not be repeated, and perhaps a reading of this debate by all concerned, and some exercise by the milk commission in the future—because this body would fall under that jurisdiction—will meet the situation.

The second point that I wanted to raise, Mr. Chairman, in this vote is that I was very interested when we had testimony before the standing committee on the milk bill, to listen to Mr. Laverne Dymont, the president of the whole milk league, make a plea for sound quality regulations and strict enforcement of them with regard to fluid milk.

I assume that if the president of the whole milk league comes before the government in the standing committee and says they want sound quality regulations and strict enforcement, he is doing this because he feels that the regulations are perhaps not all they should be at the moment, or the enforcement is perhaps not all that it should be at the moment. Otherwise, I do not know why he would raise the issue at the present time. Clearly his plea was motivated by discussions revolving around the new milk bill.

I come back to this because when I was speaking on second reading, I made the suggestion to the hon. Minister that there may well be up to ten per cent—and I said “up to ten per cent”—of the present fluid producers who were not really meeting the standards and the hon. Minister for one moment got out his little soap box and delivered a political speech to the effect that the consumers of the province of Ontario could be assured that they had milk that was of the highest quality, and so on.

Now, let us deal with the facts, Mr. Chairman, and I know that when I am presenting this it is a matter of interest not only among members of the whole milk league, but among some officials of his own department. I will not name them and thereby embarrass either them or the hon. Minister, but what are the facts?

I was interested to discover that last year there were 103,515 bacteria samples taken and tested; 84.62 per cent graded 1; 8.81 per cent graded 2; 4.6 per cent graded 3; 1.96 per cent graded 4. So you had 5.56 per cent of those tested below the level that is tolerable and, therefore, they were cut off.

Now 5.6 per cent of 10,000 farmers is 560. Indeed, the further figures I got from the hon. Minister's department, figures that are public information, is that 265 were shut off—and another 11 because their premises did not meet the standards.

I think I would like to have the hon. Minister's comment now, with the political podium set aside, on why the whole milk league is asking for some quality regulations and stricter enforcement; and whether or not it may not be true that if we are looking for opportunities to integrate concentrated milk producers who are producing grade A milk into the pool—into the top price—that there is not an area here of people who are now in it but who should be forced out under these regulations. I wonder if the hon. Minister would care to speak on this.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, I am shocked to think anyone would think I would climb up on a political soap box. I have never done that.

I would like to say this in connection with these points the hon. member has raised. First of all, this is a resazurin test and I assume this is a report of the resazurin tests. This includes the heating of milk, as I understand it, after it is cooled.

I think one of the things that has happened is that our bulk tanks cool milk so quickly and bring it down to such a temperature level that you cannot get an accurate test. So they re-heat it, bring it up and activate some of the bacteria that might be there so it will show up in the test. So it is a very strict test, much more strict and accurate than that pertaining to some other classes of milk. I think it is an indication of the very, very high quality of milk that is provided in the province of Ontario.

In connection with this 5.5 per cent—I believe that was the figure the hon. member raised—which had been turned down, or where they had to correct the situation before they could ship again. This may only have been a temporary affair for a day or two. I have known of some cases where something has gone wrong and the farm owner himself could not find the reason.

I can think of one particular herd where a very great problem developed, and it is probably one of the finest milk-producing farms in the province of Ontario. Yet a problem developed on that farm, and it took a great deal of research to finally locate what the trouble was. It turned out to be a feed problem, of all things.

So you see, there are things that can develop that will shut a man off from access to the market; that may be of a purely temporary nature and does not necessarily mean that he generally produces a low quality of milk.

I would not for a minute suggest that there are not some farms in Ontario where perhaps they are producing milk that is not of the quality that we would like it to be. Our Ontario Department of Agriculture dairy branch is taking over from the various health units across the province who were charged previously with the responsibility of administering quality standards on the various farms. We have seen that their standards were somewhat different to the standards of The Department of Agriculture, and they are coming up to our standards now.

But here again I think we must recognize that it is a process of development, education and showing reasons why these things should be done, and always bearing in mind that it is a quality product that engenders confidence and further sale of the product. So while these points that my hon. friend raised are valid to a degree, I still go back to the statement that the consumer public of the province of Ontario are offered a very high quality and a very safe product to use.

Mr. MacDonald: I am not disputing for a moment that they are not generally in the overwhelming majority getting it, but it is just this thin edge of danger. Indeed, this test must be a pretty strict one because grade 2 is acceptable, and after you have been shut off, I understand you have to get back to grade 1 before they put you back on again. There must be a margin of error there beyond which there is no danger, otherwise, I am certain that the dairy branch would not be tolerating it.

There is a third point, Mr. Chairman, that I would like to raise with the hon. Minister—

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, before you go on to another point, my deputy advises me that the dairy commissioner has suggested to him that in this connection, because there were some who could not correct, or who would not correct—whichever may be the case—there were at least 277 producers who were shut off completely from the fluid market last year. So that is an indication of the effectiveness of the testing programme, and the teeth that are really in the Act that says, "Produce quality or else."

Mr. MacDonald: I thank the hon. Minister for that, because he now really underlines the point that I was going to say later, that he has shut off 277, and that opens the doors to 277 concentrated producers of grade

1 milk who can come right in. Whether or not you can do that every year I do not know, but as Laverne Dymont is saying that he wants sound quality regulations and strict enforcement, I read that as suggesting he thinks there may be 277 each year.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I think the point that we want to be sure about though, is that this milk is not reaching the market; that it is being shut right off.

Mr. MacDonald: The third point that I want to raise, Mr. Chairman, flows out of the milk bill, but I think it is a policy issue. I raised it before, but the hon. Minister evaded any comment on it. I think it is a point that should be brought out. I do not use the word "evaded" in any nasty sense; he just missed replying to that one question among many that I gave him.

I am informed that in British Columbia, in the Fraser valley, after some years of negotiation the milk producers there did succeed in getting Ottawa to contribute to their pool a certain amount of money. This, in effect, goes into the fluid milk pool and assisted in bringing in grade A producers who were not in the fluid milk pool to begin with.

Now, if I can illustrate my point: If we are faced with the problem in the establishment of the new milk set-up here and the pool—if I can use that term that there seems to be a tendency to shy away from a bit—but if we are faced with a situation in which, across the board, approximately 70 per cent of the milk produced by the full milk league membership is getting top price and 30 per cent is going into manufacturing, if you can get Ottawa to contribute to that pool so that you have a 60-40 basis, that means that you can bring in pretty quickly—you can hasten the process of bringing in—concentrated producers. It will not mean any more out of the pocket of Ottawa because if they remain as concentrated producers they are eligible for a subsidy.

Would the hon. Minister indicate whether or not, since this kind of an arrangement has been worked out in British Columbia, we are pursuing it to get the same kind of a subsidy into our grade 1, grade A milk pool here, as the new commission is established and gets under operation, so that it will hasten, in an orderly way, the bringing in of the grade A shippers without wrecking the market for those who are in it now?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, I welcome what the hon. member has said. This is a point of difference that we have with the present Ottawa government. The Ottawa government does pay to the British Columbia pool a subsidy on surplus milk over and above the ratio of surplus fluid milk that pertains in Ontario and Quebec. Why they chose us I do not know, but they seem to use us as a barometer for their payments in British Columbia. There is now 28.5 per cent surplus; so they will not pay on the first 28 per cent surplus in British Columbia, but on any over and above that they do pay into the British Columbia pool. It is complicated, but this, I understand, is the policy in British Columbia.

When we were in Ottawa on numerous occasions we discussed this very point before we brought in the new Milk Act here. We have not yet agreed on it. We would like the Ottawa government to pay to the pool that would be established in Ontario, through the marketing board under the commission, a subsidy on surplus milk production that would be used for manufacturing purposes; but they have not agreed to do this as yet.

We feel frankly that they should do this. I welcome what the hon. member has said because he has agreed completely with the arguments that we have advanced at Ottawa along this line. I think if they would, it would hasten the day when we could bring in many more of the top quality manufactured milk shippers in Ontario. But until we have that assurance from Ottawa, it puts us in a position of jeopardy, as I see it, to let in a huge flow of milk that is not already in the fluid market. As I said earlier in debates in the House, one can only sell so much fluid milk in Ontario. We can try to increase it, but we do not want to get ourselves into a position where we pull the whole market down for everybody.

This is a point, as I say, that we are trying to work out. I am hopeful that something satisfactory will be worked out but Ottawa's argument has been that Ontario and Quebec are where the manufacturing industry is centred really. We have the facilities to produce here and perhaps this is where that milk production should remain, but they said there should be a substantial price paid for manufacturing milk; with this I must agree.

I think the real problem is this. If that price for manufactured milk could be raised up to where it becomes satisfactory to the manufacturing milk producer, then I think he is going to lose some of his enthusiasm for getting over into the fluid market. This is something I hope—

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, let me say this in conclusion: On the assumption that the people at Ottawa are completely reasonable and on the assumption that Harry Hays is really interested in stabilizing the dairy industry in this province—on the first assumption I am not completely convinced, but on the second, I am.

I do not know why Ottawa would hesitate. As I understand it, and the hon. Minister has given me one more wrinkle on it, a new sort of medium—I did not realize that they calculated milk subsidies as they calculate Dominion-provincial grants, they do it on the basis of Ontario being the yardstick, this is a new revelation—but on the assumption that this is the case, then Ottawa is not going to be out of pocket.

It is a case of instead of giving it to people who are considered to be concentrated milk producers, they would give it to a pool which will enable concentrated milk producers to come into the pool, as I understand it. Therefore, it would seem to me that it would just help to stabilize the whole dairy industry, which is the publicly expressed objective of the hon. Harry Hays. I would think that the hon. Minister and Harry Hays should go to a barbecue and get some of the famous "kickaboo juice" that they had at the barbecue out in Alberta and settle this little point quickly without any further delay.

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): You will have to get another Minister of Agriculture; he will not drink it.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): I would like to ask the hon. Minister one or two questions about the dairy branch. Previously, in a discussion on the responsibilities of the new milk commission that would be constituted by the bill before the Legislature and its relationship with the field men named in the commission, the hon. Minister said that he felt the commission itself had to be made up of civil servants because those working for them would have civil servant capacities. I understand, in my reading of Mr. Hennessey's report, that he recommended that those doing the field work in the dairy branch would be transferred to the jurisdiction of the commission. I would like the hon. Minister, if he would, to clear that point up for us.

Second, I was wondering what provision has been made in these estimates for meeting the cost of the commission as it would gradually come into being in the year ahead? I realize that this is up perhaps $180,000 over last year—I am not sure of the exact amount—but whether this would meet the increased costs as envisaged by the Act is something of which I am not sure. I would appreciate it if the hon. Minister would give us some information on this.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: First of all, I may be guilty for the misunderstanding the hon. member has concerning the entire composition of the milk commission being civil servants. If I left that impression, it is a wrong one. I have said that the chairman of the milk commission should be a civil servant, but not necessarily the members, Mr. Chairman.

As far as the transfer of the dairy branch staff is concerned, Professor Hennessey did recommend that in his report. We intend to implement this. The dairy branch staff will be, in effect, the arm of the milk commission, but they will still be retained as civil servants because I think we cannot divorce our responsibility to the dairy industry. When you come into the matter of inspection, as was mentioned and discussed a few moments ago, we get into pretty vital points that I think must be under the jurisdiction of this Legislature and under the Minister responsible to the House and the public.

The other point the hon. member raised was on the funds to administer this. The general idea of the new Milk Act is that it become self-supporting as soon as possible, but in this transitional period there will be necessity for funds. I am sure the hon. member will appreciate that when we drafted the estimates, this was done last fall before we had the report submitted even. We have not got enough funds, admittedly, for this transitional period. So I would propose, with the concurrence of the House, Mr. Chairman, that we would introduce an amendment to the House in committee stage providing for an amendment in The Milk Act to pay funds out of the consolidated revenue fund for the transitional period. Now it only amounts to a few thousand dollars in our estimate, about $30,000, in addition to what is covered here. It may not be necessary to even use that, but we wanted to have it included. I appreciate my hon. friend raising the question.

Mr. Nixon: There was also some reference in the milk report, we might as well apply it wherever possible since it is now available, that in the dairy branch itself there was not sufficient staff to accomplish the inspections that would be necessary. He made some reference to the staffing in the dairy branch and he felt that there had been some considerable difficulty in the period under which he had the opportunity to observe it in operation. Would the hon. Minister say that this difficulty had been corrected, or would he wait for the transition to correct it?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: We have taken on eight new inspectors since the beginning of 1965, this spring. As you know, last spring we took on a group of inspectors. We have taken on another group now, and as the need continues we will have to expand the service. But I would think that with the general acceptance of, and the educational programme that is going on towards, the improvement of quality standards on the various farms there may not necessarily be the need for increasing that inspection staff.

I think once you reach a satisfactory standard, then it is a matter of just following that standard. But, as I say, we have increased the staff, and this year we have 76 inspectors compared to 45 in 1962. That is quite a sizeable increase.

Mr. Nixon: Mind you, that change in staff was accompanied by the assumption of considerably more responsibility. Dairies used to have this responsibility, and the municipalities to a lesser extent.

Mr. Gaunt: Mr. Chairman, I just want to ask a couple of questions on this vote. Two years ago, I believe, the department instigated the quality cream control programme. It started out as a pilot project at that time, and I believe it was extended last year. I would just like to ask my hon. friend if he intends to extend this right across the province in the coming years.

The second point that I want to deal with is in connection with the mastitis programme. Mastitis, of course, as we all know, is very costly to the farmers in this province, indeed, across Canada. I believe that the figures are something like $25 million to $30 million in terms of cost to the farmer, certainly a very sizeable chunk of money in anybody's language.

I would like to ask my hon. friend if he has anything planned, in addition to what is already being done, to control this disease further. I am thinking in terms of research, or any other programme that he might have in mind in this connection.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: In reply to the first question concerning cream quality, this pilot project was so successful that it is being broadened across the province in other areas, so that it will become more effective. It is done on the same basis as the cream producers contributing toward the cost of this quality programme, and I want to pay tribute to the Ontario cream producers marketing board for what they have done to improve their own position.

The quality improvement of cream has lent itself to the greatly improved quality of butter being produced. In fact, one of the creameries in the area where the quality programme was in effect, had the grand champion lot of butter in one of the recent exhibitions here, an international exhibition. This gives one an indication of the effectiveness of the programme. This is being extended across Ontario in the chief cream producing areas. So it is a most satisfactory programme, a most rewarding programme, and I pay public compliment to those who are associated with it.

With regard to the mastitis control project, this is one that should rightfully come up in the veterinary services branch, but I do not hesitate to deal with it here. If you would like to raise it when we get there, it will be fine.

Mr. Gaunt: Whatever you wish.

Vote 104 agreed to.

On vote 105:

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, on vote 105, just a word about the services rendered by our agricultural representatives at the county level. You will notice, if you will glance at the first page of the estimates, a large number of associations supported by the government. As well as these, there are many organizations associated with agriculture in every community.

I do not know whether it is true with every agricultural representative—I believe it is—that they wind up acting as secretaries of countless organizations in the community, and night after night, particularly during the wintertime, they are at annual meetings or other meetings of these various associations.

Frankly, I think if this can be financed, it is a good thing. There is somebody in the community with a continuing interest in agriculture, who more or less can co-relate the activities and projects right through the list.

On the other hand, it is a trial that must be almost more than bearable for some of the agricultural representatives. And it seems to me that it would be worthwhile having some sort of study done, in order to determine whether their time might not better be used in working with the farmers in the field, rather than having to accept this almost overwhelming responsibility.

I know in many cases, certainly in our case in Brant, both sides of the job are done very well indeed. As a matter of fact, our own agricultural representative has taken the opportunity to travel abroad, and to the United States, looking at farm conditions, and in his spare time, he and his wife go around speaking to a number of groups, some not even closely associated with agriculture. He is a salesman for the industry in the very best sense, as well as being very useful and effective in all of his other responsibilities.

But it does appear to me that we are perhaps asking these men to do more than they should. If we were to restrict their duties along one line, they might be more effective.

I wonder if the department has made any survey of this problem—if it is a problem—and if the hon. Minister has a comment he would like to make.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, I welcome the comments made by the hon. member for Brant, because I could not agree with him more. I believe that our agricultural representatives have been used too extensively by a good many organizations as secretaries—I am thinking of breed organizations and this kind of thing.

Now, we cannot apply this philosophy right across the board and say they should resign all secretaryships, because I feel that they should continue as secretaries in certain organizations to which they should belong, such as the crop improvement association and the beef improvement association. These are co-ordinating responsibilities. But when they become secretary of breed organizations within a county or an area or region, within the province, then I think they are being asked to assume responsibilities that, as you so well say, might be well assumed by so other prominent agriculturalist within the area, who has certainly the ability to do this kind of secretarial work.

We feel, in fact, we have already advised our agricultural representatives to cut down on this secretarial work, this extra work that they have assumed over the past insofar as it is possible to do, as quickly as they can do this.

I would like to express my appreciation on behalf of the department for the compliment the hon. member for Brant has paid, Mr. Chairman, to the agricultural representatives—the image they have created and the prestige they have brought to the agricultural field. I am not altogether opposed to them spending time with urban groups, and with others not directly related to agriculture in order that a proper and basic concept of agriculture as it pertains in this year 1965, should be brought to the attention of people in all walks of life.

Vote 105 agreed to.

Vote 106 agreed to.

On vote 107:

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Chairman, on vote 107, there is a matter which I wish to raise under this vote, one of which the hon. Minister has already had notice, through the Speaker the other day, in connection with the farm products inspection. It is the matter that was raised in the investigation into FAME, and in the Globe and Mail of Wednesday, May 26, we have this statement:

The F. W. Fearman Co. Ltd. meat-packing plant in Burlington was losing money on its daily operations because it was giving the consumer too much of a break—by trimming too much fat off its meat, and not using enough brine to give it extra weight, a Royal commission was told yesterday.

Mr. Bourdon said he found the Fearman plant was trimming too much fat off meat compared with the Quebec plant and other firms, where he had worked for 24 years before joining the Quebec co-operative. He said the Fearman plant was not injecting enough brine into the meat, which adds to the weight.

"You mean, they were giving the customers too much of a break?" M. A. Craig, commission counsel asked.

"Yes," Mr. Bourdon replied.

He estimated the Fearman operation would realize—the rest perhaps is not relevant here.

The question I would like to put to the hon. Minister is the significance of this statement regarding adding to the weight by pumping brine into the meat. We have heard of this for some time and here we have a statement that is being made that this is a general practice, evidently, in the meat-packing industry. Prices are thereby raised because the weight is raised, and this particular plant evidently was not doing this and was thereby giving the customers a break. Here it seems to me is a place where we ought to have some clarity by the hon. Minister as to what this means and whether it is a bad policy; and if it is a bad policy, then what steps are being taken to change it? There may be some justification for this practice, perhaps the hon. Minister could comment on this.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, this was the question that was asked the other day. I had the answer all typed out, put it in some of these files and am blessed if I can put my hand on it. I will have to speak from memory.

First of all this is a matter that does not fall within the jurisdiction of The Ontario Department of Agriculture. The matter of the injection of brine into meat falls within the purview of the food and drug inspection service at Ottawa as far as residual amounts are concerned.

But I think to preface this discussion we must recognize that the treatment of fresh pork in a brine solution goes back, as long as memory goes back almost, to the various methods of treatment that have been used to preserve pork, and this is just another one.

The old method was that it was soaked in a brine solution in barrels for a period of days and then it was taken out. It was either sold in what was known as the pickled state or the fresh brine solution state. Some of it was rolled in peameal bacon and sold as fresh peameal roll; some of it was cooked and sold as cooked meat after it had come out of the brine solution. In some cases the weight may have been increased by the soaking in the brine, in cases where it was cooked the weight was greatly decreased.

In any event, The Meat Inspection Act of Canada provides that meat sold for public consumption that is treated with a brine solution, or cured pork as it were, must be so treated. In fact, the regulations are set out pertaining to this and the slaughterer or slaughterhouse operator has no choice but to do it according to those regulations.

This matter of injecting brine into the meat by method of syringe or needle injection, as they call it, is a new procedure which has just been developed in the relatively last few years, I believe, and it works quite effectively. It reduces the amount of time taken to soak the product in brine to effect the proper curing and it, the injection, spreads the brine throughout the pork and renders it fit for human consumption. This is all done, as I said, under strict supervision of The Canada Meat Inspection Act and the residual content is under the inspection and control of the food and drug branch of the federal government.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, I might just add to this.

The hon. Minister explains the process and I quite agree that it may be a new and better process than the old soaking method which we knew years ago. But the inference here in this investigation is that the co-operative was doing this, but injecting enough brine in order to preserve the meat and make it palatable but not injecting as much as other plants were injecting and thereby giving the consumer a break. Other plants were injecting more than they needed to in order to raise weight, this is the inference here. I quite agree that this process might be legitimate and proper, but surely this inference that comes out of this investigation is one that ought to be looked at by the Canadian people, whether at this government level or at the federal level.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, before this vote is passed, I do not want to let that go by because the inference here is that one company was not using as much as another. Now on what is said in the press statement, really, the opposite meaning could be taken.

I have not got the clipping before me, but I read it very carefully and as I recall, what happened was that the losses of the Fearman company as related by Mr. Bourdon had been cut from $11,000 a week to, what was it, $3,500 a week, after this man took over and his process had been implemented. I think this was grossly exaggerated, quite frankly, as far as the effects are concerned. If one were to read that article, as it says in that press release—and I am only quoting from memory—they would think that what was said is just the opposite to what my hon. friend has said, that the co-operative itself was gypping the public. This is not the case, nor is it the case with any other meat packing plant. The fact remains that the amount of brine that is in the pork is inserted into it first of all for curing purposes as well as for disease control. It must conform to a certain standard, there must be a certain amount of it; and residual amounts are subject to the control and inspection of the food and drug. I really do not think there is any great problem here, nor would I suggest for a moment that the public is being gouged by any packing company.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, I just call to the hon. Minister's attention the words upon which I based the question. I will read them again:

He said the Fearman plant was not injecting enough brine into the meat, which adds to the weight.

"You mean they were giving the customers too much of a break?" M. A. Craig, commission counsel asked.

"Yes," Mr. Bourdon replied.

That is all. Now, the Minister has given an explanation, I presume, which he thinks is justified.

Vote 107 agreed to.

On vote 108:

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, on vote 108, we have had considerable discussion so far with this department on the legitimate role of the government in conjunction with farmers and their marketing to build the facilities for more effective marketing and stabilizing the market. When I raised this in connection with my comments on FAME, the hon. Minister interjected and said that his counterpart in Nova Scotia had said that they had lost a great deal of money. I told the hon. Minister I did not have the document at that time but I have it now. I think once and for all we should lay the half-truths and the rumours with regard to exactly what has happened in another jurisdiction as a legitimate example of government assistance or co-operation with the producers.

In the instance of the Nova Scotia Co-operative Abattoir Limited, the finances were as follows: Share capital subscribed by farmers, approximately $570,000; share capital subscribed by the Nova Scotia government in cash, $200,000; loan by the Nova Scotia government in the form of a mortgage at five per cent, $1 million; bank guarantee by the Nova Scotia government, $340,000—that is simply underwriting some credit need, that might conceivably be for working capital. Indeed, later on in a document here which has spelled out the whole operation and background, there is a portion which I would like to read into the record:

In 1957 a new formula was worked out between the government and the producers. The government of the province would provide $3 for every $1 of the farmer money up to $1.2 million in the form of $200,000 in share capital and $1 million of a loan in the form of a mortgage, providing the farmers subscribed $400,000 in share capital, which must be cash, and three months in which to do it. The challenge was accepted by the farmers, and before the limit had expired they had raised $570,000 in cash instead of the $400,000 that they had been challenged by.

A building committee, composed of government and farm representations, was set up, and the building was built and equipped at a cost of approximately $1,200,000. Operations began in August of 1960.

The first four years of operation resulted in considerable losses. It should be understood this was expected due to several factors. One, not one man in Nova Scotia had any previous experience in an abattoir. Two, getting new equipment to perform properly. Three, to produce and market a high quality product—and so on. They give a number of reasons which are not particularly relevant here:

Predictions were that we would have to operate for at least five years with losses or until livestock receipts reached a figure of 1,000 hogs per week and 200 cattle. After four and a half years of operation, with an average of 800 hogs and 120 cattle, we will break even and show a small profit for the fiscal year ending April 30, 1965.

Another section of the report points out that the result of this whole thing is that hog production in Nova Scotia had virtually disappeared. Establishment of their own plant has tended to increase the production, so that while in 1958 it was 21,000, by 1965 it is at the rate of 78,000 to 80,000 for the year.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: May I ask the hon. member the date of that report?

Mr. MacDonald: Of recent weeks. It was prepared by somebody in connection with the Nova Scotia Co-operative Abattoir Limited, and was received by people up in Ontario—I was among them—who have heard varying comments as to what the system was, and I have inquired on a number of occasions.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: The hon. member does not know who wrote that?

Mr. MacDonald: No, I am not sure exactly who wrote it. But it was the president, or one of the officials of the co-op plant.

Now, one final point later on in this memorandum. I would be glad to show it to the hon. Minister as a matter of fact.

The government of Nova Scotia has lost no money to date on this project. We have paid the interest to date on the loan, $50,000 annually, and met all other obligations.

So the simple fact of the matter is, that it is true the co-op lost money for the first four-and-a-half years, but they knew this was going to happen. They are now into a position of being in the black, but in the meantime, the government has lost no money at all.

So I think this should be borne in mind as we come to a further consideration of the FAME situation in Ontario at the appropriate time after a report has come down.

The hon. Minister may have a comment on that, but before I sit down I would like to read one other question as a footnote to our discussions on the bean board, which has been pretty extended and detailed up until now.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: We will answer that first one before we get into the other one. They are two separate matters.

I appreciate the sincerity with which my hon. friend has read this report and I am quite sure he believes it, but frankly I cannot believe it for the simple reason that it is not signed by anyone. There is no name on this at all. I gather there even is not a date on it. I read it, as I listened to the hon. member, as four-and-a-half-years operation predicted, not an actual reality—

Mr. MacDonald: No, no, they started in 1960.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Yes, but it is predicted by March 30, 1965 such and so would happen. Whether it has actually happened or not, I do not think the report makes clear. I may have misunderstood this, but I gathered that it had not, that it was only a prediction.

I do not know how one assesses these things. I made the statement the other day in the House that this plant had cost the government of Nova Scotia half-a-million dollars a year since it opened. Well, it may not be right, but I do not know whose word one takes—the word of someone who does not even sign his name to a report, or the word of the Minister of Agriculture of the province of Nova Scotia?

I discussed this matter with the Minister from Nova Scotia when he was here last fall and went into it in some detail with him, and I can tell you that it was a matter of very great concern to him, as a liability against the government of Nova Scotia, not only from the standpoint of the capital investment which they had, but of the cost of operating the plant, and the money it was costing them year by year to keep the doors open on that plant. There was no hesitancy whatever on his part in saying this to me.

Now, I have not got it backed up and confirmed in writing at all, but I said to him: "Well, the time may come when I may have to say this." And he said: "Well, you are perfectly at liberty to say this. You have discussed this with me, and this is the case as it pertains in Nova Scotia."

My deputy reminds me that I talked to him by telephone this spring and I did, when this problem was in everyone's mind and the Nova Scotia example was held up to me by certain people in Ontario as something that I should be doing. I called him personally and re-confirmed the conversation we had had last year and I asked: "Actually, is this the case?" And he said: "It is indeed the case." Now all I have to go by is what he told me. What my hon. friend has read is news to me, and I am afraid, Mr. Chairman, news I cannot quite accept.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. Minister can take my word for it that at the moment it can be accepted. These are memoranda that were covered by a letter. I was not given a copy of the letter, but the letter is from, I believe, the president of the co-op, or certainly some authoritative official in the co-op.

On the point that the hon. Minister tried to throw doubt on, I do not think there is any validity for him to suggest that, because that paragraph reads as follows:

After four-and-a-half years of operation, with an average of 800 hogs and 120 cattle, we will break even and show a small profit for the fiscal year ending April 30, 1965.

The four-and-a-half years of operation was some time in 1964. They reached it at that period and began to break even. They were predicting—and did, I assume, because this is since the end of May—a small profit at the end of April in 1965.

If I may, just to be completely fair with the hon. Minister, I should read the last two paragraphs:

I might add further, the government of Nova Scotia has recognized the work of the Nova Scotia co-operative abattoir in the increased returns to farmers, the development of a livestock industry and it means the general level of the economy of our province . . . In fact, I am prepared to say that they have taken a real statesman-like approach to the whole project, and I am sure they would be prepared to support it to a much greater extent than in the past.

This is very greatly appreciated by the farmers of Nova Scotia. You will recognize how closely the government, The Department of Agriculture and the farmers have worked together on this deal. I am convinced this is the only way to get things done.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Who signed that?

Mr. MacDonald: I told you that for the moment I cannot give you the name because it was on an accompanying letter, a copy of which I have not got. But this is the memorandum reviewing the history up until the present time.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Well, I cannot accept an unsigned letter. That is all there is to it. Anyone could write that letter.

Mr. Oliver: It is all right for my hon. friend to say he cannot accept an unsigned letter, but what I would like to ask my hon. friend is, what sort of a case has he been building up for the last ten minutes or so? Is he trying to suggest that because there was a possibility of financial involvement by the Nova Scotia government, and perhaps even a loss of some stature, that that provides a basic and an immovable reason why my hon. friend's government would not put any money behind a co-operative organization which seeks to start a packing house industry in this province? Surely that is not what my hon. friend is arguing.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Well, Mr. Chairman, I have no relationship, nor does anything I have said bear any relationship to anything else that may pertain in my hon. friend's estimation. I am dealing purely with the Nova Scotia situation, because it has been held up to us as a money-making project and something that the government of Ontario should do. I simply relate to the hon. members the facts as they were related to me through at least two discussions pertaining to this particular plant, and this is all I have to say.

Mr. Oliver: My hon. friend will appreciate that governments in the past in the same straits in which he belongs did back a co-operative packing venture in this province. The Copako at Barrie, for instance. I believe a loan was given by the Conservative government of the day of some $100,000 at least to that company, and the fact that that loan was given was, I think, the lever which brought that company into a position where today it is an outstanding co-operative company, and doing a good job for the people of this province. So I hope we are not going to get into the position where we rule out any financial support for these organizations on the part of the government.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Well, Mr. Chairman, in this connection I already mentioned a $100,000 loan, the same loan that was given to Copako—

Mr. Oliver: But those were different days—30 years ago and now is quite a difference.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: The very same loan.

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Minister of Highways): Mr. Chairman, there is a specific area of this vote on which I should like to make a few comments, and that is the subject to which both the hon. member for Huron-Bruce and the hon. member for York South made reference in their general statements following the introductory remarks of the hon. Minister of Agriculture last week, and to which the hon. Minister made a most suitable reply. I refer to the Ontario bean growers marketing board.

It is appropriate, I believe, for me to present certain views to the House because in the riding of Huron, which I am proud and privileged to represent and which comprises the southern two-thirds of Huron county, the production of white beans constitutes one of the principal cash crops in this farming area of Ontario. In fact, it is safe to say, in the comparative sense, that Huron is now the largest producing area for this important cash crop in Ontario, indeed in all Canada. The 1964 acreage figures showed Huron with 25,840 acres, followed by Kent county with 24,000 acres. While the production is spreading both north and east, the southern portion of Huron would still account for the major volume of production.

It is also a matter of interest that production has increased in Canada—with by far the major percentage in Ontario—from just over 26,000 tons in 1954 to more than 50,000 tons in the last production year of 1964; approximately double in the last 10 years.

Another important feature, and one worthy of note, is that while domestic consumption has remained fairly constant for the past four years, ranging between approximately 33,000 and 37,000 tons, export sales have risen sharply from 3,300 to 14,000 tons in the four-year period 1960 to 1964. In other words, export volume has risen by approximately 11,000 tons while consumption in Canada, as I have mentioned, has risen by about 4,000 tons.

Present indications are that the planted acreage will increase sharply this year. Some early plantings have already been made and with favourable weather, seeding operations will be underway in the growing areas of southwestern Ontario by the end of this week. Dealer distributors indicate an unprecedented demand for seed. Importation of pedigreed seed for planting purposes shows an increase of between 30 and 40 per cent over last year—1964.

Now, there is, of course, a reason for this, Mr. Chairman. The breeding of new strains and varieties of improved types of seed have made it possible to grow this lucrative cash crop over a much broader area than ever before. Intensive research, plant breeding and selection programmes have developed varieties with shorter maturity terms which make it possible to extend production areas north and east into sections of western Ontario which only a few years ago could not have considered the cultivation of white beans as a cash crop.

Moreover, Mr. Chairman, these same plant-breeding techniques have produced plants which have more of a bush or upright growing character than the dwarf or low-growing type of a few years ago. The net result is the growth of varieties of white beans which can be grown successfully in areas with shorter growing seasons and which, because of the other growing habits to which I have referred, have a much better chance of being harvested before the former hazards of frost or long periods of wet weather intervene.

It can also be said, Mr. Chairman, that these plant-breeding techniques have materially reduced the disease factors that were prevalent not too long ago.

These factors would seem to establish the trend towards continuing increases in planting private acreage and yields, and while weather and many factors between planting and harvest must still be reckoned with, it seems obvious that the present and foreseeable future holds promise for greatly increased production potential. If this can be accepted, and I as well as many others believe it can, then it seems to me to be nothing less than prudent to examine our position which is precisely what my colleague, the hon. Minister of Agriculture, is attempting to do.

Firstly, as I stated earlier in my remarks, home or domestic consumption would appear to have its limit. It has apparently levelled off in direct proportion to our population increase. At the same time, indicated potential production may well exceed domestic requirements by greater amounts than ever before.

Mr. Chairman, I would say to you and to the hon. members that this could and would be serious if we did not fully employ the many advantages that are open to us. The hon. Minister outlined some of these last week, and I should like to repeat these and possibly elaborate to some extent if I may.

Firstly, the British market can absorb not only presently indicated production surpluses, but also vastly greater quantities of Ontario white beans if we introduce a few simple expedients, one in particular which will gear us to accommodate this vast potential market. As it presently stands, the British prefer our beans to those from any other production area. They like the quality and they like the grade. In fact, our Canadian grading regulations provide, in large measure, for the quality features to which I have referred.

Secondly, and as the hon. Minister pointed out, we have the advantage of the protection afforded by Commonwealth preferential tariffs coupled with the preferential position of our currency versus that of our principal competitor and the largest producer in the world, the United States—mainly the state of Michigan.

As a matter of interest and fact, an article in a British trade journal dated November, 1964, entitled "The Saga of the Ubiquitous Baked Bean, the most popular of all canned vegetables," shows the fantastic growth of this most important food product. The article states that canned baked beans are bought by 68 per cent of all British housewives and that the total volume of sales has increased from £12 million sterling to £27 million sterling from 1953 to 1964, which of course can only be described as a tremendous volume of this staple food product.

Processors are quick to tell you why the quality of Ontario beans is important to them. It is simply a matter of economics and the British, Mr. Chairman, are very astute in these matters. The simple facts are that because of the reliability of Canadian grades—the minimum amount of impurities and so on, a ton of Ontario beans processes into more cans or cases of finished product with less processing cost than do white beans of other origin. So it can be clearly and positively stated that our Ontario product has a high acceptability on the United Kingdom market. But there are difficulties standing in the way of trading, one of which may be overcome shortly.

The first difficulty has been that of consistent supply. Having indicated to the House the tremendous volume required, for which the UK processor must rely on foreign production, the available quantities from Ontario until at least recently have been little more than a drop in the bucket. If marketing procedures can be implemented here in Ontario, coupled with apparent trends towards increased production, Ontario can develop a vastly increased share of the British market.

To do this it is of the utmost importance I believe to take one more competitive step and that is to establish through the Ontario bean growers marketing board our floor or support price concurrently with the time this procedure, or at least the counterpart of this procedure, is implemented in the United States.

At this precise moment Ontario dealers are receiving inquiries and requests for offers of 1965 crop Ontario white beans. Because the growers board in the past has negotiated the Ontario support or takeover price in the fall, versus the United States commodity credit corporation practice of announcing their purchase price in the spring, the latter has already been announced for 1965. Thus, it seems to me that Ontario dealers and growers can be placed at an extreme disadvantage.

This situation can be particularly important in a year when production appears to be headed for an all-time high both here and in Michigan. It will be apparent, I am sure, that with Michigan dealers now able to trade against a domestic floor price already established, they may very well be in the advantageous position of being able to provide for a sufficient share of the British market as to have a serious and prejudicial effect on the marketing of our Ontario crops. The board has expressed concern about the plight of dealers who make pre-crop sales in the event of total or partial crop failures. I would say to you, Mr. Chairman, with complete conviction, that this fear is groundless. The Ontario dealer trade are thoroughly competent to protect themselves against this probability and possibility.
